This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

COURT OF APPEALS.

John HUTKOFF, Respt.,
v.

Emily R. CALDWELL et al., Respts.,
v.
Franklin J. WALL, Appt.
Gotthelf GREINER, Respt.,
Jettel H. HAMBURGER, Appt.

1. Section 22 of article 6 of the Constitution, giving the Legislature power to authorize appeals from courts of record to be taken directly to the Court of Appeals, was intended to embrace only courts of record which were established in cities at the time of the adoption of article 6, to wit, in December, 1869.
2. The superior courts established in cities were enumerated in the Constitution, and their power and jurisdiction made permanent; and no authority was given to establish additional ones, although the Legislature was authorized to establish inferior local courts.
3. Section 22 of article 6 of the Constitution, in speaking of courts of record established in cities, did not intend to include the Marine Court of the City of New York.

(Decided January 18, 1887.)

MOTIONS by appellants, for reargument of motions to dismiss appeals from judgments of the General Term of the City Court of New York. Denied.

The opinion on granting the original motion to dismiss the appeals is reported in 4 Central Reporter, 773.

The questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. W. S. Rose with Mr. W. T. Birdsall, for the motion.

Mr. Henry Wehle with Mr. Charles Goldzier, contra.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the argument of the motions to 'dismiss the appeals in these cases no reference was made to section 22 of article 6 of the Constitution; and a motion for a reargument is now made, upon the ground that the omission was owing to excusable inadvertence of counsel, and that the court was thereby misled.

Section 22 of article 6 provides that "The Legislature may authorize the judgments, decrees and decisions of any court of record of original civil jurisdiction, established in a city, to be removed for review, directly into the court of appeals."

This section not having been referred to on the argument was not noticed in the opinion then delivered. As it now appears to be relied upon by the counsel for the appellants, we have examined the question whether it affects the present case, and have come to the conclusion that it does not require us to change our decision.

It will be observed that section 22 applies only to courts of record, and, in our judgment, was intended to embrace only courts of record which were established in cities at the time of the adoption of article 6, viz.: in December, 1869.

There were at that time in existence, in addition to the Court of Common Pleas and Superior Court of the City of New York, several other local courts established in cities, viz.: the Superior Court of the City of Buffalo, the City Court of Brooklyn, which were courts of record; also the Marine Court of the City of New York, the Mayors' Courts of cities, the Recorders' Courts of cities, the District Courts of the City of New York, the Justices' Courts of cities, etc.

The Constitution evidently did not contemplate the establishment by the Legislature of other superior city courts. By section 19 of article 6 the Legislature was authorized to establish inferior local courts; but the superior courts established in cities were enumerated in the Constitution, and their powers and jurisdiction made permanent; but no authority was given to establish additional superior courts in cities; and in Landers v. Staten Island R. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 450, we held that the Legislature had no power to extend the jurisdiction of the City Court of Brooklyn, so as to deprive it of its local character.

Section 22 of article 6 was, in our judgment, intended to authorize appeals direct to the court of appeals from the courts of record in existence at the time of the adoption of the article, whose judgments were at that time reviewable, in the first instance, in the Supreme Court.

The Marine Court of the City of New York was a court of great importance, of ancient origin, and transacting a very large amount of business. Its jurisdiction had been from time to time increased so that although, except in special cases, it was originally limited to $50, it had by degrees grown so as to embrace cases involving $500; yet it was not a court of record, in the legal sense of the term, until 1872.

The power to review its judgments, in the first instance, was vested by law in the Court of Common Pleas; and, as was shown in the first opinion in this case, that power of review of the Court of Common Pleas was, by the Constitution, made permanent. By limiting the power of the Legislature to authorize appeals directly to this court, to appeals from judgments of courts of record, we think that it was the intention of section 22 of article 6 to exclude the Marine Court from its operation.

As there is some color for the claim that the Marine Court was a court of record before the passage of the Act of 1872, it is necessary, for the purpose of determining that question, to advert briefly to its history.

It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to go further back than the Revised Laws of 1813. Chapter 86 of those laws entitled "An Act to Reduce Several Laws Relating Particularly to the City of New York into One Act"(§ 105), authorized the person administering the government of this State, for the time being, by and with the advice and consent of the council of appointment, from time to time to appoint and commission three proper and discreet persons to be known by the name of Justices of the Justices' Court in and for the City and County of New York.

Section 106 enacted that said three justices, or any two of them, should hold a court in the manner therein prescribed, to be known as the Justices' Court of the City of New York. Jurisdiction was conferred upon such court to try and determine actions where the amount in controversy should exceed $25, and should not exceed $50; also all actions for seamen's wages, or by owners against seamen for breach of contracts for services, notwithstanding that the damages should exceed $50; also actions for marine assaults, although the damages should exceed $50; and for the purpose of determining all such actions the court was vested with all the power and authority of other courts of record in this State, and was declared to be a court of record.

By section 107 such court was declared to be a court of record, and authorized to have a seal, and a clerk to be appointed by the justices.

By section 110 the clerk was required to cause to be entered or registered in proper books a docket of all summonses, warrants, precepts, executions and process issued, and of the returns thereto, and proper entries of all acts, orders dismissing decrees, judgments, adjournments and proceedings of said court, and also the substance of the plaintiff's charge or demand, and of the defendant's plea. The forms of proceeding were prescribed in subsequent sections, and were similar to those in Justices' Courts.

By chapter 71 of the Laws of 1819 the court was reorganized, and its name was changed to "The Marine Court of the City of New York."

By chapter 149 of the Laws of 1817 the jurisdiction of the court was increased to cases involving $100.

By chapter 389 of the Laws of 1852 it was further increased to $250.

By chapter 617 of the Laws of 1853 to $500; and further enlargements of its jurisdiction were afterward made.

By chapter 144 of the Laws of 1849 (§ 7) section 107 of the Act of 1813, which declared the court to be a court of record, and authorized it to have a seal, was totally repealed; but by chapter 389 of the Laws of 1852 (§ 10) the common council was directed to provide the clerk of the Marine Court with a seal, with the proviso that nothing in the Act contained should authorize said court to issue certificates of naturalization.

So much, however, of the repealed section 107 of the Act of 1813 as declared the court to be a court of record was not at that time reenacted; and at the time of the adoption of article 6 of the Constitution the court remained, so far as respects the question of its being a court of record, as left by the Act of 1852.

To constitute a court of record in a legal sense it is not sufficient that the court should have a clerk and a seal. A court of record is defined by Blackstone to be one whose proceedings are enrolled for a perpetual memorial and testimony, which rolls are called the records of the court, and are of such high and super-eminent authority that their truth is not to be called in question. If the existence of a record be denied, it shall be tried by nothing but itself, that is, upon bare inspection, whether there be any such record or no. 3 Bl. Com, 24; Co. Litt. 260a and 117b.

An order entered in the minutes of such a court is not a record, until it has been enrolled. Croswell v. Byrnes, 9 Johns. 287.

These rolls or records contain a history of the proceedings to which they relate.

As has already been shown, the Revised Act organizing the court (2 R. L. 86, § 105. et seq.) did not provide for any rolls or records other than the registers directed to be kept by the clerk, containing dockets of the processes issued by the court and minutes of its orders and judgments, and of the substance of the pleadings, which were oral. Written pleadings were not required until 1857; Laws 1857, chap. 295; and even these were not required in marine cases; and there was no provision for judgment rolls in any case. But after the adoption of article 6 of the Constitution, by chapter 629 of the Laws of 1872 (§ 1) the Marine Court of the City of New York was declared to be a court of record, to and for all intents and purposes. Its powers and jurisdiction were continued, except as otherwise provided in the Act. By subsequent sections the forms of proceedings and remedies prescribed by the Code of Procedure for actions in courts of record, including the forms of pleading, were applied to the Marine Court, and the rules of practice of the Supreme Court were made applicable to it; and in the Code of Civil Procedure of 1877 it was for the first time included in the enumeration of the courts of record of this State.

Before the passage of the Act of 1872 the status of the Marine Court as a court of record was considered in several cases. In Wheaton v. Fellows, 23 Wend. 375, which related to the Justice's Court of the City of Albany, the question arose whether that court was a court of record. Its organization was similar to that of the Marine Court. Laws 1821, p. 36.

It was composed of three justices, and had a clerk and seal, and was, in the Act organizing it, declared to be a court of record, but its proceedings were to be the same as those in a justice's court. The provisions as to the entry of its proceedings in a register were the same as those in the Marine Court Act of 1813. It was held in the case cited not to be a court of record in a strict legal sense, but only for some special purposes; and a plea nil debet was held good in an action upon a judgment rendered by it, although it would not have been a good plea to an action on a judgment of a court of record.

In Lester v. Redmond, 6 Hill, 590, decided in 1844, a like decision was rendered with reference to the Marine Court of the City of New York; and it was held that that court, although a court of record for certain purposes, was not such in the exercise of its jurisdiction between party and party; and the six years' Statute of Limitations was held to bar an action on its judgments.

In Ford v. Babcock, 1 Denio, 158, decided in 1845, it was held that whoever set up the authority of the Marine Court must show that the case was one of which it had jurisdiction; and in Huff v. Knapp, 5 N. Y. 65, decided in 1851, it was held by this court that the Marine Court did not possess the power incident to courts of record to appoint a crier, and had none of the incidental powers of courts of record, it not being a court of record in the strict legal sense of the term.

We do not think, therefore, that section 22 of article 6 of the Constitution, in speaking of the courts of record established in cities, intended to include the Marine Court of the City of New York.

The Act of 1886 does not, in terms, authorize appeals direct to this court from the Marine (now the City) Court of the City of New York. It is only by implication that the right is claimed. By the attempt to constitute it a superior city court it is supposed that the general provisions authorizing appeals from the superior city courts were made applicable to it. We do not discuss that question, nor do we concede that the Legislature had power to establish superior city courts in addition to those enumerated in the Constitution, its authority in this respect being confined by section 19 of article 6 to the establishment of inferior local courts.

The case of Landers v. Staten Island R. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 450, is apparently adverse to the view that such a power is vested in the Legislature.

The motion for a reargument should be denied, without costs.

All concur.

PEOPLE of the State of New York, Respts.,

R. Porter LEE et al., Appts.

1. In an action on a joint and several guaranty it is no defense to show that there are other persons liable for the whole or a portion of the same debt claimed of the defendants, or that such persons are not made parties to the action.
2. Sureties in a bond for a bank, a depositary of the State for canal tolls, are not released from liability thereon by another bond, subsequently executed and delivered but not accepted by the State.
3. The words of the condition of a bond are not to be limited to the language of the recital, where the language of the condition clearly shows an intention to incur a liability not in terms referred to in the recital.
4. Guaranties are to be interpreted and enforced according to the meaning and intent and in the manner designed by the parties at the time of their execution, giving due effect to every part of the same.
5. A contract will have a retroactive effect where by express words or necessary implication it appears to be the intention of the parties to embrace past transactions.
6. When the language of the contract was that the bank should account for and pay over all moneys deposited with it and all moneys now on deposit in said bank or for which it shall in any way become liable, held, that the sureties thereon intended to be bound for the continuing security of the existing deposit.
7. It is not competent for parties to such an undertaking to allege that they were ignorant of the existence of a debt expressly provided for, or that they have been misled by the omission of the principals to notify them of its existence.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming a judgment entered in Albany County upon report of a referee in favor of plaintiff in an action on contracts of guaranty. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Eugene H. Lewis, for appellants.

I. The undertakings of 1880 and 1881 are void as to the defendants, and no action can be sustained upon them. At the time of the execution of the undertakings, respectively, the bank was indebted to the plaintiff in large sums for deposits of canal tolls in previous years, which it had never paid over. This fact was not known to the defendants. There was no recital of it in the undertakings themselves. Neither the agents of the plaintiffs nor the officers of the bank disclosed it to them. If they had known the fact, they would not have signed the undertakings. Their contract was, therefore, entered into under mistake of fact, from which they will be relieved by a court of equity.

II. The sureties upon the guaranties in suit did not become liable for any indebtedness of the bank to the plaintiff, beyond that arising from deposits of canal tolls made during the current years in which the guaranties were respectively given.

Full effect cannot be given to the language of the concluding clause; it is too broad. In so far as the language of the guaranty is broader than its recitals and special language, it is null and powerless to sustain a liability.

Arlington v. Merricke, 2 Saund. 411; Liverpool Water Works v. Atkinson. 6 East, 507; Wardens v. Bostock, 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 175; Pearsall v. Summersett, 4 Taunt. 593; Hassell v. Long, 2 Maule & S. 363; Napier v. Bruce, 8 Clark & F. 470; Tradesmans Bank v. Woodward, Anthon, N. P. 300; Mayor v. Kelly, 98 N. Y. 467.

Upon reference to the contract it will be seen that the deposits agreed by the bank to be received are "one tenth the deposits of the canal moneys collected at Buffalo during the year 1880," and in the ensuing year, are "a part of the canal tolls," etc. Those are the only deposits which are made the subject of any reference in the recitals of the guaranty. Had it been the intention of the parties that the sureties should be made responsible for a balance carried forward from the preceding year, it would have been a simple matter to add a second recital, stating the existence of such a balance.

The State held, at the time that each year's guaranty was taken, a guaranty with perfectly solvent sureties for any balance due it from the preceding year. The principle contended for under this point controls and is decisive of the large class of cases reported in the books where sureties of public officers have been proceeded against for defaults of their principals, happening before the commencement or after the expiration of the terms during which their bonds were given.

U. S. v. Eckford, 1 How. 250 (42 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 120); Kingston Mut. Ins. Co. v. Clark, 33 Barb. 196.

The written parts of the instrument must control the printed. The obligation of the guaranty is printed; the recital is in writing.

The referee erred in refusing to find that the bond and guaranty of 1882 were accepted by the plaintiff. The real question here is not whether the auditor was so well satisfied with the sureties on the guaranty as would have induced him not to request others later on; but it is whether the deposits made after it was given might have been recovered upon the bond and guaranty of 1882, without further action on the part of the plaintiff's auditor to indicate his approval of the same.

If the plaintiff began to do the things which, as a consideration for the guaranty of 1882, it agreed to do, then the sureties upon that guaranty would be bound; and if they were bound, then the plaintiff is.

1 Pars. Cont. 7th ed. p. 480.

It was not necessary for the auditor to notify either the bank or the sureties, upon the guaranty of 1882, of his acceptance of the guaranty before it took effect as a legal obligation.

The guaranty of 1882 was a completed undertaking on the part of the sureties at the time of its execution and delivery and the State has to this day retained possession of it. It has never notified either the bank or the sureties of its refusal to accept the guaranty. There has been on the part of the State no affirmative act of rejection of the guaranty which it would be necessary for the sureties to establish in an action against them upon the guaranty of 1882.

That the State is a party to the contract does not change the rule of law.

Mr. D. O'Brien, Atty-Gen., for respondents:

It is only in those cases where the words of the condition of the bond are general and indefinite as to the time during which the surety shall remain liable, or as to the subject of his liability, that a recital in the bond specifying the time during which the prescribed duty is to be performed, or the particular duty itself which the principal undertakes to perform, will limit the application of general words in the contract part of the instrument.

Brandt, Suretyship, § 138, p. 194.

When the bond of an officer is general in its terms and the office is not annual, the liability of the surety is not, in the absence of special circumstances, limited to a year.

Id. § 145, p. 204; Mayor of Birmingham v. Wright, 16 Ad. & El. N. S. 623; Dedham Bank v. Chickering, 3 Pick. 335.

In the present case while there was an annual designation of the bank, yet the contract between the bank and the State was unlimited as to the term during which the liability was to continue. It provided that such liability should continue until either the bank had made a voluntary payment of the moneys on hand into the state treasury, or had honored the draft of the state treasurer thereon for such amount.

Bank of British N. A. v. Cuvillier, 14 Moore, P. C. C. 187; Thompson v. Roberts, 17 Irish Law Rep. 490; Worcester Bank v. Reed, 9 Mass. 267; Evans v. Earle, 1 Hurl. & G. 1.

In this case the application of payments made by the bank during the years 1880 and 1881 is of no materiality, inasmuch as these defendants are upon both bonds, unless it should be held that under the bond of 1880 the defendants were not liable for the balance of $65,000 which was on deposit in the bank at the time the bond was executed. But the account was a continuous one. The relation of debtor and creditor existed between the bank and the State. There was no application by either party, of the payments made; and the general rule is that under such circumstances, if payments be made upon the account, the law will apply them upon the oldest item.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The First National Bank of Buffalo had, prior to 1882, for a series of years, been annually appointed a depositary of the State for canal tolls receivable in the City of Buffalo, and had annually executed and delivered to the State contracts regulating the relations between them, the performance of which had been in each year guarantied on the part of the bank by some of its directors in their individual capacity.

Early in the season of 1882 said bank became insolvent after it had been appointed a depositary, but before it had completed and delivered to the State satisfactory security for the performance of its obligations for the ensuing year; and after that time the State discontinued its relations with such bank.

Upon its insolvency the bank was found to be indebted to the State in a large sum of money; and the question in this case arises over the liability of its guarantors for such debt.

The complaint embraces the guaranties of both the years 1880 and 1881, in its allegations, and seeks to recover the balance appearing to be due on the account for moneys deposited at the commencement of the year 1882.

These contracts and guaranties were expressed in precisely similar language, and so far as the parties to them are concerned are subject to the same rule of interpretation, and must be understood to have been intended to cover the same class of obligations, and to differ only in respect to the time of their execution and the period of time covered by their provisions.

Such guaranties are joint and several in character, and it would constitute no defense to an action upon any of them to show that there were other persons liable to the State for the whole or a portion of the same debt claimed of the defendants, or that such persons are not made parties to the action.

The defendants here are each and all obligors upon the bonds of both 1880 and 1881; and in the view we take of the case it does not enlarge their liability to consider their situation as parties to the guaranty of 1880.

It may be that, as the result of investigation, it will be discovered that other parties liable to the State for a portion of the money due from the bank to the State at the time of its insolvency, may be found, and as a consequence flowing from such fact that the defendants in this action may have a claim for contribution from such parties in case they are obliged to pay the whole sum due the State; but it is not perceived how that fact can affect the liability of such guarantors upon their express contract of indemnity.

The only breach of the obligations of the guaranty alleged in the complaint consists of the refusal of the bank to pay the sum claimed to be due from it by the State on the 20th day of April, 1882, and that amount consisted of the general balance due on the account accruing through a series of years and covering the operations of 1880 as well as those of 1881.

Whatever, therefore, may be the liabilities or obligations of the parties to the contract and guaranty of 1880, it is entirely immaterial in this action; for the guaranty of 1881 covers not only the transactions of that year but also the liability resulting from the transactions of 1880 as represented by the balance due from the bank to the State at the execution of the contract and guaranty of 1881.

If, therefore, it shall appear upon the further examination of the case that the defendants are liable upon the guaranty of 1881, for the whole balance due from the bank to the State in the spring of 1881, no question arises as to the proper application of payments made by the bank in the respective years, or as to the equities of the guarantors of the respective years as between themselves.

Such rights are to be settled and adjusted in an appropriate action, to which all such guarantors are made parties, and where everyone interested may be heard in his own behalf; and these could not be heard here for want of proper parties, if for no other reasons.

This is a simple action at law, upon a written instrument, for a sum of money claimed to be due to the plaintiff from the parties thereto. If the letter of their contract shows that they have made themselves liable for the sum claimed, it is no defense to this action to show that there are other persons who might also be resorted to by the State for a portion of the same sum.

It is claimed by the appellants that the sureties on the bond of 1881 have been released from liability thereon by reason of the acceptance by the State of a contract and guaranty from the bank for the year 1882; and it is contended that such acceptance operated as a discharge of all previous guaranties.

This claim seems to be disposed of by the findings of fact made by the referee. He expressly finds that the State never accepted the same as a compliance by the bank with the condition imposed upon them by the State in respect thereto.

The evidence in the case seems to us fully to support this finding, and renders it not only probable but quite certain that the State authorities did not intend to accept the guaranty in question.

The State could only be bound to such acceptance by the express action of its officers duly authorized to approve such guaranty, or perhaps their omission to act thereon for such a lapse of time as would authorize a legal presumption that they intended to approve the guaranty.

During the period between the receipt of this guaranty and the insolvency of the bank but a few days intervened; and the auditor was diligently employed in this time in inquiring into the responsibility of the persons proposed as sureties, and had received no satisfactory information upon that subject.

Under these circumstances no acceptance of such guaranty could properly be inferred, and no evidence of an actual approval of the guaranty by the State was given. The referee having failed to find that the guaranty of 1882 was received by the State in satisfaction of previous guaranties, there is no evidence in the case authorizing this court to hold that any such discharge was intended or effected, and no foundation for the claim that the sureties on the guaranty of 1881 were discharged by the acceptance by the State of the guaranty of 1882.

The inquiry here may therefore be limited to the liability which the signers of the guaranty of 1881 incurred, by the terms and conditions of their agreement. The main question arises over their liability for the debt, existing at the time of the execution of the guaranty, and arising out of the transactions and deposits of the year 1880.

It is claimed by the appellants that the guaranty taken in 1881 was intended to be prospective in its operation only, and did not cover existing deposits. It is not claimed but that the express terms of the undertaking cover such a liability; but it is contended that the words of the condition should be limited and controlled by the language of the recital, and so restricted could not reasonably be held to include an existing debt.

It cannot be disputed but that there is much authority tending to support the position contended for by the appellants; but we think the cases cited by them are generally cases where the language of the condition was doubtful and uncertain, and a consideration of the whole instrument and the circumstances surrounding the situation of the parties created an ambiguity requiring the application of rules of construction to determine the real interest of the parties.

The rule contended for is, however, one of construction, and obtains only for the purpose of determining the real intention of the parties in making their contract. Burr v. Am. Spiral Spring Butt Co. 81 N.Y. 178; Brandt, Suretyship, § 138.

It cannot prevail where the language of the condition clearly and unmistakably shows an intention to incur a liability not in terms referred to in the recital. Guaranties are subject to the same rules of interpretation as other contracts, and especially to that fundamental rule requiring them to be enforced according to the meaning and intent and in the manner designated by the parties at the time of their execution. Rochester City Bank v. Elwood, 21 N. Y. 90; Burr v. Am. Spiral Spring Butt Co. 81 N. Y. 178.

While the liability of guarantors is strictissimi juris and cannot be extended by construction beyond the plain and explicit language of their contract, they are still subject to the rule that effect must be given to all of the language of the contract, and a meaning and effect ascribed to each word and phrase used therein, if it can be done without violating its plain meaning and intent.

The general rule is undoubtedly that a contract cannot be construed to have a retroactive operation; and that such an effect can be given to it only where by express words or by necessary implication it clearly appears to be the intention of the parties to embrace past transactions; but when this does appear it is indisputably competent for parties to bind themselves for such liabilities.

We are clearly of the opinion in this case that the contract itself recognizes an existing liability on the part of the bank to the State, and provides for its extension and the surety thereof by the guarantors.

This would seem to be not only a natural course of proceeding on the part of the State, while taking a new security from a debtor, contemplating extended and continued transactions, but a necessary measure of precaution to avoid the complications involved in investigating the transactions of former and perhaps remote years.

It would be not only difficult but almost impracticable for the State to have its transactions with such a depositary separated into distinct divisions, and be compelled to seek its indemnity among the conflicting equities and claims of numerous sureties liable upon different contracts for the transactions of different years.

It is, however, not permissible we think to resort to rules of construction in such a case as this, for there is no ambiguity in the language of the contract, and it provides in express terms for the liability in question. Thus it states not only that the bank shall "well and faithfully account for and pay over all moneys deposited with it or for which it shall in any way become liable in and by said contract, according to the terms and provisions thereof," but "that said bank shall account for and pay over all money now on deposit in said bank" "to the people of the State of New York."

More explicit language could not be used; and it is impossible to assign any other meaning to the language used than that the sureties intended to be bound for the continuing security of the existing deposit.

It is not competent for parties to such an undertaking to allege that they were ignorant of the existence of a debt expressly provided for, or that they have been misled by the omission of the principals to notify them of its existence. Western N. Y. L. Ins. Co. v. Clinton, 66 N.Y. 330.

The rule applicable to the subject is well stated in Brandt on Suretyship, § 138, in the following language: "When the words of the condition of a bond are general and indefinite as to the time during which the surety shall remain liable, if there is a recital in the bond specifying the time during which the prescribed duty is to be performed by the principal, the general words will be limited by the recital; and the surety will only be liable for the time therein specified. The reason is that, taking the whole instrument together, it is but fair to presume that the parties had in contemplation only a liability for the time specified. It is a rule of construction adopted for effectuating the intention of the parties." See also Burr v. Am. Spiral Spring Butt Co. supra.

The conclusions reached on the propositions discussed necessarily dispose of all other questions raised by the appellants.

The judgment should, therefore, be affirmed.

All concur.

ERIE COUNTY SAVINGS BANK, Respt.,
v.
Caroline E. COIT, Exrx., Impleaded, etc.,
Appt.

1. A national bank executed a bond to secure deposits made or which might be made with it by the obligee, a savings bank. Certain individuals indorsed on the bond: "In consideration of the making of the deposits mentioned in the foregoing agreement we each and severally guaranty the performance of the foregoing contract by the" national bank; a similar bond between the same banks, which had been in force for some time, was surrendered on the execution of the new bond; after the giving of the new bond the national bank failed, having funds of the savings bank on deposit, the date of the last deposit being prior to the execution of the new bond. Held, in an action to recover such funds from the guarantors of the new bond, that:

   (b) That the surrender of the old bond was a good consideration for the new bond and also for the guaranty, and that it was immaterial whether the guarantors knew or did not know that the surrender of the old bond was in the contemplation of the parties when they became guarantors.

2. Where a contract of guaranty is entered into concurrently with the principal obligation, a consideration which supports the principal contract supports the subsidiary one also; and the consideration need not be expressed in the guaranty, but may be shown by parol.

3. An agreement by a savings bank to make deposits in an incorporated bank in this State is permissible, where the deposit does not exceed the limit prescribed by Laws of 1875, chap. 371, § 27; and an agreement by the bank of deposit to pay interest (the deposit being at all times subject to call by the savings bank) does not convert the deposit into an unauthorized loan.

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of Buffalo, affirming a judgment entered upon a verdict directed for plaintiff in an action on a contract of guaranty. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Daniel L. Lockwod, for appellant:

A guaranty of past indebtedness without other consideration than the subsisting debt does not create a valid obligation.

McLaren v. Watson, 26 Wend. 435; Westhead v. Sproson, 6 Hurlst. & N. 728; Morrell v. Cowan, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 151; 23 Moak, 477; Parker v. Bradley, 2 Hill, 584; Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 91 N. Y. 399–403; Pratt v. Hedden, 121 Mass. 116; Ellis v. Clark, 110 Mass. 389.

The defendants are not estopped from asserting and standing upon their rights, based upon the actual facts proved by any recital contained in the contracts. The defendants as sureties were guarantors with no benefit to themselves on a contract collaterally binding them for the performance of a contract between the principals, and for their sole benefit, and without any knowledge of the dealings or arrangements out of which it arose.

Brandt, Suretyship, § 32; 11 Md. 322; Morgan's DeColyar, Guiar. 179; Halliday v. Hart, 30 N. Y. 474.

A valid agreement to forbear the collection of a debt may furnish a good consideration; but forbearance only cannot.

Manter v. Churchill, 127 Mass. 31; Shupe v. Galbraith, 32 Pa. 10; Mecorney v. Stanley, 8 Cush. 85.

In the case at bar the plaintiff neither agreed nor intimated that if the contract was given it would permit the deposits to remain in the First National Bank.

The giving of this contract by the First National Bank in no way changed the rights or obligations of it or the plaintiff to each other. The indebtedness was wholly antecedent; nor was there any agreement on the part of either to the other to do or omit to do anything in the future as a consideration of the giving or taking said contract and guaranty. The plaintiff sustained no detriment whatever in getting it; parted with nothing; gave nothing; promised nothing.

Wood v. Tunnicliff, 74 N. Y. 38; 3 McLean, 388; Hopkins v. Logan, 5 Mees. & W. 247.

The plaintiff had no authority to take the guaranty of defendants to secure the payment of money deposited in the First National Bank.

The statute declaring the powers and duties of trustees in the management of savings banks establishes beyond question the want of power in the plaintiff to take the personal obligation of the defendants (the guaranty in suit) as security for the repayment of its deposits with the First National Bank, and that such taking was an illegal and void act; Bushnell v. Chautauqua Co. Nat. Bank, 10 Hun, 378; and is so declared by the statute.

Sess. Laws 1875, chap. 371.

Section 1, subd. 7, empowers them "To receive money on deposit and invest the same * * * as hereinafter provided."

Section 22 authorizes the receipt of money on deposit, "and to invest the same * * * as hereinafter authorized and provided, and not otherwise."

Section 26 authorizes the trustees to "invest the moneys deposited therein only as follows," naming the securities.

Sections 27 and 28 authorizes the deposit temporarily in certain banks, the excess of current daily receipts, and a sum for current expenses until the same can be judiciously invested in securities named in section 26.

Section 30 declares: "It shall not be lawful for the trustees of any savings bank to loan money deposited or any part thereof upon notes, bills of exchange, drafts, or any other personal securities whatever."

Section 36 provides for making semi-annual reports by savings banks.

Section 37 provides that the report shall state: "Amount loaned on the pledge of securities, with a statement of the securities held as collateral for such loans * * * the amount of cash on deposit in banks or trust companies, with the names of such banks and companies and amount deposited in each," but requires no statement if any or what securities are held for payment of such deposits.

Section 48 declares the deposits which savings banks may make a "lien for the full amount of money deposited" upon the assets of any insolvent bank after payment of its circulation. It makes no provision for or reference to any collateral securities held by the savings bank for the payment of such deposits, or the interest on such deposits.

The question in this case was not passed upon in the cases cited and relied upon by plaintiff's counsel: 13 Hun, 269; 18 Hun, 221. See also 21 N. Y. 490; 14 N. Y. 189; 15 N. Y. 9, 98; 25 Wend. 650.

Mr. E. C. Sprague, for respondent:

The defendants, having guarantied "the performance of the foregoing contract by the First National Bank," are estopped from denying its execution by the Bank after the plaintiff has acted upon the faith of and under it.

Brandt, Suretyship, § 31; Hoboken v. Harrison, 1 Vroom, 73.

So in the case of a guaranty of the payment of rent in a lease: "Entering into the guaranty was an acknowledgement by the guarantors that the lease was duly executed by both lessees."

Otto v. Jackson, 35 Ill. 349.

A savings bank must always keep large sums of money on hand to meet sudden calls and emergencies. The statute authorizes the depositing with other banks of the money so kept, and favors such deposits by making them a preferred claim against insolvent state banks.

If it was proper to make the deposits, it could not have been unlawful for the Savings Bank to protect itself and its depositors by procuring security for their repayment with interest.

Upton v. N. Y. & Erie Bank, 13 Hun, 269; Re Patterson, 18 Hun, 221.

"The guaranty of the payment of the bond by the defendants imports an agreement or undertaking that the makers of the bond were competent to contract in the manner they have, and that the instrument is a binding obligation upon the makers."

Brandt, Suretyship, § 31, 104; Remsen v. Graves, 41 N. Y. 471; N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; Simons v. Steele, 36 N. H. 73.

The facts, that interest is agreed to be paid on the deposits and that the payment of the deposits themselves is secured by a guaranty, do not change their character or prevent them from being deposits in the ordinary meaning of that term.

Upton v. N. Y. & Erie Bank and Re Patterson, supra.

The contract of guaranty was made at the same time, and written on the same paper as the contract which it guaranties. It is a part of that contract; and the consideration for the bond is a sufficient consideration for the guaranty.

Jones v. Post, 6 Cal. 102; Simons v. Steele, 36 N. H. 73; Williams v. Marshall, 42 Barb. 524; Lippincott v. Ashfield, 4 Sandf. 611; Leonard v. Vredenburgh, 8 Johns.* 29; Bailey v. Freeman, 11 Johns. 221.

The consideration need not be expressed in the guaranty but may be shown by parol.

Evansville Nat. Bank v. Kaufmann, 93 N.Y. 273.

In the present case the guaranty itself shows the same consideration as the bond. Any consideration, however slight, will support the guaranty and need not move to the guarantor.

Brandt, Suretyship, §§ 6, 7.

The request of the plaintiff for a guaranty and its subsequent acceptance of the bond was sufficient consideration for the guaranty. The guaranty was an inducement to the plaintiff to accept and act under the contract.

Brandt, Suretyship, § 9; Gardner v. King, 2 Ired. Law, 297; Jolley v. Walker, 26 Ala. 690; King v. Despard, 5 Wend. 277; Chitty, Cont. 11th Am. ed. 33.

Continuing to make the First National Bank a bank of deposit, and permitting the deposits to remain there, although they might have been withdrawn at any time, is sufficient consideration for the guaranty.

Chitty, Cont. 11th Am. ed. 35-40.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions involved in this case have been carefully considered in the opinions pronounced at the general term, and we shall content ourselves with a brief statement of our conclusions on the main propositions upon which the appellants rely for a reversal of the judgment.

First: it is insisted that there was no consideration to uphold the contract of guaranty. The bond and guaranty were executed concurrently. The principal obligation recites that it was executed by the First National Bank of Buffalo in consideration of deposits made or which might be made with said bank by the plaintiff, the Erie County Savings Bank; and the recital is followed by an undertaking on the part of the obligor to repay to the Savings Bank, on demand, all deposits which it has made or may make with the First National Bank, on call as required, with interest at 4 per cent per annum. The bond is executed under the seal of the First National Bank, by its president and cashier. The undertaking by the guarantors, which is indorsed on the bond, is as follows:

"In consideration of the making of the deposits mentioned in the foregoing agreement we, each and severally, guaranty the performance of the foregoing contract by the First National Bank of Buffalo."

The bond and guaranty were delivered by the First National Bank to the Savings Bank on the 8th day of March, 1882, in compliance with a request theretofore made by the treasurer of the Savings Bank to the president of the First National Bank, to furnish a new bond, with sureties, to secure deposits of moneys of the Savings Bank in the First National Bank. There had been a previous bond and guaranty, of similar character, executed in 1865, to secure deposits, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent; and from the time of giving that bond to January 17, 1882, the date of the last deposit, deposits were made in each year by the plaintiff with the obligor, payable on call.

Prior to January, 1882, three of the four guarantors on the bond of 1865 had died. In consequence of this fact, in January, 1882, the finance committee of the plaintiff directed its treasurer to obtain a new bond from the First National Bank, as a substitute for the old one; and the request for a new bond was made in consequence of this direction. Within three or four days afterward, the bond and guaranty now in question was delivered to the plaintiff, and the old bond was surrendered to the First National Bank. The latter bank failed April 14, 1882, owing the plaintiff the sum of $30,000 for deposits on and prior to January 17, 1882. This indebtedness has been paid in part by the receiver of the insolvent corporation, and in part by cosureties of the defendant's testator, but leaving a part of the debt still unpaid.

Upon these facts we are of opinion that the surrender of the bond of 1865 was a good consideration for the guaranty. It is a legitimate inference from the circumstances that the new bond was intended by both Banks as a substitute for the original bond, and no other inference is consistent with the acts of the parties and the circumstances. That this was the intention of the plaintiff is plain from the action of its officers. The finance committee directed its treasurer to procure a new bond as a substitute for the former one; and it surrendered the old bond within a few days after receiving the new one. There was no formal action by the First National Bank, showing its intention, beyond the giving of the new bond. But the new bond covered past as well as prospective deposits, and fixed a rate of interest more favorable to the First National Bank than the former one. The president of the First National Bank testified that the rate of interest was referred to in the conversation between the treasurer of the plaintiff and himself before the new bond was given, and that the treasurer of the plaintiff in connection with this subject said "It would be a good thing to have a new contract made."

It was in the interest of the First National Bank that the new bond should be substituted for the old one; and we cannot doubt upon the evidence that it was made and accepted as a substitute for the original one, and that the surrender of the old bond was in conformity with the intention of both Banks when the new bond was given. It is needless to cite authorities to show that the surrender of an existing security is a good consideration for a new undertaking between the parties to the surrendered obligation.

There being a good consideration for the bond between the obligor and obligee, it follows, we think, that the same consideration supports the guaranty, and that it is immaterial whether the guarantors knew or did not know that the surrender of the old bond was in the contemplation of the parties when they became guarantors. Where a contract of guaranty is entered into concurrently with the principal obligation, a consideration which supports the principal contract supports the subsidiary one also. We understand this to be the settled doctrine; McNaught v. McClaughey, 42 N. Y. 22; Haigh v. Brooks, 10 Adol. & El. 309; Simons v. Steele, 36 N. H. 73; Brandt, Sur. §§ 6, 7; and the consideration need not be expressed in the guaranty, but may be shown by parol. Evansville Nat. Bank v. Kaufmann, 93 N. Y. 273.

The claim that the question of consideration should have been submitted to the jury is not well taken. There was no substantial controversy in respect to the facts. The president of the First National Bank does not deny that he knew that the plaintiff held a bond to secure deposits when the new bond was given. His denial only goes to the point that he was ignorant of the precise form of the security.

Second: the other principal question relates to the validity of the agreement evidenced by the bond. It is claimed that the arrangement between the Savings Bank and the First National Bank was in substance an agreement by the former to loan money to the latter, contrary to the statute prescribing the securities in which investments by savings banks may be made. We think it is a conclusive answer to this objection that the general Act regulating the dealings and operations of savings banks (Laws of 1875, chap. 371, §§ 27, 28) expressly authorizes savings banks to keep 10 per cent of their deposits on deposit in any incorporated bank in this State, and that it does not appear that the deposits made with the First National Bank of Buffalo were in excess of this limit.

The fact that the Savings Bank secured from the First National Bank an agreement to pay interest on the deposit does not convert the deposit into an unauthorized loan. It would seem strange to make an act of provident administration a cause of forfeiture, upon a strained construction of the transaction. The deposits were at all times subject to call by the plaintiff.

There are some subordinate questions treated in the prevailing opinion below.

We think there is no error disclosed in the record, and the judgment should therefore be affirmed.

All concur.

1. Where the complaint in an action commenced by one as executor shows a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff not in his representative but in his individual character, descriptive words therein, such as "executor," etc., may be rejected, leaving the action to stand as one in the individual capacity of the plaintiff.
2. Where an indorser of a note has transferred it but is still liable thereon as indorser, and he makes an agreement for a valuable consideration with a third person to pay the note, the transferee and holder of the note may maintain an action against such third person on such agreement or promise, to enforce payment of the note by him.
3. The legal obligation of the promisee to the holder of the note will so connect him with the transaction as to be a substitute for any privity with the promisor or the consideration of the promise, and furnishes evidence of the intent of the promisee to benefit him and creates a privity by substitution with the promisor.

4. Where such note is subsequently retransferred by the holder to the indorser, the latter, having fulfilled such agreement on his part, may maintain an action thereon against such third person to enforce payment of the note by him.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, reversing a judgment of the King's Special Term overruling a demurrer to a complaint in an action to recover the amount of a promissory note. Reversed.

Statement by Earl, J.:

The complaint in this action alleges, in substance, that on or about the 27th day of May, 1873, H. Maria Litchfield departed this life in the County of Kings, leaving a last will and testament wherein the plaintiff was nominated executor; that thereafter on the 15th day of October, 1873, the will was admitted to probate by the surrogate of that county and letters testamentary were duly issued to the plaintiff as such executor on the second day of June, 1875; that on the 30th day of April, 1878, the Kings County Central Railroad Company made and executed its promissory note in writing as follows:

Six months from date, for value received, The Kings County Central Railroad Company promise to pay E. B. Litchfield, executor of the estate of H. Maria Litchfield, deceased, or order, $6,000 and interest, payable at the American Exchange National Bank, New York.

Kings County Central Railroad Co.
[Seal.] Per E. B. Litchfield, President.
Brooklyn, April 30, 1878."

That before the maturity of the note it was transferred and delivered for full value to one Frederick W. Foote, and that there was delivered to him at the same time twelve bonds of the railroad company, as collateral security for the payment thereof; that Foote was the legal holder and owner of the note and bonds on the 24th day of September, 1878, and on that day the note constituted a debt of the railroad company to him; that on that day a written agreement was executed between the plaintiff of the first part and the defendant of the second part, wherein it was recited, among other things, that the party of the first part was chiefly the promoter of the railroad known as the Kings County Central Railroad; that he and the railroad company were financially embarrassed and that he was incapable of further active exertions to resuscitate the railroad company or to manage the road so as to produce from it any profit or benefit; that the party of the second part was willing to examine into the affairs of the railroad company, with a view of determining what could be profitably done with the road, and, if found feasible, to make the attempt to produce some profit to the party of the first part from his interest therein; that the party of the first part placed in the hands of the party of the second part certain stock of the railroad company and transferred to him the interest of the party of the first part in certain bonds of the road preliminary to the agreement, upon which the party of the second part made certain advances in money to the railroad company and for which the party of the second part had and retained a claim against the railroad company; and wherein it was agreed that the party of the first part did absolutely sell and assign to the party of the second part his interest in the bonds mentioned, and that he would assign to any person the party of the second part might designate on demand the stock mentioned, and that he did thereby sell and assign to the party of the second part all his right, title and interest and claims and demands other than stock and bonds, into and upon the railroad company, and wherein, in consideration thereof the party of the second part agreed to pay in cash to the party of the first part the sum of $1,750; and further agreed that when his interest in the road, or in any road or roads he might choose to build in connection therewith, and in the security of the Kings County Central Railroad Company, and of such other road or roads was closed up, he would apply the proceeds as follows: Among other things, that he would pay with the consent of the railroad company, the debt of the company owing to F. W. Foote "for which he holds as collateral twelve bonds of the said the Kings County Central Railroad Company, provided said Foote will relinquish to him his title in four other bonds of said company now held by him; the said bonds to belong thereupon to said party of the second part, the said sixteen bonds to be at a price not to exceed the sum of $6,200, and the said reimbursement shall include the two foregoing items."

The complaint further alleges that this agreement was entered into by the plaintiff individually with the defendant, with the intention and purpose, among other things, of making certain provision for the payment of the promissory note mentioned, and the indebtedness of the Kings County Central Railroad Company evidenced thereby, and of indemnifying the plaintiff as executor from liability thereon; that the plaintiff has fully carried out and performed all the terms and conditions of the agreement on his part to be carried out and performed; that after the execution of the agreement the note above mentioned for value was transferred to and came into the possession of the plaintiff together with the twelve bonds of the "Kings County Central Railroad Company, so as aforesaid held by said Foote, and collateral security for the payment thereof, and at the same time the said Foote delivered to this plaintiff four other bonds of the said, The Kings County Central Railroad Company, then held by him and relinquished and transferred to this plaintiff his title in all of said bonds;" that thereafter, and on the second day of "November, 1878, the day said note by the terms thereof became due and payable, said note was presented at the American Exchange Bank for payment and payment thereof demanded and refused.

Whereupon, said note was duly protested, in manner and form required by law; and notice of the nonpayment thereof was duly served upon this plaintiff."

The complaint further alleges that the enterprise and adventure in the agreement mentioned had been closed up and finally terminated, and that the interest of the defendant in the railroad company and in the securities thereof had been closed up; that the defendant had received on account of the property transferred to him by the plaintiff, and as proceeds thereof large sums of money, and particularly the sum of $27,000, for the proceeds of a sale of the bonds and stock acquired by him, pursuant to the agreement with the plaintiff; and that the balance of such proceeds with the interest thereon, after deducting therefrom all the sums which the defendant may have advanced, expended or laid out in connection with the enterprise referred to in the agreement, directly or indirectly, according to the true intent and meaning of the agreement and in the manner therein provided, with the interest thereon, exceeded the sum of $6,200, and interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent; that the consent of the Kings County Central Railroad Company to the payment by the defendant of the promissory note mentioned had been duly obtained, of which the defendant had notice; that the plaintiff has duly demanded of the defendant payment of the promissory note, and at the same time tendered to him the sixteen bonds of the railroad company which had been held by Foote, and by him transferred to the plaintiff; but that the "defendant refused and neglected to pay the same, and still refuses and neglects to pay the same, although the plaintiff has at all times been and still is ready and willing to deliver to said defendant said sixteen bonds upon receipt of payment of said note;" and the plaintiff demanded judgment against the defendant for the sum of $6,000, and interest from August 30, 1878; besides costs of the action.

To this complaint the defendant demurred, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled at special term, upon the ground that the complaint stated a good cause of action to enforce a trust, and for an accounting by the trustee. From the judgment overruling the demurrer the defendant appealed to the general term of the supreme court, where the judgment was reversed, as appears from the opinion there pronounced, upon the ground that the agreement mentioned in the complaint did not create a trust; that the plaintiff seeking to enforce payment of the note occupied simply the position of an assignee from Foote; that Foote, if he had continued to own the note, could not have enforced payment under the agreement made by the plaintiff with the defendant, because at the time of that agreement he did not hold any claim against the plaintiff, and the plaintiff was not indebted to him or under any obligation to him. Upon the decision of the general term judgment absolute was rendered against the plaintiff, dismissing his complaint with costs.

Mr. J. W. Gilbert, for appellant:

The defendant's undertaking was to apply the proceeds: first, to reimburse himself; second, to purchase fifteen bonds of the M. A. & C. I. Railroad on account of the enterprise; third, to pay the debt held by the plaintiff; and fourth, to divide the balance with Litchfield.

The complaint avers that the defendant elected not to operate the railroad; that the enterprise has terminated; that defendant has in his hands the balance of the proceeds of the property, and contains the averments necessary to show that the plaintiff is the real beneficiary, and is entitled to have the trust enforced.

Barry v. Lambert, 98 N. Y. 300, 306-7; Gilman v. McArdle, 99 N. Y. 451; Martin v. Funk, 75 N.Y. 134; Day v. Roth, 18 N.Y. 448; Wright v. Douglass, 7 N.Y. 564: Young v. Young, 80 N. Y. 422, 438; Hill, Trusts, p. 63-71; Perry, Trusts, 95; Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 997-999, and cases in notes.

The defendant is liable to account for the proceeds of the sale of Litchfield's property. That is a good cause of action.

Marston v. Gould, 69 N. Y. 220; Belknap v. Bender, 75 N.Y. 446.

It is not sufficient to show that the particular cause of action indicated by the prayer for relief, or otherwise, is not supported by the facts averred. If those facts show that the plaintiff is entitled to any relief, the court can adapt the relief to the case, and the demurrer must be overruled.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1207; Hale v. Omaha Nat. Bank, 49 N.Y. 626, 631; Williams v. Slote, 70 N.Y. 601, 602; Mackey v. Auer, 8 Hun, 180, 182.

The facts averred bring the case within the principle that where one person, for a valuable consideration, makes a promise to another, for the benefit of a third person, that third person may maintain an action to enforce the promise.

Code Civ. Proc. § 449; Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N.Y. 268; Burr v. Beers, 24 N.Y. 178; Ricard v. Sanderson, 41 N.Y. 179; Thorp v. Keokuk Coal Co. 48 N. Y. 253; Claflin v. Ostrom, 54 N. The transfer of the note to the executor made him the beneficiary, the defendant's undertaking being to pay the debt and not a particular person.

Coster v. Mayor, 43 N.Y. 399, 411; Little v. Banks, 85 N.Y. 258, 263; Barlow v. Myers, 64 N. Y. 41; Simpson v. Brown, 68 N. Y. 360; Germania Nat. Bank v. Taaks, 31 Hun, 260, 264.

Mr. Benjamin F. Tracy, for respondent:

By the agreement set out in the complaint Flint became the absolute owner of the property transferred to him by Litchfield, no trust in it being created in favor of Litchfield or anyone else.

Flint's promise to Litchfield to pay the debt of the railroad company to Foote is a promise that cannot be enforced by Foote or his assignee, Litchfield, executor.

Ætna Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 92; Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 240; King v. Whitely, 10 Paige, 465; Merrill v. Green, 55 N. Y. 270; Cushman v. Henry, 12

The defendant, by demurring, did not admit the allegations in the complaint, concerning the purpose and effect of the agreement.

Bogardus v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co. 2 Cent. Rep. 150, 101 N. Y. 337.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are of opinion that the complaint states a good cause of action, and that the demurrer was not therefore well taken.

While the note mentioned in the complaint contains a promise to pay E. B. Litchfield, "executor of the estate of H. Maria Litchfield, deceased," the words quoted are mere descriptio personæ.

There is nothing in the complaint showing that the loan was made by him as executor and in no other capacity; and upon the facts alleged in the complaint, if Litchfield had desired to commence suit directly upon the note against the maker thereof, he would have been obliged to commence it in his individual name, and in that capacity he could have recovered. Peck v. Mallams, 10 N. Y. 509.

So too, although in the title of this action, after the word "Litchfield," the words "executor of the last will and testament of H. Maria Litchfield, deceased" appear, yet the action is the individual action of Electus B. Litchfield. The whole body of the complaint shows an action in his favor to enforce an agreement made by him individually with the defendant for the payment of the note given to and held by him individually. In such a case when the complaint shows a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff, not in his representative but in his individual character, the descriptive words may be rejected, leaving the action to stand as one in the individual capacity of the plaintiff. Merritt v. Seaman, 6 N. Y. 168; Stilwell v. Carpenter, 62 N. Y. 639; Beers v. Shannon, 73 N. Y. 292; Thompson v. Whitmarsh, 1 Cent. Rep. 4, 100 N.Y. 35.

We agree with the general term that this is not an action to enforce a trust, but simply to enforce the agreement of the defendant to pay the note held by the plaintiff, which is set out in the complaint. It is quite clear that under the authority of Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N.Y. 268; Barlow v. Myers, 64 N.Y. 41; Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, and other like cases, Foote, if he had continued to hold the note, could, upon the facts alleged in the complaint, have compelled its payment by the defendant. His agreement to pay the note to Foote was founded upon an ample consideration passing to him from the plaintiff.

At the same time the plaintiff was under a legal obligation or duty to Foote, by virtue of his indorsement upon the note which he had transferred to him; and his interest and obligation consequent upon his indorsement bring the case precisely within the rule laid down in Vrooman v. Turner, supra, in the following language: "A legal obligation or duty of the promisee to him (the third party) will so connect him with the transaction as to be a substitute for any privity with the promisor, or the consideration of the promise, the obligation of the promisee furnishing an evidence of the intent of the latter to benefit him, and creating a privity by substitution with the promisor."

It is true that the complaint does not very distinctly aver the indorsement by the plaintiff, of the note which was held by Foote at the date of the agreement. But the note was payable to plaintiff's order; and the complaint alleges that it was transferred to Foote, which in the case of such a note would imply its indorsement; it avers that payment of the note was demanded, and that it was protested for nonpayment and that notice of protest was duly served upon plaintiff.

It is also alleged that the agreement was entered into for the purpose, among other things, of making certain provision for the payment of the note and the indebtedness of the Kings County Central Railroad Company evidenced thereby, and of indemnifying the plaintiff as executor from liability thereon. From all this language we think it can be inferred that the plaintiff was the indorser of the note, while it was in the hands of Foote: and therefore the promise of the defendant became available to Foote, and the assignment and transfer of the note to the plaintiff enabled him as such assignee, standing in the shoes of Foote, to enforce the agreement.

But even if this were not so, the conclusion would still be reached that the plaintiff could enforce payment of the note. The defendant promised to pay this note upon ample consideration furnished by the plaintiff. He thus became bound to some one to pay it. If he did not become bound to Foote, he certainly did to the plaintiff; and the plaintiff having become possessed of the note, can, not simply as assignee of Foote but as a party to the agreement, enforce payment of the note. The plaintiff holds, not only all the rights, if any, Foote had under that agreement, but all the rights which he had thereunder as a party thereto; and there can be no doubt that he is in a position to enforce the promise the defendant made to him to pay the note.

Therefore the plaintiff having become owner and holder of the note, having procured the consent of the Kings County Central Railroad Company to its payment by the defendant, and having tendered to him the sixteen bonds to which he was entitled under the agreement, and the enterprise mentioned in the agreement having been closed up and terminated, the defendant having ample funds for the payment of the note, we see no reason to doubt that the complaint sets forth a sufficient cause of action and that the demurrer should not have been sustained.

The judgment of the general term should, therefore, be reversed, and that of the special term overruling the demurrer affirmed; and the defendant should have leave to withdraw his demurrer and serve an answer within thirty days, upon payment to the plaintiff of all the costs since the service of the demurrer.

All concur.

Village of SARATOGA SPRINGS, Appt.

1. A village which is constituted a separate road district and the trustees of which are commissioners of highways of the village, is bound to keep its streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe and proper condition for public use; and for neglect of such duty it is liable to persons who thereby, without fault on their part, receive injuries.

2. If the municipal authorities have actual notice of a dangerous defect in a street or sidewalk, it is their duty, without unreasonable delay to repair it; and when a street or sidewalk has been out of repair for considerable time, so that by reasonable diligence they could have had notice of the defect, such notice may be imputed to them.
3. Where one of the principal streets of a village had been open and used for about forty years, and its sidewalk had been laid out and used for the same time, and the village had assumed jurisdiction of and made improvements upon it, the jury are authorized to find that the street and sidewalk were dedicated to public use and were lawful.
4. Where, by the village charter, the walks are placed under the care of the trustees and the superintendent is bound to repair them, held, that money raised for the repair of the streets is applicable also to the repair of the sidewalks, and that the word "streets" in the charter included sidewalks.
5. It is not sufficient to exonerate the village that the superintendent had no money in his hands to repair walks, where he had authority to call upon the trustees for the same and it does not appear but that there were sufficient funds for that purpose in their hands.
6. A claim for damages for injuries received from a defective and unsafe sidewalk is not one which is required by statute to be presented to the officers of the defendant village for audit.
7. In an action for such damages, an ordinance of the village, imposing a penalty on lot owners for neglect to keep the sidewalks in front of their lots in repair is admissible in evidence for plaintiff.
8. Evidence that others had fallen on the sidewalk, at the same place where plaintiff was injured, is admissible for plaintiff.
9. It was not negligence in law for the plaintiff to attempt to cross a bank of snow and ice on the sidewalk, although such obstruction was visible.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming a judgment of the Saratoga Circuit entered on a verdict for plaintiff for $8,000 damages in an action to recover for injuries received from a fall on a sidewalk, occasioned by accumulations of snow and ice. Affirmed.

Reported below, 34 Hun, 607.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Charles S. Lester, for appellant:

I. If any duty rested upon defendant to keep its sidewalks clear of ice and snow, this duty was not created or increased by the passage of any by-laws or ordinances, as it is evident that no ordinance or by-law of a corporation can enlarge, diminish or vary its powers or duties.

Thompson v. Carroll's Lessee, 22 How. 422 (63 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 387); Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 251, 542, 620.

It is well settled that a corporation is not liable to an action for neglect in not enforcing any of its ordinances or by-laws, or for any neglect of its officers in that respect, and is not responsible for their violation.

Levy v. New York, 1 Sandf. 465; Hutson v. New York, 5 Sandf. 303; Lorillard v. Monroe, 11 N. Y. 396; Griffin v. Mayor, 9 N. Y. 458; Stillwell v. Mayor, 17 Jones & S. 360; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 754.

Neither is a corporation liable for a failure to pass any ordinance.

Wilson v. Mayor, 1 Denio, 595; Hutson v. New York, 5 Sandf. 303; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 753; Fowle v. Com. Council of Alexandria, 3 Pet. 398 (28 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 719); Hines v. Lockport, 50 N. Y. 236.

The judge, in admitting the several by-laws as evidence, in effect instructed the jury that they were material and proper to be considered, and that the defendant was at fault in not enforcing its by-laws, the enforcement of which would have prevented the accident. This was error.

Coleman v. People, 58 N. Y. 561; Baird v. Gillett, 47 N. Y. 186; O'Hagan v. Dillon, 76 N. Y. 170; Erben v. Lorillard, 19 N. Y. 299; Arthur v. Griswold, 55 N. Y. 400; Anderson v. Rome etc. R. R. Co. 54 N. Y. 334; Brague v. Lord, 67 N. Y. 495, 499; Worrall v. Parmelee, 1 N. Y. 519; People v. Gonzalez, 35 N. Y. 59; Enders v. Sternbergh, 1 Keyes, 264, 271.

II. It has been held that proof of former accidents happening at the same place is immaterial.

Sherman v. Kortright, 52 Barb. 269; Blair v. Pelham, 118 Mass. 420; Parker v. Portland Pub. Co. 69 Maine, 173; Hubbard v. And. & Ken. R. R. Co. 39 Maine, 506; Collins v. Dorchester, 6 Cush. 396; Hudson v. C. & N. W. R. R. Co. 59 Iowa, 581; 27 Alb. L. J. 115.

It has also been held that evidence of former accidents happening at the same place is admissible; but in all such cases the obstruction has been a fixed, permanent, unalterable obstruction, as:

An iron switch projecting above the pavement.

Wooley v. Grand St. & N. R. R. Co. 83 N. Y. 130.

An uneven sidewalk with permanent elevations and depressions.

Quinlan v. Utica, 11 Hun, 217; affd. 74 N. Y. 603.

A pile of stone which could not increase nor decrease daily with the weather.

Eggleston v. Columbia Turnpike R. Co. 18 Hun, 146.

A permanent water gate projecting from the sidewalk.

Burns v. Schenectady, 24 Hun, 10.

The evidence as to a previous accident by the witness tended to prove a cause of action in favor of the witness which would require as extended evidence as the case of plaintiff. The negligence of defendant could not be thus proved; and the admission of such evidence was error for which a new trial should be granted.

Dale v. Delaware etc. R. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 468; Hawley v. Hatter, 9 Hun, 134.

III. The court should have charged, as requested by defendant, "That if the obstruction was visible and apparent to any passer-by the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in attempting to cross it;" and "If the defect complained of was such as would be seen by any ordinary person passing along the street, it was negligence for the plaintiff to attempt to pass over the defect; but she should have gone around the same."

The rule is also well settled in other States that a municipal corporation is not liable for an accidental injury happening in the daytime, if there is sufficient space to walk which is free from ice.

IV. The place where the plaintiff was injured, although open to the public, was not in fact a public street over which the defendant had jurisdiction.

The owner could not by the mere removal of his fence impose on the public this strip of land as a street; nor could the public deprive him of any right or interest or control over it by that circumstance.

V. It is not alleged nor was it proved that this claim has ever been presented to or acted upon by the auditors of the Village of Saratoga Springs. The law is explicit that "Until such claims are presented to and acted upon by said auditors no suit or action in law can be maintained thereon."

Laws 1875, chap. 517.

The motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. A noncompliance with this requirement can be raised by the defendant at any stage of the action.

Reining v. Buffalo, 3 Cent. Rep. 294, 102 N. Y. 308; Minick v. Troy, 83 N. Y. 514.

VI. There is no duty on the defendant to clear off its sidewalks from snow and ice, because no power has been conferred upon it to raise and expend money for such purpose. The duty imposed by law on a municipality is only commensurate with the power conferred. Absence of necessary funds or the legal means of procuring them will excuse the performance of any duty. These are legal axioms.

Hines v. Lockport, 50 N. Y. 238; Weed v. Ballston Spa, 76 N. Y. 335.

The charter of the Village of Saratoga Springs differs essentially from the charters of those villages which have been held liable to keep their sidewalks clear of snow and ice. It contains a complete plan to compel owners of property to build, grade, repair and keep free from obstructions all the sidewalks adjoining their premises. It does not authorize the raising of any money by tax for this purpose, but by the clearest implication excludes it.

There is a recognized difference between streets in cities or incorporated villages and roads and highways designated in the general highway system of the State.

Re Application of Woolsey, 95 N. Y. 135; Re Lexington Avenue, 29 Hun, 303.

The uniform legislation of the State recognizes the fact that sidewalks are no portion of the highways, and that there is no authority to expend any portion of the highway fund for the construction of sidewalks.

The village superintendent testified that he had no funds in his hands for the purpose of cleaning off sidewalks. This was a defense and for this reason the complaint should have been dismissed.

Garlinghouse v. Jacobs, 29 N.Y. 297; Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N. Y. 113, 120; Hines v. Lockport, 50 N. Y. 236; Weed v. Ballston Spa, 76 N. Y. 335; People v. Little Valley, 75 N. Y. 316.

It will be found on examination, in every case where a village has been held liable for negligence in not repairing or removing obstructions from sidewalks, that there was some provision in the charter casting that duty upon the municipality.

Hiller v. Sharon Springs, 28 Hun, 344.

In Weet v. Brockport, reported in a note to Conrad v. Ithaca, 16 N. Y. 161, it is expressly stated that "It appeared that the defendant had ample funds to make and complete the improvement in question," and it was held liable on that ground. The case of Conrad v. Ithaca was for damages for negligently constructing a bridge; and the duty of defendant and its power to raise funds was unquestionable.

In Hickok v. Plattsburgh, 15 Barb. 427, reversed, 16 N. Y. 161, the main question was whether the corporation was liable for the negligence of the trustees, and it was held that it was.

Messrs. L. B. Pike and Charles M. Davison, for respondent:

The street in question was one of the streets or highways of the Village, over which it had jurisdiction and which it was bound to keep in repair. It had been used by the Village for more than twenty years, which presumes a dedication and acceptance by user.

Pearsall v. Post, 20 Wend. 115; Hickok v. Plattsburgh, 41 Barb. 135; Post v. Pearsall, 22 Wend. 477; Wiggins v. Tallmadge, 11 Barb. 457; People v. Loehfelm, 2 Cent. Rep. 874, 102 N. Y. 1.

This dedication cannot be defeated by showing that the owner of the servient estate did not grant it.

19 Wend. 309; 14 Barb. 511; 8 Pick. 504; 36 Vt. 503; 32 Vt. 183; 10 Fost. 446.

Whether there was dedication or not, as between the defendant and the abutting owners, is immaterial; the defendant treated it as one of the village streets; controlled it; paid for its sidewalks in scrip; kept it in repair, and at the request of abutting owners fixed the grade, and permitted it to be used; and by this made itself liable. No matter how the sidewalk came into existence.

Saulsbury v. Ithaca, 94 N. Y. 30; Requa v. Rochester, 45 N. Y 129; Sewell v. Cohoes, 75 N. Y. 45.

Sidewalks are parts of the highway.

Graves v. Otis, 2 Hill, 466–470.

The evidence tended to prove the actual dedication, acceptance and user, and that it was one of the streets over which the defendant had and exercised jurisdiction, and this court is concluded thereby.

People v. Loehfelm, 2 Cent. Rep. 874, 102 N. Y. 1.

The sidewalk in this case having been built, no matter by whom, the keeping in repair was a ministerial act, and not in any sense judicial.

Saulsbury v. Ithaca, 94 N. Y. 27.

The case of Urquhart v. Ogdensburg, 91 N. Y. 67, or as distinguished and limited in 97 N. Y. 238, does not, as defendant supposes, support the theory of the appellant, but quite the contrary.

The duty to keep the sidewalk in repair is imposed by the charter of the Village.

Laws 1866, chap. 220, § 25, subd. 23, 39, 43, 45; §§ 35, 36, 38, 39, 54.

The Corporation had funds; if it had not, it had the means of obtaining them. Proof that the superintendant had not funds in his hands is no evidence that the defendant had not; it was his duty to report to the trustees if he had not.

Charter, § 39.

The Corporation or its officers did not do nor attempt to do anything; and the defense of want of power is plainly an afterthought. The burden of showing want of means was upon the defendant, and this is not shown either by the charter or the evidence.

Weed v. Ballston Spa, 76 N. Y. 335.

The corporation defendant had constructive notice, at least, of the condition of the sidewalk. Constructive notice was sufficient.

Requa v. Rochester, 45 N. Y. 129; Todd v. Troy, 61 N. Y. 506; Kinney v. Troy, 38 Hun, 287.

The time in which the condition existed was for about two weeks or more; and the jury determined that this time was sufficient to infer knowledge of its condition by defendant.

Deyoe v. Saratoga Springs, 3 Thomp. & C. 504.

This court is concluded thereby.

Goodfellow v. New York, 1 Cent. Rep. 21, 100 N. Y. 15.

It was the duty of defendant to keep the street clear of this obstruction, keep the sidewalk in condition that the traveler might safely pass over it, no matter by whom or how the obstruction was placed there; and if, after actual or constructive notice, it neglected its duty, it is made liable for any damages resulting therefrom to a traveler whose own negligence does not contribute to the injury.

Y. 137; Hyatt v. Rondout, 44 Barb. 385; Hume v. Mayor, 74 N. Y. 270; Kinney v. Troy, 38 Hun, 287; Moore v. Gadsden, 87 N. Y. 86, 87, 88.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff commenced this action to recover damages for injuries received by her from falling upon one of the sidewalks in the Village of Saratoga Springs, on the 9th day of January, 1883. At that time snow and ice had accumulated upon the sidewalk on the southerly side of Lake Avenue, opposite the premises of one Andrews, until the embankment was about three feet thick above the surface of the ground, and two and one half feet thick above the snow upon the sidewalk easterly and westerly of the premises mentioned. While she was passing along the sidwalk over this embankment, she slipped down and received the serious injuries of which she complains. This snow and ice had fallen from time to time from the roof of a barn standing near the sidewalk, and had been there for at least two weeks.

Under its charter (chap. 220, Laws 1866) the Village of Saratoga Springs is constituted a separate road district, exempt from the superintendence and care of the commissioners of highways of the Town of Saratoga Springs; and the trustees are constituted and declared to be the commissioners of the Village; they are authorized to appoint a superintendent who is to have the care and supervision of the streets and sidewalks of the Village, subject to their general control and direction; they are empowered, and it is made their duty to establish such ordinances, by-laws and regulations as they may think proper and reasonable—among other things, to establish the grade of the streets and sidewalks, to provide for and regulate the paving, repaving and improving streets and sidewalks and the cleaning of streets and sidewalks as often as may be necessary; and ample power is conferred upon the Village and its trustees to raise money for the purpose of discharging the duties and obligations thus imposed upon it in reference to its streets and sidewalks.

That under such a charter it was the duty of the defendant to keep its streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe and proper condition for public use, and that for neglect of such duty it was liable for damages to persons without fault on their part, receiving injuries upon its streets, has been settled by many decisions in this State and is no longer open to question. Conrad v. Ithaca, 16 N. Y. 158; Requa v. Rochester, 45 N. Y. 129; Hines v. Lockport, 50 N. Y. 236; Todd v. Troy, 61 N. Y. 506; Evans v. Utica, 69 N. Y. 166; Weed v. Ballston Spa, 76 N. Y. 329; Saulsbury v. Ithaca, 94 N. Y. 27; Dubois v. Kingston, 3 Cent. Rep. 58, 102 N. Y. 219.

The rule of municipal responsibility as to streets and sidewalks is equally applicable to incorporated villages and to cities; and the same principles which impose liability upon the one class of corporations impose it upon the other.

If the municipal authorities have actual notice of a dangerous defect in a street, then it is their duty without unreasonable delay to repair it. They do not fill the measure of their responsibility, however, by acting simply when they have actual notice, but they owe to the public the duty of active vigilance, and when a street or sidewalk has been out of repair for any considerable length of time so that by reasonable diligence they could have notice of the defect, such notice may be imputed to them. So in this case, if all the other conditions existed for imposing liability upon the defendant, it is not claimed that the facts of the case were not such that the jury could find that the defendant had or ought to have had notice of the dangerous condition of this sidewalk.

But the defendant seeks to escape liability upon various grounds which will be separately noticed:

1. It is claimed that the place where the plaintiff was injured, although used by the public, was not in fact a public street or sidewalk over which the defendant had jurisdiction. But it is undisputed that this street had been open to its full width for about forty years; that it was one of the principal streets of the village, extensively used by the public; that the sidewalk had been laid out and used during all of that time; that water mains had been laid through the street; that the Village had assumed jurisdiction over it and that curb stones had been placed along the sidewalk at the expense of the Village.

We think that there was abundant evidence from which the jury could properly find that this street, for its whole width, had been dedicated to and accepted by the public, and that it was legally and lawfully one of the streets of the Village. Cook v. Harris, 61 N. Y. 448; People v. Loehfelm, 2 Cent. Rep. 874, 102 N.Y. 1.

2. It appears sufficiently that the defendant either had the means to clear this sidewalk of the accumulation of ice and snow or the ability to raise the means. By section 38 of the village charter it is made the duty of the village superintendent in the month of April of each year to report in writing to the board of trustees the general condition of "the streets, bridges, culverts, sidewalks, lanes and alleys with estimates of the probable expense to put them in good repair. He shall also within ten days prior to each annual village election report in writing to the board of trustees, the condition of the streets, bridges, culverts, sidewalks, lanes and alleys, with the probable amount necessary to keep them all in good order during the coming year."

Section 39 provides that "Whenever any repairs shall be necessary on any public street, bridge, culvert, sidewalk, lane or alley in said Village, the village superintendent shall attend to such repairs; and when there are no funds in his hands to make such repairs, he shall report the fact to the board of trustees, with his opinion as to the amount necessary for such purpose, to the end that the means may be provided and drafts drawn upon the particular fund belonging to the highway department to make such expenses. He shall be subject to the same direction and control of the commissioners of highways of the Village in the care and supervision of the public streets, bridges, culverts, sidewalks, lanes and alleys therein, and to the same penalties for neglect of duty as the overseers of the highways of the several road districts in the Town of Saratoga Springs are to the commissioners of highways of said town. He shall be personally responsible to the public, for neglect of duty, to the same extent as the commissioners of said Village.

Section 54 provides that "For the purpose of providing the means of sustaining the several departments and defraying the expenses of the Corporation, the board of trustees are authorized to levy and collect an annual tax in amounts and for the purposes as follows: 1. Not exceeding $7,500 for the support of roads, bridges, culverts, streets, lanes and alleys within the Village."

The claim on the part of the defendant is that because sidewalks are not mentioned in this last section, therefore there was no power in the trustees to raise any money for the repair of sidewalks. But in various other parts of the charter sidewalks are specially mentioned and they are placed under the care and supervision of the trustees, and the superintendent under their direction is bound to attend to and make the repairs upon them as well as the streets. The word "streets" is used here in its broad sense and was intended to include not only the road way for teams but the sidewalks for pedestrians. Re Burmeister, 76 N. Y. 174.

While it is made the duty of the Village to keep the sidewalks in repair, it would be quite extraordinary if there were no provision in the charter by which it could procure funds for the purpose of discharging that duty. We think, therefore, that the word "streets" should be held to mean the entire space between the outer lines of the streets, including the sidewalks, and that the money authorized to be raised under that section could be used as well for the repair of the sidewalks as of the road bed in the centre of the streets.

The only evidence given on the trial to prove that the Village had no funds to repair this sidewalk was the evidence of the village superintendent who testified that he did not have any money in his hands for that purpose. But there was no proof that there was not sufficient funds in the treasury of the Village which under the charter could have been placed in his hands and used for that purpose if he had applied for it.

3. It is further objected that the plaintiff's claim was never presented to or acted upon by the auditors of the Village as required by chapter 517 of the Laws of 1875. A sufficient answer to this objection is that it was in no way made upon the trial, and is not presented to us by any proper exception. But it may, however, be further said that the plaintiff's claim is not one of those which is required to be audited under that Act. The claims there referred to are clearly claims for expenditures made on behalf of the Village, or for services rendered for or goods or materials furnished to the Village. And this claim, therefore, required no audit.

4. Upon the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence one of the ordinances of the Village which imposed penalties upon persons who should throw any snow or ice from roofs upon sidewalks, and upon the owners or occupants of lots or buildings who should neglect to keep the sidewalks in front of their lots and buildings free and clear of snow and ice, and other incumbrances. The defendant objected, and the objection was overruled, and the evidence admitted.

In this we perceive no error harmful to the defendant. It was not held liable for failure to make proper ordinances, or to enforce the ordinance proved. So far as it had any effect whatever it would seem to have been beneficial to the defendant, as it showed that it had so far discharged its duty by passing proper ordinances for keeping the sidewalks free and clear of ice and snow. It had no material bearing in favor of the plaintiff, except to show that the trustees were aware of the importance of removing such obstructions from the sidewalks of the Village and of their dangerous character.

5. It is also claimed that there was error in allowing one of the witnesses to testify, against the objection of the defendant, that she fell down once at the same place where the plaintiff was injured. She was called by the plaintiff to testify to the condition of the walk, and testified that she recollected its condition; that the snow was packed very hard from falling from the roof of the barn; that the embankment at each end was slanting and that a person had to be very careful or fall; that she knew that to be a fact and spoke from experience; and then she was permitted to say that she fell there once herself. That evidence was given, apparently, to show how she came to know the condition of the walk at that place. But such evidence has been held to be competent. Quinlan v. Utica, 11 Hun, 217, affirmed in 74 N. Y. 603.

6. The evidence tended to show that this embankment of snow and ice was perfectly visible, that the plaintiff must have seen it as she passed over it, and that there was a light covering of recent snow over the ice. The defendant requested the court to charge the jury "That if the obstruction was visible and apparent to any passer by, the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in attempting to cross it;" also that "If the defect complained of was such as would be seen by an ordinary person passing along the street, it was negligence for the plaintiff to attempt to pass over the defect, but she should have gone around the same."

The court declined to charge as requested, and the defendant's counsel excepted. The charge of the judge sufficiently laid down the rule of law as to plaintiff's contributory negligence; and it would not have been proper for the judge to charge as matter of law that it was negligence for the plaintiff, under the circumstances disclosed in this case, to attempt to pass over the embankment. Evans v. Utica, 69 N. Y. 166; Brusso v. Buffalo, 90 N. Y. 679; McGuire v. Spence, 91 N. Y. 303; Bullock v. Mayor, 99 N. Y. 654.

We have now noticed all the objections to plaintiff's recovery which were brought to our attention upon the argument of this case by the learned counsel for the appellant, and we do not think any of them furnish a sufficient reason for the reversal of the judgment. We may, however, say that the responsibility cast upon cities and villages, for injuries caused by slipping down upon streets and sidewalks in consequence of snow and ice, is a very serious one. In this climate, where during several months of the year snow falls in large quantities and ice is from time to time created, it is quite impossible, particularly in villages, at all times to keep the streets and sidewalks in a safe condition.

In this Village it appears that there were seventy-five miles of sidewalks and but one superintendent having charge of all the streets and sidewalks. It is manifestly difficult, under such circumstances, for such a village to keep its sidewalks at all times clear of snow and ice; and the proof should be very satisfactory, showing clear neglect of duty, before liability for injuries caused by snow and ice should be imposed.

The evidence from which such notice could be imputed to the defendant as would charge it with negligence in not removing this embankment of snow and ice was very meager and slight; but we cannot say that it was not sufficient for the consideration of the jury. Indeed it was not claimed at the trial or on the argument before us that it was not.

Actions of this nature are becoming quite numerous; and they may well cause some alarm to those who bear the burdens of village taxation. But they must rely for their protection against unjust accident claims on the justice and sound sense of jurors, and on the power which the courts below possess to deal with verdicts which are excessive in amount or against the weight of evidence.

We, therefore, reach the conclusion that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur, except Peckham, J., not sitting.

George H. OGLE, Appt.

1. On the trial of an indictment for murder, the action of the officers in seeking for the prisoner after the crime was committed is admissible in evidence to show the flight of the prisoner.

2. It is not error for the district attorney, upon the cross examination of the prisoner, to ask him if he had been arrested for shooting a man, where his counsel had already proved the same fact by another witness.

3. It is not error for the judge to refuse to charge the jury in relation to the acts necessary for the corroboration of an accomplice, "that they must be inconsistent with the innocence of the defendant and which exclude every hypothesis but that of guilt."

4. The rule as to corroboration of an accomplice only requires a corroboration as to some material fact which goes to prove that the prisoner was connected with the crime.

5. One who had no knowledge that a crime was to be committed, and who neither aided nor abetted in its commission, is not an accomplice.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of General Sessions of the Peace on conviction of defendant of murder in the second degree. Affirmed.

The defendant was tried for murder in the first degree, the charge being that he stabbed and killed one James A. Brown, December 1, 1882.

The case on the part of the People rested chiefly on the evidence of Lawrence Rogers and John Hopper, whom the defendant's counsel regarded as accomplices or accessories.

Further facts, together with the questions raised, appear from the opinion.

Mr. William F. Howe, for appellant:

It was error to allow the district attorney to prove by the police officers what they did in seeking the prisoner.

Ryan v. People, 79 N. Y. 601.

This error was prejudicial.

Coleman v. People, 58 N. Y. 561; Anderson v. Rome etc. R. R. Co. 54 N. Y. 341; Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 184; Worrall v. Parmelee, 1 N. Y. 520.

There was error in permitting the district attorney to inquire as to a previous arrest and indictment of the defendant for shooting.

People v. Irving, 95 N. Y. 541; People v. Brown, 72 N. Y. 571; Real v. People, 42 N. Y. 281; Ryan v. People, 79 N. Y. 600; Crapo v. People, 15 Hun, 272; People v. Crapo, 76 N. Y. 290; People v. Gay, 7 N. Y. 378; Jackson v. Osborn, 2 Wend. 555.

The error was not cured by a subsequent question put by the district attorney, as to whether Ogle had been tried on that indictment and acquitted, to which the answer was in the affirmative. The examination shows that the district attorney seemed to be well aware of the fact that the defendant had been acquitted of the previous indictment; and it is therefore clearly apparent that the question was not put for the purpose of affecting the defendant's credibility.

People v. Brown, 72 N. Y. 573.

In each of the cases in which questions as to arrest and accusations have been held incompetent, the reason for such incompetency proceeded upon the theory that arrests and accusations proved nothing; that the person so arrested or accused was to be presumed innocent.

People v. Irving, 95 N. Y. 541; Ryan v. People, 79 N. Y. 600; Crapo v. People, 15 Hun, 272; People v. Crapo, 76 N. Y. 290; People v. Brown, 72 N. Y. 571; People v. Gay, 7 N. The court should have charged the jury as requested: That the acts necessary for corroboration must be inconsistent with the innocence of the defendant, and which exclude every hypothesis but that of guilt.

The court should have charged as was requested: That the jury is justified in requiring every fact sworn to by the witnesses, Rogers and Hopper, to be corroborated to its satisfaction; and if not so corroborated, it may reject such fact as not proven.

The admission of the question asked the prisoner, as to the shooting of a man in front of Miner's Theater, was not error.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Several grounds are stated by the counsel for the prisoner for granting a new trial, but we think that not one is sufficent. It seems, on the contrary, to be quite a plain case for an affirmance of the judgment. But as the prisoner has been convicted of murder in the second degree and sentenced to imprisonment for life, we have not only given full attention to the arguments advanced by his counsel, but in reference to the gravity of the case we will briefly state the reasons for the result arrived at by us.

1. The first alleged error consists in permitting proof of the action of the officers in seeking for the prisoner after the crime was committed. It was offered and received upon the question of the flight of the prisoner. The court decided correctly in admitting the evidence.

The crime was committed on the 30th day of November, 1882, and a brother of defendant was charged with its commission, and both were arrested that night. The prisoner was present at the examination of his brother, but was not called as a witness. The brother was subsequently indicted, but was finally discharged on his own recognizance as there was no proof against him, and at that time none against the prisoner.

Subsequently, in January, 1884, several persons were arrested and brought down before the district attorney, or some of his officers, and statements were made by some of them which led the authorities to desire the arrest of the prisoner.

The evidence objected to was then permitted to be given by the district attorney, showing what the officer did in order to arrest the prisoner; that he went to his house for the purpose of looking for him, but did not find him there, and also to a saloon kept by one Ogle (but not the prisoner, nor was it his home) and did not find him, and also searched the neighborhood or vicinity without success, and also made inquiries, but without finding him until September 6, 1886, when he was arrested in New York; and he then told the officer, as the officer swore, that he had been in Montana, Kansas City and Montgomery, Alabama, and that if the officer had not got him then, he "was going away tomorrow evening" and "I guess you would never have got me."

All this evidence was perfectly proper. The district attorney claimed that it proved that the prisoner had run away, and from that (among other things) he might ask the jury to infer guilt. If it did not prove flight, no harm was done. All that could be said was the People had tried to prove a fact and failed; but the evidence was so plainly admissible that no argument upon it is required.

2. The next ground taken by counsel for the prisoner to obtain a reversal, rests upon the fact that the district attorney, upon the cross examination of the prisoner, asked him if he had been arrested for shooting a man at Miner's Theater. The evidence was admitted under the objection and exception of the prisoner's counsel. Whatever the ruling of the court might otherwise have been, it is clear that no right of the prisoner was illegally invaded under the facts of this case, for his counsel had already proved the same fact in the examination of the father of the prisoner, who testified that his son had been arrested and honorably acquitted upon the trial of a charge for shooting a man at Miner's Theater, showing conclusively that the two examinations referred to the same transaction.

3. The counsel asked the court to charge the jury in relation to the acts necessary for the corroboration of an accomplice, "that they must be inconsistent with the innocence of the defendant and which exclude every hypothesis but that of guilt." The court refused, and counsel excepted.

In this the court was clearly right. There is not and never was any such rule as to corroboration. The whole law of evidence will be searched in vain for it. The authorities cited by prisoner's counsel maintain no such rule. The rule is stated in one of them (People v. Plath, 1 Cent. Rep. 772, 100 N. Y. 593), and is wholly different from the request herein made. It only requires a corroboration as to some material fact which goes to prove that the prisoner was connected with the crime.

Another answer is that the witnesses in regard to whom the request was made were not accomplices in any sense of the word. Neither was even charged with any crime whatever. The most that could be alleged was that one of them, after the crime was committed, had the knife placed in his hand, and he threw it under a chair in the ball room, to which he immediately returned after seeing the prisoner plunge it into the deceased.

There is no evidence whatever that either had the least thought that the murder was to be committed, or in any way aided or abetted in its commission. Even if the rule as to the evidence of an accomplice had been erroneously stated by the court, it was therefore wholly immaterial in this case.

4. The court was also asked to charge the jury that it would be justified in requiring every fact sworn to by the witnesses Rogers and Hopper to be corroborated to its satisfaction, and if not so corroborated, to reject such fact as not proved. The court left the question of the credibility of the witnesses under proper instructions to the jury. The charge was an eminently fair one, and all the legal rights of the prisoner were therein carefully and fully guarded.

The record reveals no error, and the judgment must be affirmed.

ASSESSORS OF the Towns of WILSON AND SOMERSET, Respts.

1. The provision of section 9 of the Act of 1880 (chap. 269), that the completed and verified tax assessment roll shall be delivered to the town clerk or other proper officer on or before the first day of September, is directory merely; and delay in so doing, which does not result in prejudice to one claiming to be aggrieved by the assessment, and which permits the roll to remain open for inspection in the hands of the clerk for fifteen days after notice, does not vitiate the assessment.
2. The object of the notice of the completion and delivery of the assessment roll required by section 9 of the Act of 1880 is to set running the fifteen days within which a certiorari may be sued out, and the omission to give such notice is not fatal to the validity of the assessment.
3. When upon the evidence under a certiorari to review an alleged erroneous assessment the question of value of property assessed is purely one of fact, it is not open to review by the court of appeals.

APPEAL from orders of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming orders of the Erie Special Term quashing writs of certiorari to review assessments for taxes for the years 1883, 1884 in the Towns of Somerset and Wilson, Niagara County. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised sufficiently appear from the opinion.

Mr. Edmund B. Wynn, for appellant:

In estimating the value of railroad property for purposes of taxation the earning capacity is largely the test.

People v. Pond, 13 Abb. N.C. 1; 92 N. Y. 648; People v. Keator. 67 How. Pr. 277; affd. 36 Hun, 592; People v. Weaver, 67 How. Pr. 477; affd. 34 Hun, 321, appeal dismissed, 99 N. Y. 659; People v. Roosa, 2 How. Pr. N. S. 454.

The return of the Assessors of the Town of Somerset for 1883 to the writ of certiorari obtained by the relator to correct the illegal and erroneous assessment of relator's property in that town, that year, shows, we think, a fatal omission of the duty imposed upon assessors by the Act of 1880, § 9, chap. 269, requiring that "All assessment rolls, when finally completed and verified by the assessors, shall, in towns, on or before the first day of September, * * * be delivered to the town, village or city clerk, or other officer, to whom such rolls are or may be required by law to be delivered; and there to remain with such clerk or other officer for a period of fifteen days for public inspection. The assessors or other officers who complete and verify the assessment roll shall, after they have delivered the same to the said town, village or city clerk or other officer, forthwith give public notice (by posting the same in at least three of the most public places in said town, village or city, or by publishing the same in one or more newspapers published therein) that such assessment roll has been finally completed, the officer to whom the same has been delivered, and the place where the same will be open to public inspection."

The assessment roll was completed the 29th of August, 1883, and the Assessors return "That we publish no notice of the completion of said roll or the officer to whom the same had been delivered, or the place where the same would be open to public inspection, except as herein before stated." The "herein before stated" is nothing, the return showing neither a posting nor a publication as required by statute; and that of itself renders the assessment of 1883 illegal so far as regards the relator.

Mr. F. Brundage, for respondents:

The writs should have been quashed for the reason that there was no proof that the relator appeared before the Assessors on grievance day, and availed itself of the statutory means of correcting the errors complained of.

People, ex rel. Osgood v. Comrs. of Taxes, 99 N. Y. 154; People, ex rel. Mut. Tel. Co. v. Comrs. of Taxes, 99 N. Y. 254; 2 R. S. p. 994, § 6.

The Assessors in their return say that they assessed the property of relator at its full and true value as they would appraise the same in payment of a just debt due from a solvent debtor. This was in strict compliance with the statute.

Railroad corporations are to be assessed in the same manner as individuals.

2 R. S. p. 990, § 6, and cases above cited.

Before the passage of the Act, chap. 269, Laws 1880, it was settled by a long line of authority that where it appeared by the return of the assessors that they assessed the property in the mode pointed out by the statute the court would not interefere with their determination.

In the valuation of property assessors act judicially; and their decision can only be attacked for fraud or excess of jurisdiction.

Their return is held to be conclusive.

People v. Mayor, 6 Hun, 652; People v. Fire Comrs. 73 N. Y. 437.

Messrs. Ellsworth & Potter, also for respondents.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The papers in four appeals from orders quashing as many writs of certiorari, and in another similar case not before us, are printed for our use with a disorder and confusion scarcely to be excused. With the aid of the briefs of counsel we hope that we have been enabled to understand and appreciate the questions sought to be raised.

The general term says that no questions of law and only questions of fact were presented by the appeals; but in the brief of the appellant we find three errors in the assessments alleged and relied upon as sufficient to vitiate the tax imposed.

One of these is that the Assessors of the Town of Wilson did not meet to hear complaints on the third Tuesday of August, 1883, but met for that purpose only on the 31st of that month; and that the fact appears in the copy of their notice marked "Exhibit II." The fact so appears in the printed copy of that notice; but a stipulation signed by counsel for both parties certifies that the date of August 31 is a misprint and should read August 21. The ground of objection, therefore, disappears.

It was charged in one of the petitions that the assessment roll of the Town of Wilson for 1883 was not finally completed and verified by the Assessors and delivered to the town clerk or other officer to whom such roll is required by law to be delivered on or before the first day of September, 1883. No proof was given on the subject, but the admissions of the return are relied upon. Those show that the Assessors met to hear complaints on the third Tuesday of August; that from that day until the 20th of September the roll remained in possession of Cooper, one of their number, "open to inspection;" and on that day was "left, completed and verified, with the town clerk."

The admission goes no further than the date of delivery to the town clerk, and does not show that the roll was not completed and verified on or before September. An extract from the roll is all that is printed, the printing of the roll and assessors' affidavit having been waived.

The delivery of the completed and verified roll is required by section 9 of the Act of 1880 to be made to the town clerk or other proper officer "on or before the first day of September." The return shows a delivery twenty days later. Such delay did not vitiate the assessment. The provision is directory, and since the relator had his fifteen days after the delivery to the town clerk within which to sue out his writ and did actually do so, we cannot see how it has suffered any prejudice from the delay. The town clerk returns that after its delivery to him it remained open for inspection in his hands for the required fifteen days.

The return shows that the roll, which we must assume was completed and verified on or before September 1, remained open to inspection in the hands of one of the assessors until the 20th and then after due notice so remained for fifteen days in the hands of the clerk. We should sacrifice substance to form, if we held that such a mistake vitiated the whole assessment.

The question under the Act of 1880 assumes a different form as it respects the Town of Somerset. Apparently the Assessors of that town never published a notice of the delivery to the town clerk at all. The sole object of that provision, however, appears to be to set running the fifteen days within which parties aggrieved may sue out their writ. Sec. 2.

If the notice be not given, the right to review by certiorari remains unlimited as to time. The fifteen days are not set running. The consequence of the omission cannot be fatal to the validity of the assessment, but leaves the door open for a review unlimited as to time. The assessment lawfully made and completed did not become "illegal" by the omission of the notice required by section 9 of the Act of 1880.

The remaining questions arise wholly upon the facts. An inequality of assessment was asserted. Evidence of the value of farms, largely in excess of the assessed values, was given on behalf of the relator, but met by an equal if not a larger body of evidence sustaining the official valuations. An overvaluation of the railroad was sought to be proved, and a body of evidence was given relating to its earning capacity, and tending to show that its value was over estimated. On the other hand the sources and accuracy of that evidence were criticised, the cost of construction was shown, the opinion of experts were given; and back of all that remained the observation and judgment of the Assessors.

Upon the evidence the question of value was purely one of fact. It has been reviewed by the special and general terms, but should not be by us. No legal error is disclosed by the record which warrants our reversal of the proceedings.

The order should be affirmed, with one bill of costs in this court.

Charles J. EVERHARDT, Appt.

1. Under section 399 of the Code, in order that there may be a conviction of a crime on the testimony of an accomplice, there is required corroborative evidence which tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. 3. On the trial of an indictment for forgery committed by uttering a forged check knowing it to be forged, evidence of the uttering by defendant of other forged checks upon other occasions is admissible to show his guilty knowledge and intent.
4. 5. Where the term of the court at which defendant was convicted was adjourned without day, no judgment having been rendered, and defendant not having applied for or assented to any delay except to the Tuesday following the day on which the verdict was rendered, and at the next term of the same court, the same judge presiding, the defendant was sentenced, held, that the defendant, not objecting to the delay, but moving for a new trial for errors committed on the trial and that judgment should be arrested because judgment was not rendered at the trial term, waived the delay, and was not prejudiced thereby.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of General Sessions of the Peace on conviction of defendant of forgery in the second degree. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. A. Suydam with James M. Brady, for appellant:

The corroboration of the accomplice was wholly insufficient. The additional evidence did not tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime.

Code Crim. Proc. § 399; People v. Courtney, 28 Hun, 589; People v. Plath, 1 Cent. Rep. 772, 100 N. Y. 593.

All the evidence in regard to the uttering of other forged checks was improperly admitted.

Stokes v. People, 53 N.Y. 164, 170; Rosenzweig v. People, 6 Lans. 462; Coleman v. People, 55 N. Y. 81, 90, 91; Copperman v. People, 56 N.Y. 592; People v. Gibbs, 93 N. Y. 470, 473; People v. Baker, 96 N. Y. 340.

It is contended, on behalf of the appellant, that, according to common-law rules, and by the clear interpretation of the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, judgment in a criminal action must be rendered at the same term at which the action was tried, unless there is a reason for delay arising out of some proceeding between verdict and judgment, and that such reason must appear on the record.

Mills v. Commonwealth, 13 Pa. 627; Rex v. Fletcher, Russ. & Ry. 58; Brown v. Rice, 57 Me. 55; Commonwealth v. Maylor, 57 Pa. 291; Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163, 174 (85 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 872); Lowenberg v. People, 27 N. Y. 336.

The repetition of the alias names in the hearing of the jury, against the objection of the defendant, was error and affected his substantial rights.

There was no necessity for using more than one name in the indictment, for section 277 of the Code of Criminal Procedure distinctly provides that an indictment shall not abate for a misnomer.

The two jurors were in all respects fully qualified to serve, except for the prejudice excited by this very proceeding of which the appellant now complains. They had been duly summoned, and the appellant had a right to their services; and their disqualification by reason of the action of the court in unnecessarily permitting the repetition of the aliases was error for which the judgment must be reversed.

Hildreth v. Troy, 2 Cent. Rep. 273, 101 N.Y. 234.

In the last cited case, this court expressly held that the erroneous exclusion of a juror was ground for reversal, notwithstanding that twelve competent jurors were afterwards found and impaneled. It will not be seriously contended that any difference exists, in this respect, between a civil and a criminal action. The first twelve competent persons are to constitute the jury.

Code Crim. Proc. § 387.

Mr. McKenzie Semple, Asst. Dist-Atty., for the People, respondents:

So far as the formation of the jury is concerned, the accused has a constitutional right to demand that it should be fair and impartial; but that right is not impaired by the exclusion of jurors, although never so impartial, so long as impartial jurors remain to try the case.

Thompson & M. Juries, pp. 228, 229; Grissom v. State, 8 Tex. App. 376–378.

The court, in the exercise of this discretion, may, of its own motion, and without assigning any cause, excuse any juror it may see fit to excuse.

Thompson & M. Juries, § 259.

The power of the court to excuse a juror for satisfactory reasons is not impaired by a statutory provision to the effect that the first twelve persons who shall appear as their names are drawn and called and who shall be approved as indifferent between the parties, shall be sworn and shall be the jury to try the case.

Atlas Min. Co. v. Johnston, 23 Mich. 37.

Proof of other previous forgeries was admissible as evidence in this case, upon the question of intent. Special intention to defraud was one of the constituent elements of the crime charged.

People v. Weyman, 4 Hun, 511; People v. Shulman, 80 N. Y. 373, note; Mayer v. People, 80 N. Y. 364, and numerous other cases.

The last point raised is as to the jurisdiction of the court to pronounce judgment after the expiration of the term at which the defendant was tried and convicted, where the defendant has not waived the delay.

Section 572 of the Criminal Code, as amended by Laws of 1882, expressly provides that "Any delay may be waived by the defendant."

Even if the delay cannot be deemed to have been waived by the defendant, and if the rendering of judgment after the expiration of the term at which the defendant was tried and convicted can be deemed a departure from the mode of procedure prescribed by the Code, or an error or mistake therein, it is not such a departure, error or mistake as renders the judgment invalid, or one which furnishes ground for reversal, for it did not actually prejudice the defendant or tend to his prejudice in respect to a substantial right.

Code Crim. Proc. § 684.

Such error or mistake was not available on motion in arrest of judgment, which must be founded upon some one of the "defects in the indictment mentioned in section 323."

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted in the Court of General Sessions in the City of New York of the crime of forgery in the second degree, committed by uttering a forged check knowing it to be forged.

Prior to his conviction one Gaylord had been convicted of the same offense, for uttering the same check, and had been sentenced to the state prison at Sing Sing. He was produced as a witness on the trial of the defendant, and testified that he received the forged check from him and was induced by him to attempt to obtain the money upon it from the bank upon which it was drawn. He was, therefore, an accomplice, and the objection is now made that his testimony was not sufficiently corroborated under section 399 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which provides that "A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice, unless he be corroborated by such other evidence as tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime."

Prior to the enactment of this section it was customary for judges to instruct jurors that they should not convict a defendant of crime upon the evidence of an accomplice, unless such evidence was corroborated; and yet it was the law in this State that a defendant could be convicted upon the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice—if the jury believed it. This section has changed that rule of law, and requires that there should be simply corroborative evidence which tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime.

Here, without referring particularly to the evidence of Schulken and of Caroline Gaylord, we think such evidence was sufficient to show some active agency on the part of the defendant in uttering the check, and thus to connect him with the commission of the crime; and that satisfies the law. Whether that evidence was sufficient corroboration of the accomplice was for the determination of the jury. The law is complied with if there is some other evidence fairly tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime so that his conviction will not rest entirely upon the evidence of the accomplice.

Upon the trial the People were allowed to prove, against the objection of the defendant, the uttering of other forged checks by him upon other occasions. In this there was no error. The defendant by his plea of not guilty had put in issue everything which it was incumbent upon the People to prove. They had no direct or positive evidence that he personally forged the check which he uttered, and it was open for him to show that at the time he uttered it he had no knowledge that it was forged and was therefore innocent of crime; and for the purpose of showing the prisoner's guilty knowledge in such cases it has always been held competent to prove other forgeries. Mayer v. People, and People v. Shulman, 80 N. Y. 364, 373.

Such proof is not received for the purpose of showing other crimes than that charged in the indictment, but for the purpose of showing the guilty knowledge and intent which are elements of the crime charged; and it can be considered by the jury only for that purpose.

Although the evidence of Gaylord, corroborated as it was, as to the guilty knowledge of the defendant, was quite clear and convincing, yet the People were not bound to rest upon a prima facie case, but had the right to confirm that evidence by the proof as to the uttering of other forged checks.

The defendant was described in the indictment as "George Hartman, otherwise called George Peters, otherwise called Mash Market Jake, otherwise called Charles Coke, otherwise called Charles McGloin."

Upon the trial of the action these names were repeated by the clerk in the oath administered to the jurors challenged, and the counsel for the defendant objected to the repetition of such names upon the ground that it tended to prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jurors; and he admitted and offered to prove that the true name of the defendant was Charles Everhardt.

The trial judge stated in reply that he could see no objection to the clerk inserting in the subsequent proceedings the name which the defendant asserted was his true name, and referring to the fact that he was indicted under another name. The defendant's counsel excepted, and again asked the court to instruct the clerk in swearing the jurors and witnesses that he should designate the defendant as Charles J. Everhardt, and omit the fictitious names.

The court replied that he would instruct the clerk to designate the defendant as Charles J. Everhardt, and would allow him to state the several other names. To this ruling the defendant's counsel excepted.

Thereafter, throughout the trial, at each administration of an oath the clerk under the instructions of the court designated the defendant as "Charles J. Everhardt, indicted as George Hartman, otherwise called George Peters, otherwise called Mash Market Jake, otherwise called Charles Coke, otherwise called Charles McGloin."

At each repetition of these names defendant's counsel objected thereto and moved that the defendant be designated by the name of Charles J. Everhardt, and not by the fictitious names. The objections were overruled and the motion denied and defendant's counsel excepted.

It appeared from the examination of some of the jurors that they were prejudiced by the fact that the defendant appeared to have so many different names, and they were excluded from the jury on that account; and twelve jurors were finally impaneled against whom there was no objection.

Section 277 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that "If the defendant is indicted by a fictitious or erroneous name, and in any stage of the proceeding his true name is discovered, it may be included in the subsequent proceedings, referring to the fact of his being indicted by the name mentioned in the indictment."

No material error was committed by the repetition of the fictitious names. While undoubtedly they might with propriety have been omitted in the administration of the oath to jurors and witnesses, after the true name was discovered and inserted in the indictment and other proceedings, yet, as such names all appeared in the indictment and in the evidence, it was not error to repeat them whenever it became necessary to name the defendant; and it cannot be assumed that any legal harm was thereby done to him.

After the jury returned their verdict of guilty the counsel for the defendant requested that the defendant be remanded until the Tuesday following, which was the 22d day of December, that he might then make a motion for arrest of judgment and for a new trial; and the court granted the request and ordered that the prisoner should be remanded until that day. The record then states that no further proceedings were had and no motion was made by either party during the December Term of the court; that afterward on the 24th day of December, 1885, the December Term of the court was finally adjourned without day; that afterward on the 7th day of January, 1886, at the January Term of the court, the same judge presiding, the following proceedings were had: the defendant being again led to the bar of the court, the district attorney moved for judgment, and the defendant being asked if he had any cause to say why judgment should not be pronounced against him, his counsel moved for a new trial upon various grounds mentioned, being for errors committed during the progress of the trial. He also moved that judgment should be arrested because, among other things:

"The verdict was rendered and the jury discharged, on the 18th day of December, 1885, and during the December Term of the court; and afterward, to wit: on the 24th day of December, 1885, the court was duly adjourned until the next term, by which adjournment the December Term was finally adjourned without day, no judgment having been rendered; and the defendant not having applied for or consented to any delay in the rendition of judgment beyond the 22d day of December, 1885, being the Tuesday following next after the day on which the verdict was rendered. And the court now holding the January Term, 1886, has no jurisdiction to render judgment in the action."

The court which pronounced the judgment was the same court which tried the indictment and in which the verdict was rendered; and it would be a sufficient answer in this case that no substantial harm was done to the defendant by the delay from the 22d day of December to the 7th day of January following. But upon this record it may fairly be said that the defendant, by not objecting, waived any delay within the meaning of section 472 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which provides that the time for pronouncing judgment after a verdict of guilty "must be at least two days after the verdict, if the court intend to remain in session so long, or if not, as remote a time as can reasonably be allowed; but any delay may be waived by the defendant."

Judgment in this case was postponed at the request of the defendant until the 22d day of December, to enable his counsel to make a motion for arrest of judgment and for a new trial. On that day he did not appear or request to appear in court to make his motion, and hence, he must be assumed to have been wholly indifferent to the delay, and to have consented thereto. There is, therefore, no reason for saying that the court lost jurisdiction to pronounce judgment on a subsequent day.

We have now noticed briefly all the allegations of errors brought to our attention by the counsel for the defendant, and believe that none of them are well founded.

The judgment should be affirmed.

All concur.

John E. O'SULLIVAN, Respt.

1. Although as a general rule it is improper upon the trial of a prisoner for one offense to prove that he has been guilty of another, yet, upon the trial of any particular crime, as rape, it is competent to prove, upon the question of his guilt, that defendant had made the attempt at some prior time, not too distant, to commit the same offense.
2. Such evidence is not incompetent because it comes from the complainant herself.
3. As a general rule, the evidence of a witness can not be corroborated or confirmed by proof that he stated the same facts testified to in court on some occasion when not under oath.
4. There is an exception to this rule in the case of rape; but where the disclosure of the rape by the person upon whom it is committed is not recent, as soon as suitable opportunity is furnished, the reason for receiving it in evidence does not exist.
5. Such a disclosure made nearly eleven months after the commission of the alleged rape, where there was nothing to justify the delay, held too remote to be received in evidence.
6. The want of an early disclosure of such offense may be explained by facts which show that it was impracticable or that it was prevented by circumstances consistent with the natural impulse to complain—as, when the prosecutrix is among strangers or when she is induced to silence by threats.

APPEAL by the people from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, reversing a judgment of the Onondaga Oyer and Terminer and ordering a new trial, upon conviction of rape. Affirmed.

The facts and question raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Ceylon H. Lewis, for the People, appellants:

The judgment of the supreme court states and certifies that the supreme court exercised its discretion in this case and refused a new trial upon the facts, and upon the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and ordered said new trial for errors of law, and not for errors of fact or as matter of discretion.

The case is, therefore, properly before this court for review on the questions raised by the defendant's exceptions taken on the trial.

People v. Poucher, 99 N. Y. 610; People v. Boas, 92 N. Y. 560; People v. Conroy, 97 N. Y. 72.

It is settled by a strong current of authority and by several cases in trials for rape, that upon the question of motive, disposition, purpose, intent and passion on the part of the defendant toward the object of his assault, evidence of previous solicitations and prior sexual attempts by defendant on the person of the same woman are admissible and relevant.

Whart. Cr. Ev. 35, 46, 49; State v. Knapp, 45 N. H. 156; Strang v. People, 24 Mich. 6; Sharp v. State, 15 Tex. App. 171; Reg. v. Rearden, 4 Fost. & Fin. 76.

The same species of evidence was admitted in the following trials for rape: Reg. v. Jones, 4 Law Rep. N. S. 154; Reg. v. Chambers, 3 Cox, C. C. 92.

And under indictments for assault, with intent to ravish.

In indictments for incest, previous acts of criminal intimacy between the parties charged in the bill have been held competent.

People v. Jenness, 5 Mich. 316.

In trials under indictments for adultery, in those jurisdictions where adultery is indictable as a crime, the State, after proving the alleged offense, has always been permitted to prove prior acts of improper familiarity and adultery between the defendant and the person with whom the adultery is charged.

The injured girl was permitted by the court to state the fact that she told Father Moriarty of the alleged outrage, but she was not permitted to detail the particulars of her disclosure. This was strictly within well settled rules of evidence in this class of cases.

The rule requiring immediate complaint is not inflexible.

Remoteness of time bears only on the question of fact, and it is to be considered by the jury in determining the effect of the evidence. The reason for the delay, as being under the control or influenced by the fear of her ravisher, may be taken into consideration.

Mr.* John C. Hunt, for respondent;

It was error to admit evidence of a previous assault on prosecutrix with intent to ravish. Evidence of another crime than the one for which defendant was indicted is inadmissible.

It was error to admit the testimony of the prosecutrix that she told of the transaction to the priest in Syracuse, more than ten months after its occurrence.

Baccio v. People, 41 N. Y. 265; People v. Clemons, 37 Hun, 580, 585, 586.

Earl J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted, in the Onondaga Oyer and Terminer, of the crime of rape committed upon Abbie O'Connor on the 6th day of May, 1884. He was a Roman Catholic priest in charge of a church at Camillus in Onondaga County. The complainant was a domestic, working for him in the parsonage which adjoined the church. She testified that she was at the time of the alleged crime about seventeen years old; but there was other evidence, apparently more reliable, that she was about twenty. Before she went to live with him, she resided with her foster parents, who brought her up from infancy, and she and they were members of and regular attendants at his church. She went into his service on the 25th day of January, 1884, and from that time forward, his family consisted of himself, Mrs. Doehner, his housekeeper, Timothy O'Sullivan, his man servant, and the complainant.

She testified that the defendant entered her bedroom in the night time and there outraged her. At that time, the housekeeper was in New York and she was alone in the house with him and the man servant. No criminal complaint was made against him until November, 1885, and he was not indicted until January, 1886.

Upon the trial, after the complainant had testified to the rape, she was permitted, against the defendant's objection, to testify that four days previously he made an attempt to ravish her, that she resisted him and that he failed. For the reception of this evidence the court at general term, as appears by the opinion there pronounced and concurred in by a majority of the judges, reversed the conviction, holding that it was incompetent upon the trial of the defendant for the crime alleged to prove any other crime committed or attempted by him.

We do not agree with the learned general term in the view thus taken of this evidence. It is quite true that it is a general rule of law that upon the trial of a prisoner for one offense, it is improper to prove that he has been guilty of other offenses; as, where a prisoner is put upon trial for larceny, or burglary, or murder, it is incompetent to prove that he has been guilty of other larcenies or burglaries or murders, or other crimes. In this case it would have been incompetent to prove that the defendant had committed or attempted to commit rape upon any other woman. But where a prisoner is tried for a particular crime, it is always competent to show upon the question of his guilt that he had made an attempt at some prior time, not too distant, to commit the same offense.

Upon the trial of a prisoner for murder it is competent to show that he had made previous threats or attempts to kill his victim. People v. Jones, 99 N. Y. 667.

Upon the same principle, it must always be competent to show that one charged with rape had previously declared his intention to commit the offense, or had previously made an unsuccessful attempt to do so. In this case if witnesses other than the complainant could have been called who witnessed the unsuccessful attempt of the defendant to ravish the complainant four days before the crime was in fact accomplished, no one would have questioned the competency of their evidence. And the evidence is not rendered incompetent because it comes from the complainant herself. It is not as valuable, or trustworthy, or important as if it had come from other witnesses. It probably did not have a very important bearing with the jury, because, unless they believed her evidence as to the principal offense, they would not believe her evidence as to the prior attempt. But it may have had some tendency to corroborate her story as to the principal offense, and thus may have had some weight with the jury. But whether it was important or not, there is no rule which condemns it and there is abundant authority to justify its reception. Whart. Crim. Ev. 35, 46, 49; State v. Knapp, 45 N. H. 156; Strang v. People, 24 Mich. 6; Sharp v. State, 15 Tex. App. 171; Reg. v. Rearden, 4 Fost. & Fin. 76; Reg. v. Jones, 4 Law Rep. N. S. 154; Reg. v. Chambers, 3 Cox, C. C. 92; Williams v. State, 8 Humph. 585; State v. Walters, 45 Iowa, 389; Commonwealth v. Nichols, 114 Mass. 285; Commonwealth v. Lahey, 14 Gray, 92; Commonwealth v. Merriam, 14 Pick. 518; State v. Marvin, 35 N. H. 22; State v. Wallace, 9 N. H. 518; State v. Way, 5 Neb. 287; Lawson v. State, 20 Ala. 65.

We do not agree, therefore, that the judgment should have been reversed on account of the reception of the evidence alluded to. But there is at least one other error disclosed by the record, for which we think the conviction ought to have been reversed.

As before stated, the alleged rape was committed in defendant's house on the 6th day of May, 1884. The complainant remained in his service from that time until the 20th day of August following, without in any manner, by speech, action or appearance, disclosing or intimating to anyone that she had suffered this great wrong. During that time she visited her foster parents whose place of residence was not far distant from Camillus, and saw them nearly every Sunday at church and at defendant's house, having full and free communication with them in defendant's absence. When she left the service of the defendant it was apparently not on account of the crime that had been committed upon her, but because he whipped her for some trifling offense. Then she went home to live with her foster parents and remained there until the 10th day of September, and then she went to Syracuse to work in a situation procured for her at her request by the defendant; and while living there, on the 28th day of March, she disclosed to Father Moriarty, a Roman Catholic priest, at confessional, that the assault had been committed upon her; and that was the first disclosure of the crime made by her to any person.

During all the time, from the 6th of May to the 28th of March, nearly eleven months, there was not a day when she could not have made a disclosure to some one. She was at perfect liberty to leave the defendant's house at any time, and she remained there of her own free will and consent. The only excuse put forth for the great delay in making the disclosure is based upon the following facts: she testified that after the assault upon her, she went voluntarily and without any solicitation of the defendant to his confessional and confessed to him while living with him, on three different occasions; and that on each occasion he asked her whether she had told anything about the assault upon her, and she replied: "No, Father;" and he said "God bless you, my child."

She also testified that while she lived with him he told her it was a sin to "tell on a priest," and that if she ever "told on a priest" she would go to hell or purgatory. She further testified that she did not go to confessional again until the 28th day of March, 1885, when she made the disclosure to Father Moriarty, and that she told him about it the first time she went to his confessional.

It may well be that the fact that this disclosure was made at the confessional under the sanction of religion, gave it additional weight with the jury. But we are of opinion that such a disclosure, made nearly eleven months after the commission of the alleged assault, was too remote to be received in evidence. There was nothing whatever to justify the delay.

It is a general rule that the evidence of a witness can never be corroborated or confirmed by proof that the witness stated the same facts testified to in court on some occasion when not under oath. Such statements, like all hearsay evidence, are excluded as unsatisfactory and incompetent. But there is an exception to the rule in the case of rape. The outrage in such a case upon a virtuous female is so great that there is a natural presumption that at the first suitable opportunity she would make disclosure of it; and she would be so far discredited if she did not make the disclosure, for the purpose of confirming her evidence where she is a witness, such disclosure may be received. But where the disclosure is not recent, as soon as suitable opportunity is furnished, the reason for receiving it in evidence does not exist, and the principle justifying its reception does not apply.

In 1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 632, it is said that "The complainant must make fresh discovery and pursuit of the offense and offender; otherwise, it carries a presumption that her suit is but malicious and feigned."

In 1 East's Pleas of the Crown, 445, it is said that the evidence of the complainant "is confirmed if she presently discovered the offense and made pursuit for the offender," and that "Her evidence is discredited if she concealed the injury for any considerable time after she had opportunity to complain." And the same language is substantially embodied in 4 Blackstone's Commentaries, 214.

In Baccio v. People, 41 N. Y. 265, the defendant was indicted for rape, and upon the trial the prosecution was permitted to give evidence that the complainant disclosed the crime to her mother twenty-four days after its commission; and the conviction in that case was reversed, on the ground that the mother of the complainant was permitted to testify in detail on her direct examination to the statements made to her by the complainant of the time and manner of the offense. Judge Woodruff, writing the opinion, said:

"I was at first inclined to say that evidence of any complaint made so long after the alleged injury, and espcially when forced from the daughter, by the mother, after her daughter had once declared that her injury was due to a fall, should not have been received at all from any person; the complaint was certainly not made recently after the alleged outrage. But in a case in which the fact of complaint is admissible, it is perhaps competent to explain the want of such early complaint, by facts which show that it was impracticable, or that it was prevented by circumstances consistent with the natural impulse to complain thereof, so far at least, as to destroy the presumption of falsehood derivable from concealment on the part of the female."

In the course of his opinion the same learned judge said that the rule admitting such declarations in cases of rape is an exception to the general rule excluding declarations made out of court by a person who has been or might be examined as a witness, and is properly confined within narrow limits; and he suggested that the reason for the admission of such declarations is "that it is so natural as to be almost inevitable, that a female upon whom the crime has been committed will make immediate complaint thereof to her mother, or other confidential friend; and inasmuch as her failure to do so would be strong evidence that her affirmation on the subject, when examined as a witness, was false, that the prosecution may anticipate such a claim by affirmative proof that complaint was made."

In Higgins v. People, 58 N. Y. 377, the defendant was indicted for rape. In that case it appeared that the prosecutrix arrived in New York an entire stranger, and having lost her baggage she was inveigled into a basement on a pretense of finding it, where she was outraged. Upon coming out into the street she met a woman who asked her what was the matter, also a policeman who took her to the station-house. To neither of these did she state the real offense; but it appeared that as soon after arriving at the station house as her excitement would admit, she stated the facts to the police captain. Upon these facts defendant's counsel requested the court to charge that "If the jury believe the prosecuting witness did not make prompt disclosure of the alleged wrong, it is a circumstance against her, casting a great discredit on her testimony, and tends strongly to disprove the truth of the accusation." This the court refused to charge, and it was held that, conceding the proposition to be entirely accurate, it was an abstract one, as there was no ground for saying that the disclosure was not sufficiently prompt, and that it was not error, therefore, to refuse so to charge.

Church, Ch. J., writing the opinion said:

"This proposition (which the court was requested to charge) is, doubtless, substantially correct, although it is quite general and somewhat vague. Any considerable delay on the part of a prosecutrix to make complaint of the outrage constituting the crime of rape is a circumstance of more or less weight, depending upon the other surrounding circumstances. There may be many reasons why a failure to make immediate or instant outcry should not discredit the witness. A want of suitable opportunity, or fear may sometimes excuse or justify a delay. There can be no iron rule on the subject. The law expects and requires that it should be prompt; but there is, and can be, no particular time specified. The rule is founded upon the laws of human nature, which induce a female thus outraged to complain at the first opportunity. Such is the natural impulse of an honest female."

In Connecticut a more liberal rule as to disclosures made by a prosecutrix has been adopted than prevails in this State. State v. De Wolf, 8 Conn. 93; State v. Byrne, 47 Conn. 465.

There it may be proved, not only that she made disclosures of the crime, but the details of the crime as she disclosed them may also be proved. In the two cases cited the disclosures were made after a much longer time than in any other case which has come to our attention.

In the first case the complainant was deaf and dumb, and the disclosure was made more than a year after the commission of the crime. But there she was prevented from making the disclosure by the threats and influence over her of the prisoner; and it was held that her mental and physical condition were such as to furnish her an excuse for not making an earlier disclosure.

In the other case the complainant did not make the disclosure until more than a year and a half after the commission of the crime. But, she was only twelve years old, and the defendant was her stepfather, and she was living in his family, and he threatened to take her life if she told her mother or anybody else what had happened. Under such circumstances it was held to be for the jury, in weighing her evidence, to determine what effect should be given to her failure to make an earlier disclosure.

It will be seen from these authorities that the very reason upon which the rule is based for the reception of such evidence, requires that the disclosure should be recent and made at the first suitable opportunity. But there may be circumstances which will excuse delay; as, when the prosecutrix is under the physical control of the defendant; when she is among strangers and there is no one in whom she can confide; when she is induced to silence by threats and is so far within the power or reach of the defendant that the threats may be executed. In such and other like cases delay may be excused, and the disclosure may be proved and all the facts submitted to the jury for them to determine what weight shall be given to the disclosure and what effect the delay shall have.

But here there was absolutely nothing to justify the great delay. There was no time after the commission of the offense when she could not have left the defendant's house. She was of mature age and near her friends, and saw them frequently. She was in Syracuse having access to priests months before she made the disclosure. It does not appear from her evidence that she delayed the disclosure from fear of the defendant, or from any influence of superstition, or from the apprehension of consequences to herself in this life or in the life to come.

We think the delay, under such circumstances, was so great and so unjustifiable that, as matter of law, the disclosure should have been excluded as evidence, and that it was therefore error to receive it. If this disclosure was competent, then no disclosure, however distant from the time of the offense, could be excluded; and all such disclosures would have to be received and submitted to the jurors for such damaging effect as they would allow them to have. A disclosure at such a distant time is of no more value in a case of rape than it would be in a case of robbery or murder, or any other crime. A disclosure in a case of rape has no legal value whatever, unless it is the natural result of the horror and sense of wrong which would prompt every virtuous female to make outcry at the first suitable opportunity.

Our attention has also been called to error in the charge of the learned trial judge. We have carefully considered the charge, and are constrained to believe that it was in part erroneous. But as we have reached the conclusion that for the error to which we have given particular attention the conviction was properly reversed, it is unnecessary to further notice the charge, as the error complained of is not likely to be repeated upon the new trial, if one should be had.

We therefore conclude that the judgment of the General Term should be affirmed.

All concur.

Edmund A. SAUNDERS et al., Respts.,
v.
Bernard REILLY, Late Sheriff, Appt.

1. While firm property will not pass under successive sales upon executions issued against the individual partners, it will pass under a sale upon a joint execution against all the partners, issued upon a judgment recovered for any joint debt whatever.
2. Tooker and Irwin were partners under the firm name of Tooker & Irwin, and were also, with others, partners under the firm name of Tooker, Arnold & Co. Plaintiffs recovered a judgment against Tooker & Irwin, and placed an execution thereon in the hands of the sheriff. Later on the same day one Jane Irwin issued to the sheriff an execution on a judgment she had recovered against the firm of Tooker, Arnold & Co. The sheriff levied on the personal property of Tooker and Irwin, and advertised the same for sale. The plaintiffs then having a further claim against the firm of Tooker & Irwin, not then in judgment, gave notice to the sheriff that as creditors of the firm of Tooker & Irwin they claimed application of firm property to payment of firm debts, and forbade any sale of the assets of the firm under Jane Irwin's execution against Tooker, Arnold & Co. Thereafter the sheriff, after selling enough of the firm property to satisfy the executions then in his hands against the firm of Tooker & Irwin, sold the balance of the property on Jane Irwin's execution, announcing that he sold the right, title and interest of Tooker and Irwin or either of them, in the property. Thereafter plaintiffs recovered judgment against the firm of Tooker & Irwin on their second claim, and issued execution thereon, at the same time instructing the sheriff to levy on any assets of the firm of Tooker & Irwin of which he had only sold the interest of Tooker and Irwin individually under Jane Irwin's execution, and stating that if he had sold under that execution any of the assets of the firm, then they required him to apply the proceeds of such sale to their execution. The property sold on Jane Irwin's execution or some of it was still accessible to the sheriff and ample to satisfy the plaintiffs' last execution if the sheriff had the right and was bound to seize it notwithstanding the prior sale; the sheriff, however, returned this execution unsatisfied, and plaintiffs brought this action against him for a false return. Held:

(a) That after the sale of the joint property upon a joint judgment, although the judgment was not recovered upon a debt against the separate firm of Tooker & Irwin, there were no rights legal or equitable left to either member of the firm in the property, and therefore no equity in the firm property to be worked out under them by any of the firm creditors.

(b) That the fact that the sheriff, when he made sale of the property on Jane Irwin's execution, announced that he sold the right, title and interest of Tooker and Irwin or either of them in the property, makes no difference; he sold all he had the right to sell by virtue of his execution, and if he sold all the right, title and interest of Tooker and Irwin in that property, he sold the whole of it and gave good title to the purchaser; he therefore had no right to seize any of their property again and sell it by virtue of plaintiffs' last execution, and his return was not false.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit on a verdict directed for plaintiffs in an action to recover damages for making a false return to an execution. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Henry Thompson, with Messrs. Vanderpoel, Green & Cuming, for appellant:

The only creditor that a sheriff, armed with process under which he is about to sell property, can regard is a judgment creditor or attachment creditor. A general creditor, who has sold the judgment debtor goods which are not paid for, has no claim to the property which the officer can respect.

It was the Sheriff's right, and it was his bounden duty, failing joint property, to levy upon and sell under Jane Irwin's and Smith Williams' executions, the separate or firm property of William T. Tooker and Thomas J. Irwin, which they owned, apart from the firm property of Tooker, Arnold & Co.

The levy having been rightfully made upon the property of William T. Tooker and Thomas J. Irwin, the sale of February 7 was right and proper; and the purchasers thereat obtained the whole title of the judgment debtors, Tooker and Irwin, and rightfully took possession of their purchases.

The case of Menagh v. Whitwell has no application to the present case, either in its facts or principles. The present case is a case of a levy on separate property for the payment of firm debts. Menagh v. Whitwell was a case of the seizure of the partnership property for the satisfaction of the separate debt of one of the partners; "A question," says Judge Story, "of a more complicated nature, and involving more conflicting rights, and the equities of their partners."

Story, Partn. 2d ed. § 260.

"Where one of two partners retires from business, relinquishing to the other all his interest in the partnership property, the remaining partner acquires the same dominion as if it had ever been his own separate property; the transfer being made in good faith, the title vests in the remaining partner, as his own private estate, free from any lien or equity in favor of partnership creditors, and such remaining partner may lawfully transfer such property in payment of his individual debts."

This exercise of dominion over the firm property by some member of the firm, in order to subject it to execution at the suit of a firm creditor, is indispensable.

v. Stauffer, 1 Penr. & W. 198; Coover's App. 29 Pa. 9.

Possession was rightfully taken by the purchasers of the property sold February 7, 1879. Up to the time of the sale, the partners, Tooker & Irwin, were in possession of and owned the firm property. Their right, title and interest therein, and that of either or any of them was sold. The purchasers succeeded to whatever title Tooker & Irwin had. That title certainly carried with it the right to the possession of the property.

See authorities cited supra.

Even if this had been a case of a sale by the Sheriff, of the interest of one of the several partners in the firm property under a separate execution against him, as plaintiffs seem to claim, the purchasers would still have the right to possession subject to account with the creditors of the firm.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant, late Sheriff of the City and County of New York, to recover damages against him for making a false return to an execution issued upon a judgment recovered by the plaintiffs against William T. Tooker and Thomas J. Irwin, who were partners under the firm name of Tooker & Irwin.

The action was put at issue by the answer of the defendant, and brought to trial at a circuit court; and the trial judge after the close of the evidence directed a verdict for the plaintiffs. The defendant appealed from the judgment entered upon the verdict, to the general term, and from affirmance there to this court.

The material facts are as follows: in January and February, 1879, William T. Tooker and Thomas J. Irwin were partners, under the firm name of Tooker & Irwin, carrying on business in the City of New York. At the same time Tooker and Irwin together with Julius A. Candee and Daniel Webster Arnold were partners under the firm name of Tooker, Arnold & Co., also carrying on business in the City of New York. In the latter firm Arnold's share was three twelfths, Candee's share four twelfths and Tooker and Irwin's share jointly five twelfths.

On the 16th day of January, 1879, these plaintiffs recovered a judgment against Tooker & Irwin for upwards of $800; and early on the next day they issued and placed in the hands of the Sheriff an execution on that judgment.

Later on the same day Jane Irwin issued an execution to the Sheriff on a judgment recovered by her for upwards of $7,000 against the firm of Tooker, Arnold & Co. The Sheriff under these executions levied on the personal property of Tooker and Irwin, and advertised the same for sale. The plaintiffs then having a further claim for goods sold to the firm of Tooker & Irwin, which was not then in judgment, gave notice to the Sheriff on January 23, that as creditors of the firm of Tooker & Irwin they claimed the application of the firm property to the payment of firm debts, and they forbade any sale of the assets of the firm under the execution issued by Jane Irwin on her judgment against Tooker, Arnold & Co.

On February 7, the Sheriff, after selling enough of the firm property to satisfy the executions then in his hands against the firm of Tooker & Irwin, proceeded to sell the balance of the property on the execution in his hands in favor of Jane Irwin. In making that part of the sale he announced that he sold the right, title and interest of Tooker and Irwin or either of them in the property.

On the 17th day of February, 1879, the plaintiffs recovered judgment against the firm of Tooker & Irwin on their second claim against the firm, which was duly docketed and execution thereon issued on the same day to the Sheriff.

At the same time their attorney wrote to the Sheriff that they required him under that execution to levy on any of the assets of the firm of Tooker & Irwin of which he had only sold the interest of William T. Tooker individually and Thomas J. Irwin individually, under the execution issued by Jane Irwin, and that if he had sold under the execution issued to him by Jane Irwin any of the assets of the firm notwithstanding the notice which the plaintiffs had given him, then they required him to apply the proceeds of such sale to their execution. That execution he returned unsatisfied; and that is the return which the plaintiffs complain of as false.

The property sold on the execution issued by Jane Irwin or some of it was still accessible to the defendant and ample to satisfy the plaintiffs' last execution if the defendant had the right and was bound to seize it notwithstanding the prior sale.

The claim of the plaintiffs, which has been sustained by the court below, is that the sale upon the execution issued upon the judgment of Jane Irwin simply operated as a sale of the separate interests of Tooker and Irwin in the firm property, and not as a sale of the corpus of the firm property; and thus no greater effect was given to the sale than if it had been made by virtue of two executions upon judgments separately recovered against Tooker and against Irwin.

The decision below was based upon the authority of Menagh v. Whitwell, 52 N. Y. 147. But we are of opinion that that case cannot be properly invoked as an authority for the decision made below, and that the principle there decided was misapplied by the learned court.

A mere general creditor of a firm having no execution or attachment has no lien whatever upon the personal assets of the firm. But when a firm becomes insolvent and thus it becomes necessary to administer its affairs in insolvency or in a court of equity, then the rule is well settled that firm property must be devoted to firm debts and individual property to the payment of the individual debts of the members of the firm. If one member of a firm conveys to a person not a member of the firm all his interest in the firm property, the purchaser takes no part in the corpus of the firm property, but only such interest as remains after the equities between the partners have been adjusted and the firm debts have been paid and satisfied; so too it was decided by the case above cited that if all the members of a firm should severally convey to different persons each his interest in the firm property, the persons so purchasing, would not take any of the corpus of the firm property but only the interest of each partner after the firm debts were paid, and the equities between the partners adjusted.

It is also settled that it would be a fraud upon firm creditors for a member of a firm to take firm property and apply it upon his individual debts, or for the firm to take firm property and apply it upon the individual debts of any member of the firm. Ransom v. Van Deventer, 41 Barb. 307; Wilson v. Robertson, 21 N. Y. 587.

But one of two partners may transfer all of his interest in the partnership property to his copartner; and the purchasing partner will be vested with the absolute title to the corpus of all the partnership property, as if it had always belonged to him; Stanton v. Westover, 2 Cent. Rep. 139, 101 N.Y. 265; and all the members of a firm may sell the partnership property, even if wholly insolvent, to a purchaser in good faith, and thus convey, free from the claim of firm creditors, a good title to the firm property. Instead of selling for cash they may transfer firm property to pay a firm debt. And they may transfer the firm property to pay a joint debt for which they are jointly liable outside of the business of the firm; and the joint creditor will obtain a good title to the firm property. Therefore, while firm property will not pass under successive sales upon executions issued against the individual partners, we can see no reason to doubt that such property will pass under a sale upon a joint execution against all the partners, issued upon a judgment recovered for any joint debt whatever.

Upon the facts of this case it is entirely clear that Tooker and Irwin could have taken their firm property and applied it upon this joint judgment against them; and inasmuch as they had the power and right to do that, they could have turned it out to the Sheriff when he came with the joint execution against them; and as they could have turned it out upon the debt before judgment, or upon the execution after judgment, there can be no reason to doubt that the Sheriff could take and sell it upon the execution, free from the claim of their firm creditors.

After this sale of the firm property upon a joint judgment against both members of the firm, no equity was left in either member of the firm, to have the property thereafter applied in discharge of the firm debts. Having been applied in discharge of the joint debt against both members of the firm, all the equities of both members in the property, as against each other was wiped out; and it is only through the equity which one member of a firm has in the firm property or against his copartners that firm creditors, on the principle of subrogation, can enforce their claims against the firm property. And so, in effect, it was held in the case of Menagh v. Whitwell, and Stanton v. Westover, supra.

In 3 Kent's Commentaries, 65, it is said that "Creditors have no lien upon the partnership effects for their debts. Their equity is the equity of the partners operating to the payment of the partnership debts."

In Kirby v. Schoonmaker, 3 Barb. Ch. 46, it was said by the chancellor: "The copartners, however, have certain equitable rights between themselves arising out of the copartnership, by which either can compel the other to have all the effects of the firm applied in the first place to the payment of the debts due from them as copartners. And this, as is said in the books, gives the joint creditors a quasi equitable lien upon the property of the firm to be worked out through the medium of the equity of the copartners as between themselves and with their assent; or, at least with the assent of one of them."

In Case v. Beauregard, 99 U. S. 119 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 370], Mr. Justice Strong said: "No doubt the effects of a partnership belong to it so long as it continues in existence, and not to the individuals who compose the firm. The right of each partner extends only to a share of what may remain after payment of the debts of the firm and the settlement of its accounts. Growing out of this right, or rather included in it, is the right to have the partnership property applied to the payment of the partnership debts in preference to those of any individual partner. This is an equity the partners have as between themselves; and in certain circumstances it inures to the benefit of the creditors of the firm. They are said to have a privilege or preference, sometimes loosely denominated a lien, to have the debts due to them paid out of the assets of the firm in course of liquidation, to the exclusion of the creditors of the several members of the firm. Their equity, however, is a derivative one. It is not held or enforceable in their own right. It is practically a subrogation to the equity of the individual partner, to be made effective only through him. Hence, if he is not in a condition to enforce it, the creditors of the firm cannot be. * * * But so long as the equity of the partner remains in him, so long as he retains an interest in the firm assets, as a partner, a court of equity will allow the creditors of the firm to avail themselves of his equity and enforce, through it, the application of those assets primarily to payment of the debts due them, whenever the property comes under its administration."

In Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, 106 U. S. 648 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 211], Mr. Justice Matthews said: "The legal right of a partnership creditor, to subject the partnership property to the payment of his debt, consists simply in the right to reduce his claim to judgment, and to sell the goods of his debtors on execution. His right to appropriate the partnership property specifically to the payment of his debt, in equity, in preference to creditors of an individual partner is derived through the other partner, whose original right it is to have the partnership assets applied to the payment of partnership obligations; and this equity of the creditor subsists as long as that of the partner through which it is derived remains; that is, so long as the partner himself retains an interest in the firm assets, as a partner, a court of equity will allow the creditors of the firm to avail themselves of his equity and enforce through it the application of those assets primarily to payment of the debts due them whenever the property comes under its administration.

Therefore, after the sale of the joint property upon a joint judgment, although the judgment was not recovered upon a debt against the separate firm of Tooker & Irwin there were no rights, legal or equitable, left to either member of the firm, in the property, and therefore no equity in the firm property to be worked out under them by any of the firm creditors.

The statute (Code, § 1369) requires the sheriff to satisfy an execution against property "out of the personal property of the judgment debtor;" and if sufficient personal property cannot be found, then out of the real property belonging to him.

There is no statute or rule of law which requires the sheriff to satisfy a joint execution out of the joint property of the execution debtors, or out of the separate property of each debtor. He may satisfy such an execution out of the joint property, or out of the separate property of any one or more of the debtors.

In 1 Lindley on Partnership, 515, it is said that "Although the writ of execution on a joint judgment must be joint in form, it may be levied upon all, or any one or more of the persons named in it;" and that "The consequence of this is that the sheriff may execute a writ issued against several partners jointly, either on their joint property, or on the separate property of any one or more of them, or both on their joint or their respective separate property; and so long as there is within the sheriff's bailiwick any property of the partners, or any of them, a return of nulla bona is improper." And these rules have now been embodied in section 1935 of the Code.

As between themselves Tooker and Irwin were jointly liable for the debts of Tooker, Arnold & Co.; and neither can complain that their joint property has been taken to satisfy such joint liability.

The fact that the Sheriff, when he made the sale of this property on the execution in favor of Jane Irwin, announced that he sold the right, title and interest of Tooker and Irwin or either of them in the property can make no difference. He sold all he had the right to sell by virtue of his execution; and if he sold all the right, title and interest of Tooker and Irwin in that property, he sold the whole of it, and gave good title to the purchaser. He, therefore, had no right to seize any of that property again and sell it by virtue of the plaintiffs' execution; and his return was not false.

The general denial contained in the defendant's answer put in issue the material allegations of the complaint, and was sufficient to authorize the defense asserted by the defendant.

The judgment should, therefore, be reversed and a new trial granted; costs to abide event.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Jefferson Circuit Court on a verdict directed for plaintiff in an action to recover possession of ten coupon notes. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Delos McCurdy with Messrs. Robert S. Green, and A. J. Vanderpoel, for appellant:

These notes lacked no formalities required by law to make a valid obligation of a Corporation. If the paper has in fact been authorized by the Company, as was the case here, the omission of one or more officers to certify the promise cannot affect its validity. The only existing rule is that the name of the corporation shall appear in the body of the instrument as the contracting party, and that it is signed by some officer or agent of the company.

Gottfried v. Miller, 104 U. S. 527 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 853).

There was no by-law of the Company bearing upon the execution of the obligations of the Company.

We insist that even if there was a by-law requiring the president to sign and the Company issued its coupon notes without such a signature and they came into the hands of a bona fide holder for value, the omission could not successfully be urged as a defense. As to the defendant in this case, the notes would be valid, notwithstanding such by-law.

Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 370; Flint v. Pierce, 99 Mass. 68; Samuel v. Holliday, 1 Woolw. 400; Mechanics etc. Bank v. Smith, 19 Johns. 115; Martino v. Commerce Fire Ins. Co. 15 Jones & S. 520.

These were negotiable notes. The test of negotiability is whether the paper is in form one the title to which will pass by delivery or indorsement, and give the holder a complete cause of action.

The intent of the party putting them on the market (that they shall pass by delivery) is largely controlling; and former rules as to form are being disregarded.

Dinsmore v. Duncan, 57 N. Y. 573; Mercer Co. v. Hackett, 1 Wall. 83 (68 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 548); Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 206 (68 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 526).

The incompleteness of these notes did not affect their negotiability.

It will be observed that the name of Norris Winslow is wanting, both as payee and as president. It is not and cannot be urged that the failure to fill in his name as payee affects injuriously the negotiability of the note, or the liability of the Company upon it.

Crutchley v. Clarance, 2 Maule & S. 90; Dinsmore v. Duncan, 57 N. Y. 573; White v. Vt. & Mass. R. R. Co. 21 How. 575 (62 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 221); Hubbard v. N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 36 Barb. 286; Dutchess Co. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hachfield, 4 Thomp. & C. 158; Boyd v. Kennedy, 9 Vroom, 146.

The above cases all hold that the issue of a note with name of payee in blank will not destroy its negotiability.

The rule has also been applied to cases of named omissions in the following cases:

Amount, date and time of payment blank; Russell v. Langstaffe, 2 Doug. K. B. 514; Androscoggin Bank v. Kimball, 10 Cush. 373; Davidson v. Lanier, 4 Wall. 447 (71 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 377).

Mr. Francis Kernan, for respondent:

Where the principal confers power or authority to execute an instrument on two or more persons, all must unite in executing it. An execution by one of them is not sufficient. This is the settled law, and it is a wise rule, especially as to private corporations, to guard against frauds.

The several coupon notes or bonds were not executed for or on behalf of the plaintiff, as they were to be required to be by the resolutions which alone authorized them to be made and issued. Neither of them was signed by Winslow as president, or guarantied by him individually. This was expressly required by the plaintiff to make them completed instruments.

The notes being incompleted instruments and this appearing on their face, the Trust Company did not acquire title to them as against the plaintiff.

Actual notice of the defect is not required, where the evidence of the infirmity consists of matter apparent on the face of the instrument.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 789.

The Trust Company was not authorized by its charter to invest or loan its capital or its trust funds in or upon these promissory notes of the plaintiff. It was illegal for it to do so. Its charter prescribed and directed the securities in which it might invest its capital and upon which it might loan its trust funds. Promissory notes are not such securities.

The plaintiff had a right to have the value of the notes found, that it might have judgment for the recovery of the possession of the notes from the defendant, or, if they were not delivered to the plaintiff, to recover the value thereof.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case were practically undisputed, and upon the trial a verdict was ordered by the court for the plaintiff, for seven of the ten notes claimed by it. The general term affirmed the judgment, and the defendant appeals from such affirmance to this court.

The questions presented by the appeal are substantially embraced in two propositions, viz.: 1, whether the notes in suit were negotiable paper entitling a bona fide purchaser thereof to hold them as against the true owner, and 2, whether in case of a recovery by the plaintiff the jury was authorized to assess their value at the amount appearing to be due upon their face or at a nominal sum only.

The plaintiff sought to recover what purported to be nine promissory notes of the Davis Sewing Machine Company of Watertown, for $1,000 each, with collateral guaranty and interest coupons attached, payable November 1, 1876, and one similar note payable February 1, 1880, each of which was made upon a printed blank of similar form.

Three of these instruments appeared to be complete in form with all the blanks properly filled except the payee's name, and were duly signed by the president and treasurer of the plaintiff company. The remaining seven notes were in the same form, except that they were not signed by the president, although a blank space with a diagonally ruled line with the title of his office printed thereunder was apparently left at the foot of each instrument for such signature.

The National Trust Company was a banking institution located in the City of New York, and had been, previous to this transaction, largely engaged in the business of buying, selling and negotiating similar obligations for the plaintiff and its agents, and which had theretofore been uniformly signed by both the plaintiff's treasurer and president.

In September, 1875, a contract was made between the plaintiff and one Winslow, whereby the latter agreed that if the plaintiff would make ten bonds of $1,000 each, payable in short time with coupons for interest attached, properly guarantied, he would negotiate them in the market at par for the plaintiff at a compensation of 1 per cent upon the amount received. Accordingly, the following resolution was adopted on September 14, 1875, by the plaintiff's directors, and the notes in suit were issued thereunder:

"Resolved, That the treasurer be instructed to have signed, and negotiate $10,000 of bonds, due November 1, 1876, at ninety-nine cents with Mr. N. Winslow * * * have such bonds signed as may be necessary to make up the amount required."

According to the directions contained in the resolution, the treasurer filled up the notes above described and procured them to be signed by all of the parties whose signatures were required to be affixed thereto, except that of Winslow, as president and guarantor, and delivered them to Winslow to be signed and disposed of as agreed.

Instead of selling the notes Winslow placed them with other notes of the plaintiff amounting to $10,000 then belonging to the Security Bank of Watertown, and hypothecated them with the National Trust Company of New York for a loan of $10,000, for the benefit of the Security Bank.

Subsequently the Security Bank repaid the Trust Company $5,000 of such loan and required the notes belonging to it to be returned, leaving the notes in suit in the possession of the Trust Company, as security for the unpaid balance of the loan.

Upon the discovery of the conversion by Winslow of its notes the plaintiff demanded them from the defendant, who had then been appointed receiver of the Trust Company and had possession of all its assets; and upon his refusal to surrender them brought replevin for their recovery, demanding the usual relief.

It is not seriously questioned that the notes were unlawfully converted by Winslow and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover their possession, unless the Trust Company became the bona fide holder thereof, by virtue of its purchase from the Security Bank.

Winslow could not, as against the plaintiff, have retained possession of the notes, except for the purpose of executing the authority conferred upon him in accordance with its terms; neither could his transferee acquire any better title than he, except by a purchase for value without notice of the facts invalidating the title or right to their possession. Decker v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. 313; Comstock v. Hier, 73 N. Y. 273; Fairbanks v. Sargent, 5 Cent. Rep. 919.

It therefore becomes necessary to inquire whether the Trust Company received them charged with knowledge of their invalidity, or Winslow's want of authority to pledge them for a loan of money.

The burden of proving a purchase in good faith and for value devolved upon the defendant, after it was established that the notes had been surreptitiously put in circulation and diverted from the purpose for which they had been delivered to Winslow. It then became incumbent upon the defendant to show that the notes had been executed in a form authorized by the plaintiff, and that the Trust Company had paid value for them upon their transfer to it.

It is claimed by the plaintiff that the seven notes for which it has obtained judgment were never properly executed, owing to the absence of Winslow's signature, not only as president of the Company but also as a guarantor, and that this defect was apparent upon the face of the paper, and deprived the notes of the character of commercial paper.

The case shows that the plaintiff had never adopted any general by-law prescribing a method for the execution of its pecuniary obligations; and there is no claim that it ever authorized the treasurer alone to issue them by any special resolution of its board of directors. Resolutions had frequently been adopted by the board, authorizing the treasurer and president together to execute notes for specified amounts duly guarantied by the twelve resident directors of the plaintiff company; and one or two resolutions were also adopted, providing for small amounts of paper, which did not prescribe any particular form of execution. But it had theretofore been the uniform practice of the plaintiff to cause all of its bonds and notes to be signed by both its president and treasurer, and guarantied by its twelve resident directors, of whom Winslow was one. Three of the notes in suit were so signed and guarantied and they belonged apparently to the same series as the seven not so signed.

The Trust Company had theretofore dealt largely in the plaintiff's paper, and at the time of receiving the securities mentioned was perfectly familiar with its mode of executing such obligations. It was also obvious from the form of the notes that it was intended to have them signed by the president, since a blank was left for that purpose at the usual place for a maker's signature. Not only did the seven notes in dispute show by mere inspection that they were imperfect and improperly executed, but they were never in fact authorized by the plaintiff to be issued in that form. There is nothing in the resolution of September, 1875, indicating an intention to authorize the treasurer to negotiate the notes with his signature alone; but it expressly required him not to sign them, but "to have them signed."

What is the natural significance of this language? It was obviously to have them signed by the officers who had theretofore been accustomed to sign such instruments for the Corporation.

Certainly no inference could be drawn that any other persons were authorized to sign and issue them than those whose usual practice it had been to sign like instruments. Indeed, a portion of these very notes issued under the same authority indicated the mode of execution intended; and it is an irresistible inference therefrom, either that they bore an unnecessary name, or that the other seven lacked an essential signature.

It, therefore, appears not only that the plaintiff never in fact authorized the transfer of obligations bearing the treasurer's signature alone; but there are no circumstances from which third parties had any right to infer such authority. On the contrary universal experience justifies the inference, from the very appearance of an unfinished instrument, especially when incomplete as to the signatures from which provision seems to have been made, that the original intention which impelled the maker to undertake its execution was abandoned.

Although Winslow was intrusted to sell these notes and would have been authorized to transfer them by affixing his signature, as president and guarantor, thereto, yet he had no authority to dispose of them without performing the implied condition imposed by the plaintiff upon such exercise of authority.

Not only the paper itself but the plaintiff's uniform custom bore evidence of the condition which attached to Winslow's right to transfer the paper. The performance of this condition materially affected the legal rights of the plaintiff and its guarantors, and could not be omitted without prejudice to their interests. It is quite clear, therefore, that these seven notes were never executed as the plaintiff intended they should be; and the question arises, not whether for any reason they were enforceable against the plaintiff but whether the transferee of such notes, by paying value therefor, became clothed with the character of a bona fide purchaser.

The authorities seem to be consistent and uniform to the effect that the defendant cannot be considered such a holder.

The suggestion that a party issuing negotiable paper with blank spaces therein, apparently intended to be filled up to make a complete contract, impliedly authorizes its holder to insert appropriate words in such blanks may be dismissed as inapplicable to such a case as this.

It has sometimes been held that a party signing such paper and delivering it to a third party unfilled, by implication confers such authority; but it can hardly be claimed that one drawing the form of a promissory note, which is unsigned and falls into the hands of another, thereby authorizes the holder to attach the maker's signature or to add anything which is incomplete in its execution.

The rule that a party buying commercial paper which remains in some essential particular incompleted and imperfect does not acquire the character of a bona fide holder, rests upon sound reasons and is well established in commercial law.

No stronger evidence could be afforded that such paper had been prematurely put in circulation contrary to the will and intention of its maker than the fact that it had not been fully and completely prepared to perform the office for which it was designed. It is apparent that such paper must have been taken from the possession of its maker before an intention to part with it had been fully formed, and that he still designed to add some provision or formality to give it vitality and effect. It was said by the late Judge Folger in Ledwich v. McKim, 53 N. Y. 313, that "A negotiable instrument must be a complete and perfect instrument when it is issued, or there must be authority reposed in some one afterwards to supply anything needed to make it perfect."

The rule is also laid down in Daniels on Negotiable Instruments. §§ 841, 842.

We cannot, therefore, hold that the Trust Company became the bona fide holders of the seven notes.

The reasons which lead us to this conclusion would also seem to require us to hold that the trial judge erred in directing the jury to assess the value of the notes at the amount apparently due thereon.

If the notes were not enforceable as pecuniary obligations of the plaintiff and its guarantors, it necessarily follows that they could not have had any other value than that which pertained to the material upon which they were written. It is, therefore, evident that the court erred in directing their value to be assessed upon the principles stated.

That this was a material error is evident from the fact that the jury did not find any damages for the detention of the notes; and therefore the assessment of the value controls the question of costs in the case.

We see no ground upon which such notes can be appraised at anything but a nominal value; and we think it was error in the trial court to refuse to so direct the jury.

The judgment should, therefore, be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the result.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Special Term in an action for the construction of a will. Modified.

Statement by Danforth, J.:

The action is brought for the purpose of obtaining the direction of the court in regard to certain questions arising on the will of Mortimer Ward, deceased. The plaintiff is his widow and the executrix of the will, and in both capacities interested in its construction. The defendants are DeWitt Clinton Ward, executor and brother of the deceased, Walter Edmund Ward and DeWitt Clinton Ward, his only children and Abby P. Ward, the mother, Sarah Brindley, the aunt, and Henrietta B. Ward, the sister of the testator, and beneficiaries under his will.

The defendants appeared and answered separately. A trial was had at the special term, and from the judgment there rendered, DeWitt Clinton Ward, the son, alone appealed to the general term; and from its judgment he appeals to this court.

Mr. James M. Hunt, for appellant:

The will of Mortimer Ward suspends the power of alienation of a portion of the estate for a greater period than during the continuance of two lives in being at the death of the testator and is void.

If it was the intention of the testator that the trustees should hold the corpus of the estate intact, after the death of the widow, and simply divide "the income" between the two sons, the trust is obnoxious to the statute.

Knox v. Jones, 47 N. Y. 389; Colton v. Fox, 67 N. Y. 348.

The words of the will are: "And upon the decease of my sons, I give, bequeath and devise to their heirs, should both have heirs." The gift over does not become vested until the decease of both sons.

Shipman v. Rollins, 98 N. Y. 311, 325.

As to the meaning of the word "heirs" as used by the testator; the usual meaning of the word must prevail, unless the context shows that the testator intended to attach to it a different meaning.

Bundy v. Bundy, 38 N. Y. 410, 421; Cushman v. Horton, 59 N. Y. 149, 152.

The context shows that the testator did not, by the word "heirs," intend to include collateral, but only lineal heirs. He used the word as equivalent to "children him surviving."

Bundy v. Bundy, 38 N. Y. 410, 421; Scott v. Guernsey, 48 N. Y. 106, 122; Lytle v. Beveridge, 58 N. Y. 592, 605; Cushman v. Horton, 59 N. Y. 149, 152; Thurber v. Chambers, 66 N. Y. 42, 47; Smith v. Scholtz, 68 N. Y. 41, 59.

The well settled rule is that if, under the provisions of the will, the power of alienation may by any circumstance be suspended for a greater period than during the continuance of two lives in being at the death of the testator, then the will is obnoxious to sections 14 and 15, article

1, title II, chapter 1, part II, or section 1, title IV, chapter 1V, part II of Revised Statutes.

Knox v. Jones, 47 N. Y. 389, 397; Schettler v. Smith, 41 N. Y. 328, 334; Colton v. Fox, 67 N. Y. 348; Smith v. Edwards, 88 N. Y. 92.

Does the will create a valid, express trust?

Section 60 of the Statute of Uses and Trusts (1 R. S. 679), provides that a valid, express trust shall vest the whole estate in the trustees, in law and in equity, subject only to the execution of the trust. Conversely, if no estate is given to trustees, there is no valid express trust. In no clause of this will is any estate whatever given directly to the executors. Neither "trust" nor "trustee" appears in any portion of the will except the codicil, and the fact that the codicil contains the word "trustees" does not create a valid trust.

Verdin v. Slocum, 71 N. Y. 345.

The gift is directly to the wife. She takes absolutely and directly; Monarque v. Monarque, 80 N. Y. 320; and an estate thus given cannot be taken away or cut down by any subsequent words that are not as clear and decisive, certainly not by implication.

Roseboom v. Roseboom, 81 N. Y. 356; Campbell v. Beaumont, 91 N. Y. 464.

By the provision "And upon my wife's decease the use and income of all my estate subject to the above provisions, to my two sons," etc, the estate is given after the mother's decease directly to the sons, for them to enjoy the use and income of it while they live.

Smith v. Van Ostrand, 64 N. Y. 278, 282.

Words must be supplied to cut down an apparent absolute gift; and this cannot be done unless the language actually used by the testator requires it. We are not to conjecture what he meant, but ascertain the meaning of his words.

Campbell v. Beaumont, 91 N. Y. 467.

The cases relied upon by the court below are distinguishable.

The will in the case of Robert v. Corning, 89 N. Y. 227, by its fourth paragraph gives the estate directly to the executors; while the will in question places the estate immediately in the hands of the widow and the sons.

In Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 561, the will gave the estate in question to specified trustees upon certain specified trusts.

In Vernon v. Vernon, 53 N. Y. 351, the will gave all the estate to the executors and trustees in the first instance, and then gave a house and lot to the wife; but it said that the executors might sell the same (it was held that the executors took no estate in that house and lot), and then gave his wife an annuity "to be paid semi-annually by my executors" out of certain specified rents.

In Low v. Harmony, 72 N. Y. 408, the will directed the executors to invest $10,000; "And the interest of the same shall go towards the support of Alice Harmony, * * * only the interest or income paid over to herself."

In Tobias v. Ketchum, 32 N. Y. 319, 321, the will gave the executors express directions as to the division of the proceeds of testator's estate and authorizes them "to rent, lease, repair and insure."

In Bliven v. Seymour, 88 N. Y. 469, 477, the will is more like the one under consideration, than is that found in either of the above cited cases; and the decision of Bliven v. Seymour, and the cases cited in 88 N. Y. 477, are direct authorities against the construction of a trust in this will.

If the more important provisions of this will, should be controlled by the less important and contingent provisions, it is submitted that if the latter provisions impose any active duties whatever upon the executors, such duties are merely to pay debts, expenses and (in certain contingencies) legacies, and that such duties are insufficient for the purposes of a trust.

Re Will of Fox, 52 N. Y. 530, 536; Dill v. Wisner, 88 N. Y. 153.

It is well settled that an instrument should not be construed to create a trust, unless its words plainly indicate such an intention.

Heermans v. Robertson, 64 N. Y. 332, 343; Heermans v. Burt, 78 N. Y. 259.

Mr. George G. DeWitt, Jr., for respondent:

While there is no express gift of the estate to the executors in trust, the testator's intention is clearly defined in the codicil, where he declares that he appoints his executors named in his will as trustees for purpose of carrying out its provisions. The will and codicil are to be regarded as a single instrument; and their various clauses must be construed in connection with each other.

Westcott v. Cady, 5 Johns. Ch. 334; Howland v. Union Theological Seminary, 5 N. Y. 193; Morse v. Morse, 85 N. Y. 60.

The fact that there is no express devise to the executors in trust is immaterial. No devise in express words is necessary to create a trust estate.

Robert v. Corning, 89 N. Y. 225.

The courts have uniformly held that to create a trust it is not essential to use the words "trust" or "trustee;" or that the authority to receive rents and income should be conferred in express language. They have also held, where it appears to have been the intention of the testator, as gathered from his will, that the income given to one by the will is to be received by the beneficiary through the medium of an executor, that a trust is established.

Craig v. Craig, 3 Barb. Ch. 76; Leggett v. Perkins, 2 N. Y. 297; Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 561; Tobias v. Ketchum, 32 N. Y. 319; Vernon v. Vernon, 53 N. Y. 351; Low v. Harmony, 72 N. Y. 408; Morse v. Morse, 85 N. Y. 53; Marx v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 357; Robert v. Corning, 89 N. Y. 225; Hathaway v. Hathaway, 37 Hun, 265.

It was the intention of the testator to continue the trust after the death of the wife during the lives of the sons.

There is no illegal suspension for a period beyond two lives. The trusts for the two sons, although embraced in a single fund, are distinct and separable trusts and terminate at their deaths respectively.

Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 561; Stevenson v. Lesley, 70 N. Y. 512; Monarque v. Monarque, 80 N. Y. 320; Wells v. Wells, 88 N. Y. 323.

By the well settled rules of construction the word "heirs," as used in the trust clause, is equivalent to "children" or "descendants."

Heard v. Horton, 1 Denio, 165; Vannorsdall v. Van Deventer, 51 Barb. 137; Scott v. Guernsey, 48 N. Y. 106; Lytle v. Beveridge, 58 N. Y. 592.

The executors are empowered by the will to sell the real estate and give good title. Such power of sale is created by the following words of the will:

"Should my executors deem it necessary and advisable for the better security and interest of my estate to change the investment of my property, they may dispose of all or any part of it."

Livingston v. Murray, 39 How. Pr. 102; Phillips v. Davies, 92 N. Y. 199.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The testator died in August, 1884, leaving a will and codicil, which were duly admitted to probate, as a will of real and personal estate. These, under established rules, are to be taken as one instrument and construed together as expressing the intent of the testator. If in one, therefore, the omission of certain technical words gives color to the contention of the appellant: that no express trust is created, the other declares the design of the testator that the executor and executrix shall take the residuary estate for the object declared and set forth in the will, and it is sufficient if from the two instruments it can be implied that his intent was to establish a trust. Morse v. Morse, 85 N. Y. 53.

By the will he appoints his wife executrix and his brother executor, and by the codicil he says, "I do nominate and appoint" them "as my trustees for the purpose of carrying out any of its provisions." In the first place it would be difficult if not impossible to carry into effect the plan devised by the testator, except through the intervention of some third person who might collect, manage and retain his property until the time arrived for final distribution. Such functions are imposed upon the executors. They are to pay the debts of the testator out of his estate, as soon "as shall by them be found convenient."

Each son is to have in property or money $10,000 on arriving at the age of thirty years. It was also the intention of the testator to provide for the support of his mother, his aunt and his sister, out of the property, and that so much as might be necessary should be paid to them for that purpose. To his wife the testator gave all his household furniture, "and the use and income" of all his real and personal estate "during her life," or "until after" his "death she marries," but in that case, "in lieu of all dower, $10,000 in money to be paid" by his executors; and they are in terms authorized to dispose of any of his property to pay this sum, or to pay the legacies given to his sons. And although, as we have seen, his wife was to have the income of his estate, the executors are authorized in their discretion "to change the investment of" the testator's property, or dispose of all or any part of it, "and invest the proceeds" in United States government, or New York state, or New York city bonds registered, or on bond and mortgage.

Upon his wife's decease the testator gives the "use and income" of his estate, subject to diminution by the support of his relatives above named, and the payment when due of the legacies to his sons, to those sons "share and share alike; and upon the decease of his sons, to their heirs, should both have heirs, their father's portion only; and in case of one having no heirs, then to the heirs of the other share and share alike; and if both should have no heirs, then as the law directs."

It is plain, therefore, that the executors are to have the management and direction of, and title to the property not specifically bequeathed, until the children attain the age of thirty years; and upon their death only the residue goes to whomsoever shall be entitled to it, in remainder. The executors may not only invest, but reinvest; and in whose name, if not their own, shall the government, state or city securities be registered? They may also sell any part of the estate as in their judgment becomes necessary; they are to divide, therefore they are to receive, the income.

By these incidents the case seems to be brought within the rule that when the duties imposed are active and render the possession of the estate convenient and reasonably necessary, the executors will be deemed trustees for the performance of their duties, to the same extent as though declared to be so by the most explicit language. Tobias v. Ketchum, 32 N.Y. 319; Robert v. Corning, 89 N.Y. 225.

The remaining question has been presented with much earnestness on the part of the learned counsel for the appellant, and is of greater difficulty. His contention is that the power of alienation of a portion of the estate is illegally suspended for a period beyond two lives; and the argument is placed on words already quoted.

As before suggested the trust created by the testator will continue after the wife's death and during the lives of the two sons. But upon the death of either, the children of the one dying, if he has any, will be entitled to his share, but if he has none, then the heirs of his brother will be entitled to it, and upon the death of that brother, leaving heirs, the same result follows; or, both dying without heirs, the estate must go where the law directs.

It follows that the property cannot be sold, except for the purposes of the trust, during the life of the widow. That is a suspension for life. It must remain undisposed of during the life of the son first dying, that is the second life, and still undisposed of during the life of the other son, for the time fixed for distribution is the death of both sons. That makes the third life; and it is clear that the suspension of absolute ownership will or may exceed a longer period than the continuance of two lives. All these lives were in being at the time of the death of the testator, and must terminate not only as a condition precedent to the taking effect of the gift over, but before it can be known who will be entitled ultimately to take. This limitation is too remote and renders the disposition void. 1 R. S. 773, § 1; Knox v. Jones, 47 N.Y. 389; Colton v. Fox, 67 N.Y. 348; Smith v. Edwards, 88 N.Y. 92; Bailey v. Bailey, 97 N.Y. 460.

In Monarque v. Monarque, 80 N.Y. 320, the widow had the first life estate, and at her death the four daughters of the testator took for life; and upon the death of any daughter the fee of one fourth part at once vested in her children.

In Wells v. Wells, 88 N. Y. 323, there was a similar provision, first for the wife, then for the testator's children; but it was also provided that upon the death of either child, leaving issue, such issue or next of kin should take his proportion.

In neither case was the final disposition of the estate suspended beyond the first and second life; for, that ending, the share of the child dying was at once liberated from the trust; but in the case before us it is otherwise. The testator provides for the devolution of the share of the child dying to the heirs of that child, if any, but if not it is still to be held by the trustee for the children of the other son; and until it is seen that neither has issue does the trust terminate.

Another question is presented by the pleadings and was considered by the court below: that relating to the mother, aunt and sister of the testator, all beneficiaries under the will, but we understand from concessions of counsel on the argument of this appeal that it was no longer deemed material by either party.

Other questions raised by the pleadings and answered by the court below, become immaterial, by reason of the death of the testator's widow unmarried, and still others are not presented on this appeal; but on the question argued we think a valid trust was created by the testator, to continue during the life or widowhood of the plaintiff, Mary Jane Ward (and she having died that question even becomes unimportant); but as to the residuary estate then remaining, it should be divided according to the Statute of Distributions in cases of intestacy.

The judgment appealed from should be so modified, and as modified, affirmed; the costs of this appeal to be paid out of the estate.

All concur.

STATE of New York, Appt.

1. The master is responsible for the negligent act of one servant causing injury to a coservant where such servant was, by the appointment of the master, charged with the performance of duties which the master was bound to perform for the protection of his servants.
2. A failure to perform such duties, or a negligent performance of them by a servant delegated to perform them, is regarded in law the master's failure or negligence, and not merely the failure or negligence of the coservant.
3. If the coservant whose act caused the injury was at the time representing the master in doing master's duty, the master is liable; if, on the other hand, he was simply performing the work of a servant in his character as a servant or employee merely, the master is not liable.
4. For an injury sustained by the claimant from the negligence of the captain of the state boat, who, at the time, was engaged with several hands employed on the boat, including the claimant, in digging clay from a bank and loading it on to the boat, which negligence consisted in setting the claimant to work under the bank after the captain had loosened the overhanging earth so that it fell upon and injured the plaintiff, the State is not liable.
5. The captain of the boat, although he had power to direct those under him, was nevertheless a coservant, within the rule.
6. Where the injury is one for which the master, if an individual, would not be liable, it is not one for which the State is liable under chapter 321 of the Laws of 1870.

APPEAL by the State from an award of $1,200 by the State Board of Claims to the claimant, for an injury while in the State's employ, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's agent. Reversed.

The claimant was a day laborer employed on the state boat on the Champlain Canal. The business of the hands employed on said boat was to load and transport earth and other materials as required by the needs of the canal. They were in charge of a captain who was the agent of the State and who had absolute control of the men.

When the injury occurred for which damages was claimed the hands, including the claimant, were engaged in digging sand for the canal. They were at work on a high bank and had dug several feet under the top of the embankment. The captain tried to break the top of the embankment under which they had dug and had some men helping him. They failed to break it, although they had made several deep holes with crowbars, and had used all their force in trying to pry the top off and had started a large crack, which was unknown to the claimant. A portion of the edge of the same embankment had been broken off, and the captain ordered the claimant to take his wheelbarrow and go into the excavation and wheel out the sand. As the claimant was proceeding into the embankment with his wheelbarrow, the top of the embankment fell, and he received the injuries for which he claims damages.

The board of claims held that the captain and claimant were not coservants within the rule that a corporation is not liable to a servant for the negligence of a coservant and awarded claimant the sum of $1,200; whereupon, the State appealed.

Mr. D. O'Brien, Atty-Gen., for the State:

A servant who has accepted service with knowledge of the character and position of structures from which he may be liable to injury, cannot maintain an action against his employer in case of injury resulting therefrom. He assumes apparent risks.

The claimant was a fellow servant with Wells, the captain of the boat; both were engaged in the same general business of the master, viz.: the taking of the clay to the state boat.

The general rule of law is that the master is not responsible to one servant for an injury occasioned by the negligence of a coservant of the common employer. To this there are two exceptions: 1, when the servant, whose negligence caused the injury, was a person unfit and incompetent to be intrusted with the duty to which he was assigned, of which the master had knowledge; and 2, when the accident resulted from unsafe and imperfect machinery and appliances.

Murphy v. Boston etc. R. R. Co. 88 N. Y. 151; Besel v. N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 176.

There was no evidence that the captain was negligent; and the finding of the board to the contrary is against the evidence.

Leonard v. Collins, 70 N. Y. 95.

Mr. A. D. Wait, for respondent:

Wells, the captain in charge of the work, was an officer appointed by the superintendent of public works.

1 R. S. 7th ed. p. 629, § 15; art. 5, § 8, Const., as amended in 1877.

He was more than a mere fellow servant with others, charged with a special duty; he was the general agent of the principal, placed there by the latter to direct and control the others. And in such case the master (the State) is liable to a subordinate, who has been exposed to unreasonable risk and injured from the want of due care and the negligence of one thus acting in its stead.

Fort v. Whipple, 11 Hun, 587, 591, and cases cited; Flike v. Boston etc. R. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 549; Corcoran v. Holbrook, 59 N. Y. 517; Malone v. Hathaway, 64 N. The claimant was justly and equitably entitled to an award for the damages sustained. The award appealed from in this case should be affirmed, upon the facts of the case and the law applicable thereto.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think the award in this case is in conflict with the decisions of this court defining the responsibility of employers for injuries sustained by servants while engaged in performing the service for which they were employed, resulting from the negligence of coservants.

The master is sometimes responsible for the negligent act of one servant causing injury to a coservant; but this liability, when it exists, does not rest upon the doctrine of respondeat superior, but solely upon the ground that in the particular case the coservant whose act or neglect caused the injury was, by the appointment of the master, charged with the performance of duties which the master was bound to perform for the protection of his servants, a failure to perform which, or a negligent performance of which, by a servant delegated to perform them, is regarded in law as the master's failure or negligence, and not merely the failure or negligence of the coservant.

The liability of the master when the negligence was not his personal act or omission, but the immediate act or omission of a servant, turns, as was said in Crispin v. Babbitt, 81 N. Y. 521, upon the character of the act; and this was but the enunciation of the established doctrine in this State upon the subject. If the coservant whose act caused the injury was at the time representing the master in doing the master's duty, the master is liable; if on the other hand he was simply performing the work of a servant, in his character as a servant or employee merely, the master is not liable.

The injury in the case last supposed, would, as between the master and the servant sustaining the injury, be attributable solely to the immediate author, and not to the master.

In harmony with the general principle that the character of the act is the decisive test, it has been repeatedly decided in this court that the fact that the person whose negligence caused the injury was a servant of a higher grade than the servant injured, or that the latter was subject to the direction or control of the former, and was engaged at the time in executing the orders of the former, does not take the case out of the operation of the general rule, nor make the master liable. Hofnagle v. N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 608; McCosker v. Long Island R. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 77; Allen, J., in Wright v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co. 25 N. Y. 565; Folger, J., in Laning v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 528.

These decisions are decisive against the claim of liability on the part of the State, for the injury sustained by the claimant. It is found that it resulted from the negligence of Wells, the captain of the state boat, who at the time was engaged with several hands employed on the boat (including the claimant), in digging clay from a bank, and loading it on to the boat. The negligence consisted in setting the claimant to work under the bank, after Wells had loosened the overhanging earth so that it fell upon and injured the plaintiff.

The case is within the decisions above cited. Wells, although captain of the boat, with power to direct those under him, was nevertheless a coservant within the rule. The manner of proceeding with the work was committed to Wells. It involved the exercise of such discretion and judgment only as is committed to a foreman.

It is not claimed that Wells was incompetent for his position; and no question as to the suitableness of appliances furnished by the State arises. It is the ordinary case of mismanagement by a coemployee of superior grade, as to the manner of prosecuting an ordinary work in which he and other employees acting under him were at the time engaged. This was a risk incident to the employment, which the claimant assumed, and the injury not being one for which the master, if an individual, would be liable, it is not therefore one for which the State is liable under chapter 321 of the Laws of 1870.

The case of Chicago etc. R. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 787], cited in the opinion below, was decided by a bare majority of the court, and is in conflict with the course of decisions in this State and elsewhere. Slater v. Jewett, 85 N. Y. 61; Wilson v. Merry, L. R. 1 H. L. Scotch App. 326; Farwell v. Boston etc. R. R. Corp. 4 Met. 49.

The award should be reversed, and the case remitted to the Board of Claims for a rehearing.

All concur.

1. It is the master's duty to furnish machinery to his employees which is safe, considering the use for which it is designed. He is not obliged to furnish the best possible appliances, but only those which are reasonably safe and suitable.
2. An employee, in accepting service with a knowledge of the character and position of the machinery, the dangers of which are apparent, assumes the risks incident to the employment; and he cannot call upon the employer to make alterations to secure greater safety.
3. On putting a person of immature years at work upon dangerous machinery, an employer is bound to give the employee such instructions as to make him fully understand, in fact, its dangerous character, and to appreciate such dangers and the consequences of a want of care, and the necessity of care and caution.
4. Merely going through the form of giving instructions, by the employer, even if such form includes everything requisite to the proper discharge of his duties by the employee, is not sufficient.
5. If a person is so young that even after full instructions he wholly fails to understand them and does not appreciate the danger arising from a want of care, then he is too young for such employment, and the employer puts or keeps him at such work at his risk.
6. If an employee of immature years (here a female of fourteen years) has had no instructions as to the danger of a machine at which she is set at work, and never worked at any machinery before, and is injured by such machine within a short time of her employment, because of her unfamiliarity with and lack of appreciation of the dangers attendant upon the working of the machine, the employer will be liable.
7. But where such employee has acquired from practical experience full knowledge of the dangers of the machine at which she was set at work and was competent to perform the duty demanded from her, the fact that she was a minor does not alter the general rule of law upon the subject of employees taking upon themselves the risks which are patent and incident to the employment.
8. Where the injury to the employee occurred, not on account of any act done or omitted on her part because of any want of knowledge or appreciation of the dangers of the machine, but from an accident which no human being would have thought of as possible to occur, resulting from an apparently safe act, the employer is not liable.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings Circuit on a verdict for plaintiff for $3,300 damages in an action against an employer for personal injury received in operating a machine. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Esek Cowen, for appellant:

It does not appear that a case had ever before occurred where the finger of an operator, on one of these machines, has been caught in a collar or cuff; and in several cases this court has held that such want of previous experience was conclusive as to the absence of negligence in the defendant.

Mr. Patrick Keady, for respondent:

Defendant was guilty of gross negligence in putting plaintiff, a fourteen year old child, without a word of warning, caution or advice, to work at a machine which was dangerous and unsafe, was out of order and had no proper means of stopping or starting it at the time of the injury.

It was the duty of defendant to caution and instruct this infant plaintiff as to the dangerous character of the machine. Having failed to do this he was guilty of negligence, which entitled the plaintiff to recover.

It was the duty of defendant to furnish safe, sound and suitable tools, implements, appliances and machinery for the use of the plaintiff. If he failed to do this, he was guilty of negligence.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was a young girl employed by defendant in his laundry. At the time of her first coming there in April, 1882, she was fourteen years and four months old, and was employed by the sister of defendant, who superintended the department of the work, to "bunch" collars and cuffs which was a perfectly safe employment. Before going to the laundry she had never worked nor seen machinery used in a steam laundry. She remained at this employment until June 16 of the same year, when defendant's sister came to her (as she says) and after telling her that the person who fed the machine in question was absent asked her to go over to it and take her place, which she did; and she was there shown how to put the collars and cuffs through and was told to be careful and not let any laps go through, any ears that is, so that no part of the collars should lap over another part.

This machine had a platform in front of it, upon which the feeder sat in a chair and placed the collars and cuffs which were to be put through the ironing process on a flat desk in front of her. There were two rollers at the further edge of the desk, one on top of the other; the lower one was hot enough to iron the collars as they passed through, while the upper pressed down upon it with a pressure of about 200 pounds. The collars were fed to these rollers by the feeder, and as one collar was started in on the left side of the machine and "gripped" by the rollers another was placed in position by the side of it; and so on until the sixth would just be taken by the rollers as the first one disappeared and the space left vacant for another collar.

There was a belt by which the machine was operated, which however could not be reached by the person feeding; but there was a girl at the rear or other end of the machine where the collars came out who started and stopped it. The heated roller is hollow and revolves around gas jets, and is heated to such a heat that if a collar stopped on it for a minute it would have been scorched brown or burned. If a person's hand were caught between these rollers it could not be dragged out, and the machine would have to be stopped and the weights which pressed it down would have to be removed from the upper roller. This machine would iron about 600 dozen pieces in the course of a working day. There were no guards in front of the rollers for the purpose of preventing anything from being drawn between them.

The defendant, on his examination, said that at one time he had himself placed a lever or shifter on this machine by which to start and stop it; it was overhead on the ceiling, and it could not be reached from where the plaintiff sat, but could be handled by a cord. That lever had been off about two months at the time when the accident occurred for which this action is brought.

Defendant says he found that the lever was not convenient, and that the old way was the easiest and safest. He says he did not take it off as a matter of economy, because the girls used to take too much time in stopping that lever. There never was at any time a lever or shifter within reach of the platform where the feeder sat. The machine as it existed on the day of the accident was in perfect repair and condition, according to the plan upon which it was built; and it did not appear from the evidence that there was in use any machine moved by steam for ironing collars which had any other or better or safer means for stopping it or for guarding the person who fed it.

On the 16th of June, when plaintiff went to work at this machine, she had never used any of the machines in the laundry. She says that no one in the factory ever instructed her as to the dangers of this machine; neither defendant nor any body else ever gave her any such instructions Before the plaintiff, no operator or feeder of the machine had ever been hurt, although there were several such machines in the laundry and they had been in use several years. One person had been injured, but she was not an operator and had no proper business at the machine when in operation.

For six weeks, or from June 16 to July 26, the day she was injured, the plaintiff worked constantly on the machine in feeding the collars and cuffs. During this time she says defendant had talked to her about her hair being loose or too long, and he told her to keep her hair up in front because it might get caught in the roller and be burned off. She also said she knew the rollers were so close together that they would, if they caught the hair, either draw it out of her forehead or burn it off by the heat, and she knew that this did once occur. She got her own hair caught once, four or five days after she was first employed on it, and she knew then that the rollers were hot enough to iron a collar, and she had always been told that there was a pressure of the upper roller on the lower. She also said she knew that if her hand was caught between the rollers of that machine that it would be burned and crushed, and she knew that other girls had had their hair caught and burned off on the machine.

As to the weight of the pressure of the upper roller upon the lower, she knew it was pressed upon or weighted with weights which she saw; and she saw the upper roller raised by means of a lever which was operated by stooping down and making great pressure with the body of the lever, which would then raise the roller. For six weeks she had had the experience of working at and feeding this machine, and had obtained the knowledge above stated, when on the 26th of July the accident in question happened. She gives this account of the manner of its happening:

"I commenced on the left hand side and commenced to put it (the collar) through the machine. I caught a collar with an ear on it. I put my finger out to pull it out and my hand was caught and drawn right through; the way it got caught, it was an old collar; my finger got caught in the buttonhole and I could not get it out; the machine went quite fast; there was a lap in the ear of a stand up collar, gentleman's collar; the buttonhole part was lapped back on the collar. I put my finger out to pull it out and my hand was caught and drawn right through; I tried to get it out; I put out my foot to push off the belting and could not reach it."

The girl at the other end of the machine heard the cries and stopped the machine. The plaintiff's hand was then taken out, the upper roller having been raised, and she was taken home. She was most terribly burned and bruised, and suffered an injury of a permanent nature and which may result in the entire loss of her hand, and perhaps arm up to the elbow.

The plaintiff commenced this action to recover for the injury, and in her complaint alleged that the defendant "carelessly and unlawfully set the plaintiff to work on machinery which was dangerous to her life and limb, without informing her of such danger, and of which she was entirely ignorant, * * * and that defendant well knew that said machinery was dangerous and unsafe; that through the gross negligence, carelessness, and wrong doing of the defendant, * * * and without any negligence on the part of plaintiff, plaintiff's right hand was caught in defendant's machinery," etc.

The plaintiff had a verdict which was affirmed at the general term, and the defendant appealed to this court.

The counsel for defendant upon the argument here, very properly, as we think from the testimony, conceded that there was no question of contributory negligence in the case.

The right of the plaintiff to maintain this recovery was placed by her counsel upon three grounds: 1, the duty of defendant to furnish safe, sound and suitable tools and machinery for the use of the plaintiff; 2, the negligence of defendant in failing to warn the plaintiff of the character of the machine and its dangers from lack of proper appliances to stop it by the person feeding it; 3, the defendant's violation of the original contract of employment, by taking her from "bunching" the collars and placing her at work feeding this dangerous machine.

First. The duty to furnish safe machinery means of course machinery that is safe, considering the use for which it is designed; for otherwise very little machinery could be operated. A steam engine may be built in the best manner, of the best materials, etc., and yet there is the possible danger inherent in the nature of the machine itself as operated by such an element, which may lead to an explosion that could not be foreseen or guarded against. Nor does the duty of furnishing a safe machine oblige an employer to furnish the best possible appliances. His duty is discharged when he furnishes a machine which is reasonably safe and suitable. Burke v. Witherbee, 98 N. Y. 562.

We are of opinion that the defendant in this case fully complied with all his legal obligations in this behalf. The machine that he furnished was in perfect repair at the time of the accident. There was but one way to stop it, and that was by taking the belt off at a point in the rear of the rollers in front of which the plaintiff sat. The machine was built on that plan, and was one of a large number of the same kind, and used for the same purpose. There was no evidence that a machine for this purpose had ever been built which could be stopped in any other manner.

The defendant, it is true, some time before the plaintiff came to the machine to work it, had himself provided other and additional means of stopping the machine; but as he says in his testimony, which upon this point is wholly uncontradicted, it was found not to work as well as the old way, and these additional means had been removed before the plaintiff was placed as a feeder at the machine. But even if the means had remained, the plaintiff (after her hand was caught) could not have reached the lever to stop the action of the machinery. The defendant could remove these things, which he had placed upon the machine by way of experiment to test their usefulness and convenience, without being, under the circumstances of this case, guilty of any negligence.

The same observations apply with added force to the fact that there were no guards in front of the rollers. The defendant had never himself placed any there, and none had been known to have been placed on any such machine in any other factory where used. Indeed, it could not be expected that such guards should be placed there; for it is plain that they would materially interfere with the working of the machine.

But the plaintiff, in accepting this work and entering upon the employment about this machine, assumed the usual risks and perils of the employment, and such as were incident to the use of this machine in its then condition, so far as such risks were apparent. I speak of this as the general rule; and whatever exceptions there may be to it on account of the youth of the plaintiff will be spoken of hereafter. But upon the general proposition as to the use of machinery there is no doubt that an employee in accepting service with a knowledge of the character and position of the machinery, the dangers of which are apparent, and from which he might be liable to receive injury assumes the risks incident to the employment; and he cannot call upon the defendant to make alterations to secure greater safety. Gibson v. Erie R. Co. 63 N. Y. 449; Powers v. N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 274; Shaw v. Sheldon, 5 Cent. Rep. 41, decided by this court, not yet reported in regular series.

We see no failure of defendant to comply with his legal obligations as to the first ground of liability maintained by plaintiff's counsel.

2. As to the second. There is no doubt that in putting a person of immature years at work upon machinery which in some aspect may be termed dangerous, an employer is bound to give the employee such instructions as will cause him to fully understand and appreciate the difficulties and dangers of his position, and the necessity there is for the exercise of care and caution. Merely going through the form of giving instructions, even if such form include everything requisite to a proper discharge of his duties by such employee, if understood, would not be sufficient. In placing a person of this description at work upon dangerous machinery, such person must understand in fact its dangerous character and be able to appreciate such dangers and the consequences of a want of care, before the master will have discharged his whole duty to such an employee. Sullivan v. India Mfg. Co. 113 Mass. 396–399; Finnerty v. Prentice, 75 N. Y. 615 manuscript opinion by Andrews, J., where such rule is recognized as existing in this State.

If a person is so young that even after full instructions he wholly fails to understand them and does not appreciate the danger arising from a want of care, then he is too young for such employment, and the employer puts or keeps him at such work at his own risk.

Assuming the plaintiff's statement in this case to be true: that she had no instructions as to the danger of the machine and that she had never worked at any machinery before, if under such circumstances this accident had happened within a short time of her employment and because of her unfamiliarity with and lack of appreciation of the dangers attendant upon the working of the machine, the defendant may well have been liable for the damages sustained by her on account of such ignorance. But the case discloses wholly different facts; it is conclusively shown from her own evidence already quoted that she was aware of and fully appreciated and understood the dangers to be apprehended from working the machine; and it is equally clear and from the same source of information, that she was perfectly competent to discharge this duty of feeding the machine, long before the accident occurred.

She had not, it is true, received any instructions as to its dangers from the defendant or his agents as she says; but she had acquired the information in fact from the best of all teachers, that of practical experience. She knew, therefore, all that the instructions of the defendant would have imparted to her. This was enough. Being of an age to appreciate and having full knowledge of the danger, and at the same time being competent to perform the duty demanded from her, the fact that she was a minor does not alter the general rule of law upon the subject of employees taking upon themselves the risks which are patent and incident to the employment. DeGraff v. N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 76 N. Y. 125; Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. 102 Mass. 572, 585; Sullivan v. Indian Mfg. Co. 113 Mass. 396–398; King v. Boston & M. R. R. Co. 9 Cush. 112.

The learned judge in delivering the opinion at general term, while stating that the case was a border one, observed that "It may well be that there were methods of performing the duties which, if duly communicated to the plaintiff, would have avoided the risks of accident." But the plaintiff in her own evidence says she was instructed as to the methods of performing the duties which she was placed there to discharge; it is only as to the dangers to be apprehended from the machine which she says were never imparted to her.

There seems to be still another answer to this part of the plaintiff's claim; and that is the injury did not occur on account of any act done or omitted on her part because of any want of knowledge or appreciation of the dangers of the machine.

She attempted to straighten out a "lap" in a collar, the further end of which was caught by the machine. Her hand was distant from the roller, the whole length of the collar; and but for the unfortunate and not to be foreseen accident by which her finger was caught in the button hole and from which she could not extricate it in time, the plaintiff's hand would not have been caught by the rollers. In the act of trying to straighten out this "lap" at the time she did, it is impossible to hold that such act was the least evidence of a lack of appreciation of or a familiarity with the dangers of the machine; and it would have been error to submit such proposition to a jury.

Prima facie it was a perfectly safe act, and would have so resulted, but for this accident which no human being would have thought of as possible to occur; and it is not admissible, therefore, to say that the injury to the plaintiff arose from any lack of knowledge on her part, even though she had received no instructions from the defendant.

Third. The third proposition is not borne out by the facts.

There is no evidence that the father of plaintiff knew that she was going to the defendant's laundry when she first went, or that he knew the character of the service she performed there. It is plain from her own evidence that she went there to obtain employment such as the defendant or his agents might place her at; and she took her turn at this machine, so far as appears, willingly, and kept it safely for six weeks before she was injured. As there is no basis in fact for the plaintiff's claim, it is unnecessary to discuss its correctness as a statement of the law.

These are the chief grounds made by plaintiff's counsel for an affirmance of this judgment; and we have examined all that he has urged with very great care and attention. The case is a most important one certainly to plaintiff, who has, without any fault of her own, sustained a most terrible and painful and permanent injury; and her case is one that appeals most strongly to the sympathies of everyone. But we do not see how this judgment can stand, without overthrowing well settled and healthful principles of law.

We think the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted; and for that reason the judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered; costs to abide event.

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, reversing an order of the Albany Special Term denying a motion for retaxation of costs. Reversed.

This action was brought for injuries sustained by plaintiff through a fall upon a defective sidewalk in the City of Cohoes.

A copy of the summons and complaint was served upon the mayor of the City, August 21, 1880. A copy of defendant's answer was served in September, 1880 and the action was tried in December, 1885, resulting in a verdict for plaintiff for $2,000. Exceptions were ordered to be heard in the first instance at the general term, where a judgment was directed to be entered in favor of plaintiff, upon the verdict, with costs. Plaintiff presented to the county clerk of Albany County two bills of costs, one for costs of the circuit and the other for costs of affirmance on appeal.

On the hearing before the county clerk, the taxation of said costs was opposed by defendant, upon the ground that the complaint in this action demanded judgment for the payment of a sum of money only, and that no claim for the cause of action stated in the complaint had been presented to or filed with the chief fiscal officer of defendant, for payment by the plaintiff. The county clerk overruled the defendant's objections, and taxed the plaintiff's several bills of costs in the amount claimed; to which the defendant excepted, and thereafter moved the special term for a retaxation, which motion was denied; and on appeal by the defendant to the general term the order of the special term was reversed and plaintiff appealed to this court.

Mr. James Lansing, for appellant:

This action having been brought prior to the first day of September, 1880, and before section 3245 of the Code of Civil Procedure took effect must be governed, in regard to costs, by section 2, chapter 262 of the Laws of 1859.

Code Civ. Proc. § 3356.

The construction given to that Act was that actions arising out of claims ex delicto were not required to be presented to the chief fiscal officer of municipal corporations for payment, in order to recover costs, where it appeared that such corporations had no power or authority to audit and pay such claims.

McClure v. Supervisors of Niagara, 50 Barb. 594; 3 Abb. App. Dec. 83; Child v. West Troy, 23 Hun, 68; McGaffin v. Cohoes, 74 N. Y. 387.

The same construction was given to similar provisions, in regard to costs in the charters of various municipal corporations.

Howell v. Buffalo, 15 N. Y. 512; Quinlan v. Utica, 11 Hun, 217; affirmed in 74 N. Y. 603; McGaffin v. Cohoes, 74 N. 387.

Mr. P. D. Niver, for respondent:

I. The proper remedy for the defendant is by motion under the Code of Civil Procedure, section 3265.

II. The plaintiff was not entitled to costs, because no claim was filed by the plaintiff, with the chief fiscal officer of the defendant, before the commencement of the action.

Laws 1859, chap. 262, § 2; Dressel v. Kingston, 32 Hun, 526; Judson v. Olean, 24 N. Y. Week. Dig. 55.

Section 2 of chapter 262 of the Laws of 1859 reads as follows:

"No costs, fees, disbursements or allowances shall be recovered or inserted in any judgment against municipal corporations, unless the claim upon which such judgment is founded shall have been presented for payment to the chief fiscal officer of said corporation before the commencement of an action thereon."

Under section 3245 of the Code of Civil Procedure (like in substance and nearly identical in language to Laws of 1859) it has been held that unless the claim has been presented to the chief fiscal officer a plaintiff cannot have costs. Dressel v. Kingston and Judson v. Olean, supra.

In Dressel v. Kingston taxation was urged, on the ground that the chief official officer had no power to audit the claim if presented to him. The court, however, in disposing of the question, says: "Hence under Baine v. Rochester, 85 N. Y. 523, it is of no consequence that this officer was not authorized to adjust the claim. That case decides this."

Baine v. Rochester came up under section 3245 of the Code and not under the Laws of 1859; but as before said, the substance is the same in section 3245.

Section 3245 is as follows; "Costs cannot be awarded to the plaintiff in an action against a municipal corporation, in which the complaint demands a judgment for a sum of money only; unless the claim, upon which the action is founded, was, before the commencement of the action, presented for payment to the chief official officer of the corporation."

Per Curiam:

This action was brought before the new Code went into effect; and hence the section in regard to costs (3245) has no application here. The case must be decided under the Act of 1859, chapter 262, § 2, Laws 1859.

Under that section of the law this court substantially held that cases for the recovery of damages for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of the servants of a municipal corporation were not within its purview. McClure v. Supervisors of Niagara, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 83; Howell v. Buffalo, 15 N. Y. 512; McGaffin v. Cohoes, 74 N. Y. 387.

All of these cases did not arise under the Act of 1859 but the principle decided in them is as stated.

The general term in this case and in Dressel v. Kingston, 32 Hun, 526, decided differently upon the authority of Baine v. Rochester, 85 N. Y. 523. That case we think does not go to the extent assumed by the general term.

In the first place it arose under the section of the Code above cited, and also the cause of action was ex contractu. It was held that in such an action it was not an answer to the requirement of that section of the Code to show that the city treasurer, the chief fiscal officer of the City, was not authorized to adjust or pay the claim upon presentation. It is true that in the opinion in the Baine Case it is not specially stated that the action arose on contract; yet, this was its character, and the decision was made with such fact existing.

Nothing was said in the opinion as to those other cases above cited, and it cannot be supposed that with reference to actions which were commenced while the Act of 1859 was in force the court meant to overrule them without making any reference to them whatever.

The Baine Case is authority for just what was therein decided; and it has not yet been decided that under the section of the Code (3245), in an action of this nature a presentation of the claim must be made in accordance with its provisions before the commencement of the action, on pain of being deprived of costs, even if the plaintiff be successful.

The order of the General Term should be reversed, and that of the Special Term affirmed, with costs in both courts.

1. Where, on the trial of an indictment for burglary, the "breaking," which constitutes the essential element of the crime of burglary, stands as an uncontradicted fact, it is proper for the court to decline to charge the jury that they may convict of a misdemeanor under section 505 of the Penal Code.
2. A request so to charge is properly denied when no modification of the indictment, by striking out the characteristics of burglary, would leave an adequate description of a misdemeanor under section 505 of the Penal Code.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of Sessions of Queens County on a conviction of burglary in the first degree. Affirmed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. James W. Covert, for appellant.

Mr. John Fleming, for respondents.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The prisoner was indicted for burglary in the first degree. The evidence showed that with two or three confederates he broke into an inhabited dwelling house, and held or aided in holding one of the inmates while one of his companions attempted to commit a rape upon a female therein residing. The defendant himself testified, admitting his presence in the house and practically denying nothing.

The trial court was asked to charge the jury that they might convict the prisoner of a misdemeanor, under section 505 of the Penal Code. The request was refused, and an exception was taken. The jury found the defendant guilty of burglary in the first degree.

The learned trial judge read to the jury the definitions of burglary in each of its three degrees, after having told them that if they doubted as to the greater offense they might convict as to the lesser. He called their attention then to the provisions of section 505, adding:

"I have now called your attention to all the provisions of the statute which relate to the offense charged in the indictment, and to the particular degrees of that offense."

It would seem from his language that he treated section 505 as a lesser degree of the offense charged, and gave to the prisoner the benefit of the doctrine which his counsel invoked. But if his subsequent refusal to charge imports the contrary, he committed no error. Nothing in the facts proved warranted a conviction for the misdemeanor. The proof, without contradiction, established all the elements of burglary in the first degree.

There was no room for any possible conclusion upon the evidence that any opening to the house was unclosed, or that the entrance was effected without a "breaking." The defendant makes no such pretense. He only says that he was in such a state of intoxication that he did not know how entrance to the house was effected.

The "breaking" which constitutes the essential element of the crime of burglary stood, therefore, in the case an uncontradicted fact; and since, under section 505, the lesser offense of a misdemeanor could only exist where the entry into the building was "under circumstances, or in a manner not amounting to a burglary," the trial court was certainly authorized to decline a charge to the jury that they might convict of a misdemeanor. That would have been to tell them that they might disregard clear and definite testimony not only unimpeached but entirely without contradiction.

It may be added also that no modification of the indictment by striking out the characteristics of burglary in any or all of its degrees would have left an adequate description of the misdemeanor. That offense involves an intent to commit a felony or a larceny or malicious mischief accompanying the entry. The only allegation of intent in the indictment is "to commit some crime." Code Crim. Proc. §§ 444, 445; Dedien v. People, 22 N. Y. 178.

It is clear, therefore, that the exception was unfounded.

No other questions require discussion.

The judgment should be affirmed.

620

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming an order of the Monroe Special Term awarding the custody of certain minor children to their mother, the relator, in a proceeding by habeas corpus. Appeal dismissed.

The writ of habeas corpus was issued by a justice of the supreme court on the relator's petition; and upon its return, a reference was ordered to S. D. Bentley, Esq., to take such testimony as might be material to the issues raised, and to report the same, with his opinion thereon.

The facts sufficiently appear from the referee's opinion, which was as follows:

This matter comes up before the supreme court upon habeas corpus. The material facts, as disclosed by the proofs and admissions of the parties and counsel before me, are as follows:

The petitioner and the defendant were married in Illinois, July, 1874. They were then both residents of that State, and continued to reside there until after the commencement of the suit for divorce hereinafter referred to. The petitioner still resides in that State, but the defendant came to this State soon after the suit for divorce was commenced, upon a visit, intending to return, but has remained here and now expresses his intention to make his residence in this State.

Four children were born of the marriage; Mary aged nine years, Thomas aged seven, John aged five, and a son born in February last. The first three are the subjects of this controversy and are living with their father at the house of his mother in Rochester, N. Y. The babe that was born after the judgment in the action for divorce has always remained with its mother. The husband and wife did not live happily together; but in view of the decree in the suit for divorce and what was thereby established, I will not consider the causes of that unhappy controversy.

So far as concerns the matters professed, by that judgment, to be decided, as well as those matters which it was necessary to decide, and so much of the pleadings and evidence as must necessarily have been considered by the court in proceeding to judgment, the defendant is estopped by that judgment from calling them in question here. Tuska v. O'Brien, 68 N. Y. 446; 8 East, 346; 4 Cow. 562.

On October 11, 1884, the petitioner began a suit for divorce in the Circuit Court of Tazewell County, Illinois, upon the ground of cruel treatment, and in her bill of complaint alleged that the defendant was not a fit person to have the care, custody and education of the children of the marriage, or to keep them in the hands of others in the absence of the mother's care over them; and alleged that she was a fit person to have their care, control and education, and prayed for absolute divorce, and that the care, control, custody and education of the children be committed to her by the court.

Defendant, in his answer, denied the facts alleged for cause of divorce, made counter charges against his wife, alleged that she was unfit and he fit to have the care, custody, control and education of the children.

The summons was personally served upon him in Illinois on the 11th day of October, 1884, by the sheriff of Tazewell County, and at the same time an injunction or restraining order, which has been granted by the court upon the bill filed, was personally served restraining the defendant from "keeping or having said children kept out of the State of Illinois" and "requiring him to retain them and keep them and educate said children in the said county and State of Illinois until the further order of the court in the premises."

The bill of complaint was verified by the plaintiff and alleged that the defendant had taken the three children to Rochester, N. Y., in violation of an agreement that he would not take them out of Illinois without her consent, and that they were so taken out of Illinois upon a pretense of visiting relatives. It also charged that defendant was keeping said children with his relatives in Rochester, with the purpose of having them there permanently kept and reared by his relatives in the State of New York, away from her and where she seldom, if ever, could see them again or enjoy their society.

The defendant's answer denied making any agreement to keep the children in Illinois; and denies that he ever "threatened or intended to keep said children permanently beyond the limits of this State (Illinois)."

It would seem from this brief summary of the bill and answer that the children, at the time of the commencement of that suit and of the rendition of judgment therein, were temporarily sojourning in Rochester, and that it was not until after the entry of judgment therein that defendant determined to change his residence to Rochester or to keep the three children permanently there. That such are the facts fully appears by oral evidence taken before me.

It also appears that the court in the suit in Illinois did consider, and of necessity must have considered, the charges of unfitness to have the care of the children made by each party against the other. Evidence was taken upon the part of complainant, tending to sustain her charge that defendant was an unfit person to have the custody of these tender infants; and that evidence must necessarily have been considered by the court in proceeding to judgment. The jury only passed upon the fact of cruelty. The court not only decided the question of fitness against the defendant, but, upon the pleadings, it was necessary to decide it one way or the other. The evidence in the record of proceedings, and, unexplained, in my opinion fully justifies the conclusion reached by the Illinois Court.

But it is to be said that for reasons to be alluded to hereafter, the defendant gave no evidence in that suit to sustain the allegations of his answer, or to contradict or break the force of the evidence given by the plaintiff.

The reason for such failure to make defense was that the defendant was in contempt; and the court refused, for that reason, to allow his attorney to call any witnesses. It seems that an order directing the defendant to pay $100 alimony pendente lite had been made in the cause, which order had not been obeyed or excuse shown for failure to obey it. It does not appear whether this order came to defendant's knowledge; but his attorney was present in court when it was granted, and opposed the motion; and from the whole evidence before me I am satisfied that defendant knew of it and was so circumstanced that he could have paid the money. I am not satisfied from the proofs that his attorney was at fault. He was shown to have attended upon the trial and to have done all that could have reasonably been expected of him, to protect his client. Defendant does not satisfactorily explain his failure to give his proper attention to the protection of his own rights and interests.

Notwithstanding all this, were the question an open one I should have great hesitancy in reaching a conclusion, upon the oral evidence before me, that either the father or the mother of these children is unfit or an improper person to have their care, custody and education. But within the authorities I think the defendant is concluded and estopped from calling up the question of fitness here, and that, as evidence against him, the record from the Illinois Court must outweigh all the oral evidence and be treated as establishing the fact that the defendant is not a fit person to have the care, custody and control of these infants. His right as a father must yield to the judgment and decree had against him. Ahrenfeldt v. Ahrenfeldt, Hoff. Ch. 497; Peck v. Callaghan, 95 N. Y. 73; Krekeler v. Ritter, 62 N. Y. 372.

The evidence very clearly establishes that no reasonable objection exists as against any member of the family of the defendant's mother. Indeed it is conceded that the children's aunts are well qualified and willing, not to say desirous, to undertake the care, nurture and education of these infants. On the other hand, I think the proofs established with equal certainty, that no reasonable objection exists against any member of the family of the petitioner's father; and there is nothing to indicate that the influence and example of her father or any of his family, with whom these children would there come in contact, would be bad.

The charges against Mr. Reisinger, growing out of whisky troubles, I do not consider of any significance; he seems rather to have been unfortunate than dishonest; and all these matters are shown to have occurred before defendant married Mr. Reisinger's daughter, and before the defendant took his wife and children into her father's house to reside. After a careful consideration of all the evidence I am satisfied that the influences which would surround these children in the home of their grandfather and under the eye of their mother would be wholesome, and that they would there have the advantages of secular and religious instruction, equally as good as they would have with their aunts in Rochester.

As to pecuniary expectations I do not think there is any shown upon either side, to weigh very heavily in the balance. Money enough seems to be assured upon either side to insure their comfortable maintenance; and although their custody and place of abode should be with their mother, that fact would not relieve their father from the duty and legal obligation to support them. By the decree of the court, to which reference has been had, he is directed to pay the plaintiff $100 quarterly until further order of the court.

Another consideration, which had weight with me in recommending to the court to award the children to their mother, is that they may be reared in one family with their infant brother.

It is of advantage to all the children of one family to be reared together, at least until early associations shall so strengthen the ties of blood as to fix deep the roots of an abiding interest in each others' future welfare. Because of the tender age of this infant brother, born since the father brought the three older children to this State, the only way in which the children of the family can be reared at all as a family, is to award the other children to the mother.

The father, from necessity, because of his profession as a physician, can be but little with his children. Their care, nurture and instruction must be given over almost wholly to their aunts and their teachers. A mother's love, because she is the mother, is tenderer than any other's. No other tie binds so closely. Her care is more solicitous for the welfare of its object, and her eye more watchful over the daily wants of her offspring in their helpless infancy than any other person's. And I think, from the evidence, these children may be safely committed to the love and care of their mother until they reach years of discretion; then they can choose for themselves.

I have been cited to but two adjudged causes in which a mother has come into the courts of one of the United States with a decree of a court of a sister State of competent jurisdiction of the persons and subject matter, granting her a divorce from her husband for his fault, and adjudging him to be unfit to have the care and education of their minor children, and awarding the children to her, and has sued out a writ of habeas corpus to obtain possession of them from their father. These cases are Wakefield v. Ives, 35 Iowa, 240; Kline v. Kline, 57 Iowa, 386.

I have searched with a good deal of care, but I find no other case.

In Wakefield v. Ives the mother had obtained a divorce in the court of Minnesota upon the service of the summons by publication, and had a decree awarding her the custody of the child, a daughter. The father, who went to Iowa, in some way got possession of the child. The mother went to the latter State, obtained a writ of habeas corpus, and the court awarded her the child, holding that the decree obtained in Minnesota was binding and conclusive upon the parties until it was modified, reversed or set aside for cause shown to the jurisdiction of the court which rendered the judgment. This was on appeal to the highest court of the State.

Kline v. Kline was in the same court upon habeas corpus between the parents. A judgment had been obtained in the courts of Wisconsin, upon service by publication. The children were residents of Iowa at the rendition of the Wisconsin judgment, which, nevertheless, awarded custody of the children. The Iowa court held that that part of the decree which awarded custody of the children was void for want of jurisdiction, putting its decision expressly upon the ground that the children were nonresidents of the State whose court assumed to make a decree disposing of their custody. The court does not allude to the prior case of Wakefield v. Ives; but it would seem that the cases are distinguishable upon the ground that in Wakefield v. Ives the child was a resident within the jurisdiction of the court which rendered the judgment, while in Kline v. Kline, the children were nonresidents.

However that may be, I think it clear by reason of the Illinois Statutes (R. S. Ill. chap. 40, § 18) and of the residence of the children within the State, that the court which pronounced the decree, between the relator and defendant, had jurisdiction to make it.

In Wilkinson v. Deming, 80 Ill. 342, it was held by the highest court of the State that a decree of divorce granted for fault of the husband, and giving custody of the children absolutely to the mother, takes away ipso facto all control of the father over the children until it is restored by the action of the proper court; and in Miner v. Miner, 11 Ill. 42, the same court held that where the aid of the court is once invoked the children become the wards of the court, and it will not permit them to be removed beyond its jurisdiction, or either parent to alienate the affections of the infant from the other. The doctrine of the courts which held that where the children are residents of the State and the parents invoke the aid of the court, the court has jurisdiction to award their custody to either parent, would seem to be sound beyond controversy.

As between the parties, relator and defendant, the courts of this State are bound to give the judgment of the Illinois Court the same force and effect that would be given to it by the courts of the State where it was rendered. Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 481 [11 U. S. bk. 3, L. ed. 411]; Hampton v. M'Connel, 3 Wheat. 234 [16 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 378]; Shumway v. Stillman, 6 Wend. 447; Dobson v. Pearce, 12 N. Y. 156; Act of Congress, May 26, 1790; U. S. Const. art. 4, § 1.

The judgment is controlling between the parties and cannot be disregarded in the courts of the same State where it was granted in any subsequent proceeding by habeas corpus to obtain possession of the children. Hoffman v. Hoffman, 15 Ohio, 427; Williams v. Williams, 13 Ind. 523; Cocke v. Hannum, 39 Miss. 433; Miner v. Miner, 11 Ill. 42.

These considerations establish that as between themselves the relator has the better right in this case to the custody and control of these infants than has the defendant. But it has long been the rule of action of the courts of this State that upon habeas corpus for possession and custody of infants, the permanent good of the infants is the controlling principle governing our courts in their decision. It has repeatedly been held that the courts of this State will not try the rights of the parents upon habeas corpus, but will remove all illegal restraint, and permit the infants to choose for themselves with whom they will go, in case where the infants are of sufficient age and understanding to choose discreetly; and that when they are not able to choose, the court will decide for them and award the custody to the person, be it father, mother or stranger, where and as the best interest of the infant demands. Hurd, Habeas Corpus, 2d ed. p. 500, et seq.

Chancellor Kent, in Re Wollstoncraft, 4 Johns. Ch. 79, says, p. 82: "The course and practice of the courts in these cases was only to deliver the party from illegal restraint; and if competent to form and declare an election, then to allow the infant to go where she pleased; and if the infant be too young to form a judgment, then the court is to exercise its judgment for the infant." People v. Chegaray, 18 Wend. 637; Re Gregg, 5 N. Y. Legal Obs. 265.

In the latter case Oakley, J., says:

"The question as to the alleged superior right of the father can only arise when the child cannot, as in the present case, choose for itself. * * * It would seem then that the real question in these cases is not what are the rights of the father and mother to the custody of the child, or whether the right of the one is superior to that of the other, but what are the rights of the child? * * * The true view is that the rights of the child are alone to be considered, and those rights clearly are to be protected in the enjoyment of its personal liberty, according to its own choice, if arrived at the age of discretion, and if not, to have its personal safety and interests guarded and secured by the law, acting through the agency of those who are called upon to administer it."

In the case now at bar the eldest child is a girl of nine years, and the others are boys still younger. It seems to me that children of such tender age cannot discreetly choose for themselves; and that in view of the decree of the Illinois Court and the evidence before me, I must recommend the court to award the custody of these children to their mother, until such time as they shall reach years of discretion, when they can choose for themselves; and that the father must be sent to the Court in Illinois for a modification of its order and the determination of the rights between him and this relator, or remitted to his action in chancery.

The opinion of the General Term, per HAIGHT, J., was as follows, after stating the facts:

The first question which we are called upon to consider upon this appeal pertains to the effect that is to be given to the judgment in the divorce action; for it is undisputed that in that action the court had jurisdiction of the parties; that an issue was raised as to the fitness of the parties to have the care, custody and control of the children, and that the court in that action adjudged that the defendant was not a proper and suitable person to have the custody of the children; that the complainant was a fit and proper person to have their custody and control, and that it would be for the best interests of the children to be given to their mother.

It is contended on the part of the respondent that this judgment is conclusive upon the defendant and that he is now estopped from calling it in question; while on the part of the appellant it is contended that the courts of this State are not bound by this judgment, but that it is the duty of the court to now determine the proper person or persons to have the care, custody and control of the children. No claim is made that there has been any change in the circumstances of the parties, or that there have been any new facts discovered since the judgment in the divorce action.

Article 4, section 1 of the Constitution of the United States provides that "Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other State."

Under this provision of the Constitution we are required to give full faith and credit to the judicial proceedings of the courts in the State of Illinois; and if the courts of that State had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter, in the absence of fraud, its judgment is conclusive as between the parties or their privies on all questions litigated and decided in that court. As to those questions, the judgment constitutes an estoppel. Dobson v. Pearce, 12 N. Y. 156; Kinnier v. Kinnier, 45 N. Y. 535; Patrick v. Shaffer, 94 N. Y. 423-430; Embury v. Conner, 3 N. Y. 511-522; Kerr v. Hays, 35 N. Y. 331.

But it is contended that while the parties may be bound by a prior judgment, the infant children are not, and that it is the duty of the court to determine the question anew, independent of the conclusion reached by the Illinois Court.

In the case of Thorndyke v. Rice, 24 Law Rep. 1920, it was held that a decree of a tribunal as to the custody of a child was never final; but that the same tribunal, or another where the child was either temporarily or permanently staying, might consider the case upon the facts then existing, and (looking at the welfare of the child) should determine whether any and what change should be made in regard to its custody.

In the case of Woodworth v. Spring, 4 Allen, 321, it was held that the appointment in Massachusetts of a guardian over a child whose legal domicil is in another State, who has a guardian appointed under the laws of that State, does not deprive the court of Massachusetts of the power in its discretion to decree the custody of the child to a foreign guardian.

In the case of Williams v. Williams, 13 Ind. 523, it was held that where, upon granting a divorce, the court, in its judgment, assigns the custody of the child to one of the parties, such disposition of the child will control until the judgment making it is modified by the court upon proper application, and cannot be disregarded in a subsequent proceeding by habeas corpus to obtain possession of the child.

In the case of Wilkinson v. Deming, 80 Ill. 342, it was held that where the divorce had been granted for the fault of the husband, giving the custody of the children absolutely to the mother, it takes away ipso facto all control of the father over the children until it is restored by the action of the proper court.

In the case of Miner v. Miner, 11 Ill. 43, it was held that in case of separation the father has the legal right to the custody and control of his children, unless he had forfeited it by misconduct; next to the right of the father, that of the mother must be recognized, but these rights are subject to the control of the court of chancery, and when its aid is invoked the best interests of the children should be primarily considered; the paramount right of the father to the children will not be recognized where a divorce has been granted for his fault or misconduct; when the aid of the court is once invoked to provide for the guardianship of infants in case of separation of the parents, such infants become the wards of the court, and it will not permit them to be removed beyond its jurisdiction.

In the case of Wakefield v. Ives, 35 Iowa, 238, it was held that where a decree of divorce of a court of general jurisdiction in any other State is regularly rendered, although on service by publication, giving the custody of a minor child to the applicant, such decree will be regarded as binding and conclusive upon the parties until reversed, modified or set aside for cause shown to the jurisdiction.

In the case of Kline v. Kline, 57 Iowa, 386, it was held that a decree of divorce rendered in another State on service by publication so far as it attempted to fix the custody of minor children who were then residents of the State of Iowa, is without jurisdiction and void.

In the Matter of the Petition of Frank B. Bort, 25 Kan. 308, for a writ of habeas corpus, it was held that it was the duty of the court, whenever the possession and custody of a minor child is sought by habeas corpus, to make such order for their care and custody as the best interests of the children may require; and to that end it may commit them to the custody of other than a parent; and this, notwithstanding the fact that in a decree of divorce they were committed to the care and custody of their father or mother; that such decree may bind the parties inter sese, but does not conclude the court as to the best interests of the children. We have thus briefly called attention to such authorities as we have been able to find that bear upon the question under consideration.

It will be observed that in the case of Thorndyke v. Rice, supra, the decree of a tribunal as to the custody of a child was never considered final, but that the same tribunal, or any other, might consider the question upon the facts then existing, looking at the welfare of the child.

This decision proceeds upon the theory that the circumstances of parties to whom the custody of children may have been awarded may change, rendering it fit and proper that the court should change the custody of the children. We do not, however, understand the court in this case to have gone to the extent of holding that it was the duty of the court to go back of the former decree and try over and determine anew the facts established by that decree.

In the case of Woodworth v. Spring, 4 Allen, 321, the question pertained to the rights of guardians, and its chief bearing upon the question under consideration lies in the fact that a judgment of another State becomes an important element in determining to whom the custody of the children should be awarded.

The cases in Indiana and Illinois, to which we have referred, appear to go to the extent of holding that a judgment once fixing the custody of children becomes binding upon the parties so long as that judgment remains in force unmodified.

And to the same effect is the case of Wakefield v. Ives, 35 Iowa, 238. In this case it appears that Mary Wakefield Ives brought an action for divorce against her husband in the District Court of Hennepin County, Minnesota, where she then resided; that a summons was issued against the defendant and served by publication, the defendant's residence being unknown. The service of the summons having become complete by publication, a default was entered against the defendant, and the case sent to a referee to take the testimony and report to the court; that upon the testimony so reported the court rendered a decree of divorce to the plaintiff, and awarded her the care and custody of Alice H. Ives, an infant daughter. The defendant having obtained custody of the infant in the State of Iowa, a writ of habeas corpus was sued out by the mother. It was held that the District Court of Minnesota, by which the decree was pronounced, being a court of general jurisdiction, was by the statute expressly clothed with the power to grant the divorce and make the order respecting the care and custody of the child; that she was within the jurisdiction of the court at the time the decree was rendered; that the decree was regularly obtained and still remains in full force and binding upon the parties to it; that under the Constitution of the United States, full faith and credit shall be given to it in the State of Iowa; that it is binding and conclusive upon the parties until it is modified, reversed or set aside, and that the mother was entitled to the custody of the child.

In the case of Kline v. Kline, 57 Iowa, 386, a different result was reached, and that upon the ground that the children did not reside in the State in which the action of divorce was granted, which attempted by its decree to fix the custody of the children. The decision in that case, however, proceeded upon the theory that the children being nonresidents of the State, the court had no jurisdiction over them, and is clearly distinguishable in that regard.

In the Matter of Frank B. Bort, 25 Kan. 308, the parents were divorced by a decree of the Circuit Court of Sauk County, Wisconsin. The decree awarded the custody of the children to the father. The mother, having taken the children to Leavenworth, Kansas, to reside with her parents, the father procured a writ of habeas corpus to be issued seeking to recover the possession of the children. The petitioner invoked the decree of the court of Wisconsin and the clause of the Federal Constitution to which we have referred; but the court refused to award him the custody of the children, but instead awarded them to a Mrs. Powers, a grandmother of the children. The court, in delivering its opinion, seemed to be of the impression that the Constitution referred to had reference to property rights, and that it had no application for the reason that parents had no property rights in the possession of their children, but it refused to place its decision upon that ground; on the contrary, for the purpose of the decision, it conceded as between the parents the decision of the Wisconsin Court was final. The court then proceeds to state reasons why it would be for the best interests of the children to be awarded to their grandmother and not to either of the parents.

It will thus be observed that, from a careful examination of the authorities to which we have referred, there is no substantial conflict. We cannot adopt the intimation suggested in the Bort Case: that the Federal Constitution had reference to property interests only, and that full faith and credit was to be given to the judgment of the courts of other States only in cases where the judgment affected property rights. No such limitation appears in the Constitution, and we do not believe that any such was intended. If it was, then a decree of divorce dissolving the marriage contract between a husband and wife residing in the State in which the decree was issued, the parties being subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of that State, would be of no binding force or effect in either of the other States of the Union, for the reason that the decree did not pertain to property and consequently would not be entitled to full faith and credit under the Constitution.

To our mind the Constitution covers the question under consideration, and it is our duty to give full faith and credit to the decree of the Illinois Court. We do not, however, regard the decree of that court as binding upon the infants, but it is binding upon the parents, the parties to the action. The infants at the time, being of such tender years as to be unable to choose for themselves as to their custodian, became the wards of the court, and it was the duty of the court to choose for them. The court, in choosing for them, was required to consider the best interests and welfare of the children. Its decision became binding upon the children only for the time being: and as soon as the circumstances of the custodian changed or other circumstances arose which would make it for the best interests of the children that there should be a change, it would be the duty of the court in which the decree was originally made, or of any other court having jurisdiction, to make such change. But as between the parties to the action, the parents of the children, they are bound by the matters adjudged and determined in the action, and cannot again retry the questions therein determined.

In the case under consideration, the question is narrowed to a contest between the father and mother for the possession of the children. They are of that age that they cannot choose for themselves. The father was a party to the divorce action, duly served with a summons, and had an opportunity to defend. Instead, he had violated the decree of the court, was adjudged guilty of contempt, and thereby forfeited his right to defend the action. The decree, nevertheless, is binding upon him, and had the same force and effect as if he had defended. It was adjudged upon the issues raised by the pleadings in the action that he is an unfit and improper person to have the custody and control of the children. That judgment is binding upon him, and full faith and credit must be given to it. He surreptitiously, and without the consent of the mother, removed the children from that State into this State. If the judgment of the Illinois Court is not binding upon him, the judgment of this court would not be in any other State of the Union. If, therefore, he should again surreptitiously remove the children to another State, she might again be compelled to litigate the same question in any State to which he saw fit to remove them. Such a rule would be unreasonable and unjust and, we think, ought not to prevail.

Upon the merits the relator's claim stands upon the testimony of herself and her sister, who has accompained her here from Chicago. As against them, there is voluminous evidence tending to show that the appellant is an educated man of good moral character, and a proper and fit person to have the care, custody and control of the children; that she was not a fit and proper person; that she had neglected them and allowed them to go ragged and dirty; that her father, years ago, used to be a man of wealth and standing, but that fifteen or sixteen years ago he was arrested at the instance of the government, charged with having defrauded the government in the manufacture of whisky, and had his property confiscated, and that because of that he was no longer regarded as a man of good character.

The referee, however, evidently believed the testimony of the relator and her sister, and has found as a fact that she was a fit and proper person for the custody of the children; that their surroundings would be wholesome if given into the custody of their mother and removed to the house of her father. He evidently took into consideration the fact that the appellant was born and brought up in the City of Rochester; that his mother, two brothers and three sisters still reside there; that he was surrounded by his relatives and friends, and that the relator had been compelled to follow her children from the State of Illinois, where they were born and reared, and where all of her own relatives and friends resided, to the City of Rochester, among strangers, accompanied only by her sister.

We have carefully read the entire evidence appearing in the appeal book, and we have discovered no reason why we should differ with the referee in the conclusion reached by him as to the facts.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the order should be affirmed, both upon the law and the facts, with costs.

Mr. Theodore Bacon, for appellant:

"The welfare of the children, and not the technical legal right, is the criterion by which to determine to whom the custody of the child shall be awarded."

Hurd, Habeas Corpus, § 462; Re Gregg, 5 N. Y. Legal Obs. 265, 267; People v. Brown, 35 Hun, 324; Re Maurer, 18 N. Y. Week Dig. 568.

Upon this question the Illinois decree not only is not conclusive, but it does not even profess to pass upon it; still further, the question was not before the court to be passed upon; and further yet, if the question had been before the court, and the court had assumed to pass upon it, its judgment could not have concluded the persons who are the subject of it who were infinitely more interested in its determination than all the world besides, and who nevertheless were not parties to the decree.

The utmost extent to which, even in the State of New York, the courts have ever gone in holding that the question of custody of a child is not always open for determination, is where a determination has been had upon direct proceedings by habeas corpus to determine that question, proceedings in which the child itself is both constructively and actually in court, and its rights and welfare are the sole subject for consideration. And then only while the material facts relating to the circumstances of the parties remain unchanged.

People v. Mercein, 3 Hill, 399.

The present case, however, is not only not one in which the Illinois decree pretended to pass upon the welfare of the children; it is not one in which any Illinois Court had any jurisdiction to pass upon the welfare of the children.

That the court of first instance wholly ignored the real issue for its determination, the welfare of the children, sufficiently appears from the referee's express statement that he has "not personally examined the said children, or inquired with whom they desire to live."

"The welfare of the child, then, being the object to be attained, no consideration calculated to influence the decision of the question should be overlooked; hence, the wishes of the child are consulted, not because it has a legal right to demand it, but because it is material for the court to understand them, that it may be the better prepared to exercise its discretion wisely. It is not the whim or caprice of the child which the court respects, but its feelings, its attachments, its reasonable preferences, and its probable contentment."

Hurd, Habeas Corpus, p. 529; Re McDowles, 8 Johns. 328; People v. Chegaray, 18 Wend. 637; People v. Pillow, 1 Sandf. 672; Re Doyle, Clarke, Ch. 154; People v. Weissenbuch, 60 N.Y. 385; Re Wollstonecraft, 4 Johns. Ch. 80.

Upon this issue, the burden is upon the relator to show that, for whatever reason, the existing custody of the child ought to be changed.

Thorndyke v. Rice, 24 Law Rep. 19.

The Illinois judgment in nowise determined this issue.

1. The children were not in Illinois, but were lawfully in New York, and under the protection of New York laws, equally with those born here.

Lemmon v. People, 20 N. Y. 563, 602–608; Woodworth v. Spring, 4 Allen, 321, 323.

2. The children were not parties to the Illinois action or in privity with either party.

3. The judgment did not pretend to adjudicate upon the welfare of the children, but only upon the rights of the parents.

4. Even an adjudication as to what their welfare required, in November, 1884, in Pekin, Illinois, would not determine what their welfare required in November, 1885 (still less in March, 1887), in Rochester, New York.

The question, What is for the children's welfare? circumstances having changed, is always open.

Thorndyke v. Rice, 24 Law Rep. 19.

The courts in America and in England have repeatedly upheld the welfare of the children against the rights of others to the children, however fixed by covenant or by judgment.

Re Besant, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 508; People v. Erbert, 17 Abb. Pr. 395; Woodworth v. Spring, 4 Allen, 321; Thorndyke v. Rice, 24 Law Rep. 19; Kline v. Kline, 57 Iowa, 386.

Mr. John M. Davy, for respondent:

Article 4, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States provides that:

"Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to public Acts, records and proceedings of every other State; and Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such Acts, records and proceedings shall be proved and the effect thereof."

Congress has exercised that power, and in effect has provided that the judicial records in one State shall be proved in the tribunals of any other, by the attestation of the clerk under the seal of the court, with the certificate of the judge that the attestation is in due form.

Second: "That such records so authenticated shall have such faith and credit given to them in every other court in the United States as they have by law and usage in the courts of the State from whence the said records were or shall be taken."

Hampton v. McConnell, 3 Wheat. 234 (16 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 378); Kinnier v. Kinnier, 45 N. Y. 544.

The courts of this State have repeatedly held that a judgment or decree of a court of a sister State possessing competent jurisdiction is final, not only as to the subject thereby determined, but as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated in the case, and which they might have had decided, and that the judgment can only be impeached on the ground of fraud or want of jurisdiction.

Dobson v. Pearce, 12 N. Y. 156; Embury v. Conner, 3 N. Y. 522; Kinnier v. Kinnier, 45 N. Y. 540; Ruger v. Heckel, 85 N. Y. 483; Kamp v. Kamp, 59 N. Y. 213, 216; Price v. Price, 55 N. Y. 656; Patrick v. Shaffer, 94 N. Y. 430.

The petitioner has a constitutional right to have the same effect given to the Illinois decree by the courts of this State that would be given to it in that State, if she had there instituted similar proceedings by habeas corpus to obtain the custody of her children.

Chew v. Brumagen, 13 Wall. 663 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 663).

The Court of Illinois had the legal right, under the laws of that State, to award the custody of the children to the mother when it granted the divorce.

Wilkinson v. Deming, 80 Ill. 342; Miner v. Miner, 11 Ill. 40; Burge v. Burge, 88 Ill. 164; R. S. of Ill. chap. 40 § 18.

The Illinois decree has not been reversed or modified by the courts of that State. The decree, therefore, should be treated as res judicata.

Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582 (62 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 226); Wakefield v. Ives, 35 Iowa, 240.

The Illinois, Ohio and Indiana Courts have held that where a divorce is granted the court in its judgment may assign the custody of the minor children to one of the parties; and such disposition of the children is binding between the parties and will control until the judgment is modified, upon a proper application to the court having jurisdiction, and that such judgment cannot be disregarded in a subsequent proceeding by habeas corpus to obtain possession of the children.

Hoffman v. Hoffman, 15 Ohio, 427; Williams v. Williams, 13 Ind. 528; Miner v. Miner, 11 Ill. 43.

The question as to the mother not being a proper person to have the custody of the children, was tried and decided in the divorce action; and that question must be regarded as settled and disposed of in accordance with the well settled principle of law that where it appears, as it clearly does by the records in that case, that the identical questions involved have been tried and passed upon, it is an estoppel which concludes the defendant in this proceeding.

Kerr v. Hays, 35 N.Y. 331; Patrick v. Shaffer, 94 N. Y. 430; Wilder v. Case, 16 Wend. 583; Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351, 352 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 195); Peck v. Callaghan, 95 N. Y. 73; Krekeler v. Ritter, 62 N. Y. 372.

Per Curiam:

We dismiss this appeal for the reason that the courts below, upon a view of all the existing facts relating to the welfare and interests of the infants, exercised their discretion in awarding to the mother the custody of the children; and, in so doing, gave to the Illinois decree not the force of an estoppel, or the conclusive effect sometimes due to a judgment, but simply regarded it as a fact or circumstance bearing upon the discretion to be exercised, without dictating or controlling it.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

All concur.

1. An Act of the State of Missouri provided that certificates of indebtedness for war claims of the militia should be issued and countersigned by the acting paymaster general, but the prescribed form of such certificates contained in the Act provided for their being countersigned by the acting quartermaster general. Held, that it appeared from the whole Act that it was intended that such certificates should be countersigned by the acting paymaster general, and hence that such a certificate so countersigned was not a void instrument, but was capable of being the subject of forgery.
2. Such certificates of indebtedness, creating a conditional obligation on the part of the State to pay the same only when it should have received the money from the United States, are not bills of credit, the issuance of which by the States is prohibited by the Federal Constitution.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of General Sessions on conviction of defendant under an indictment for forgery. Affirmed.

The defendant was convicted of uttering a forged certificate under an indictment drawn in pursuance of part 4, article 3, section 32 of the Revised Statutes. The certificate so uttered was as follows:

No. 2676. $347 $\frac{16}{100}$

It is hereby certified that the State of Missouri is indebted to Sanford Tunicliff in the sum of $347.16, on account of services in Co. B, 5th Regiment, E. M. M. This certificate is not payable by the State until after the claim of said Sanford Tunicliff for his services has been presented to the United States Government, and the amount allowed and paid to the State, and then only for the actual amount received from the United States Government.

City of Jefferson, Mo., Aug. 19, 1874.
Silas Woodson,
Governor of Mo.

J. D. Grafton,
Act'g Paymaster Gen'l.
(Indorsed) "S. Tunicliff."

By the Act of the Legislature of Missouri, approved March 19, 1874, it was provided, among other things, as follows:

Sec. 10. That, for the purpose of settling the claims of officers of the enrolled Missouri militia and Missouri militia for services rendered during the war, the acting paymaster general is hereby authorized to examine the claims of all officers and soldiers whose names appear as not paid, on the record of unpaid claims on file in his office; and if he finds such claims correct and just he shall allow the same and indorse said allowance on said claim; and if not correct he shall indorse such fact on the claims and return the same for correction; Provided, however, That whenever a person is reported on the record of unpaid claims as absent without leave, the acting paymaster general shall not audit and allow said claim until he has presented sufficient proof that he was not absent without leave or had not deserted.

Sec. 13. That the duplicate of all claims passed upon by the acting paymaster general shall be filed in his office—those rejected with the cause of their rejection, and those allowed with the amount allowed thereon; and the originals of all claims, with the indorsement of their allowance or rejection, shall be returned to the party filing the same; and on presentation of the original of any claim allowed as aforesaid to the acting paymaster general, he shall issue a certificate of state indebtedness for the amount allowed thereon, which certificate shall be signed by the Governor and countersigned by the acting paymaster general, and shall read as follows:

No. ——. $ ——.

It is hereby certified that the State of Missouri is indebted to in the sum of on account of services in company Regiment. This certificate is not payable by the State until after the claim of said for his services has been presented to the United States Government and the amount allowed and paid to the State, and then only for the actual amount received from the United States Government.

City of Jefferson, Missouri, 18 .
Governor of Missouri.

Countersigned:
Acting Quartermaster General of Missouri.

On appeal by defendant to the general term, the judgment and conviction was affirmed in the prevailing opinion delivered by DANIELS, J., as follows:

The certificate, for the uttering of which the defendant was convicted, was dated in August, 1874. It was issued under a law of the State of Missouri, enacted on the 7th of January of the same year, and it obligated the State of Missouri to pay the sum of $347.16, on account of services in Company B, Fifth Regiment of the Enrolled Missouri Militia, after the claim of the person therein named for his services had been presented to the United States Government, and the amount allowed had been by it paid to the State, and then only for the actual amount received from the United States Government. This was an evidence of debt, or engagement for the payment of money upon a contingency, the forging and uttering of which was made a crime under the statute of the State upon which the indictment was found. 3 R. S. 6th ed. 944, § 33, subd. 1.

That the contingency was a remote one, upon which the payment was to be made, did not exclude the certificate from the operation and effect of this statute. It was still an engagement for the payment of money upon a future contingency. The statute of the State of Missouri, under which it was issued, provided for the auditing and allowance of two classes of claims: the first included claims on file in the office of the quartermaster general, or which should be there filed up to the first of August, 1874, and were denominated irregular claims, including generally quartermaster's supplies. The other provisions of the statute included claims of officers and soldiers of the enrolled Missouri militia and the Missouri militia, for services rendered during the war; and the claim, for which the certificate set forth in the indictment and for the uttering of which the defendant was convicted was issued, was of this description. The statute, by its tenth section, authorized and empowered the acting paymaster general to examine such claims on file in his office, and provided when he should find them correct and just that he should allow the same, and indorse his allowance on the claims; and by the thirteenth section of the Act it was further provided that a duplicate of each claim allowed should be filed in the office of the paymaster general. And it was then directed that "He shall issue a certificate of state indebtedness for the amount allowed thereon, which certificate shall be signed by the Governor, and countersigned by the acting paymaster general, and shall read as follows:" A form of the certificate was then given which at its foot contained on the left side the word "countersigned," followed by a space for the name, and that, in completing the line, is further followed by the words "Acting Quartermaster General of Missouri."

As the statute was enacted, therefore, it in its language directed the certificate to be issued by the acting paymaster general; while the form prescribed dispensed with his authentication of the certificate and provided for that being done by the quartermaster general. In this manner a direct conflict was created between the mandatory provision of the Act, and the form prescribed for carrying it into effect; and the question presented on this part of the case is, Which was the paramount authority? And its solution depends upon the intent and design of the Act as that has been disclosed; and that seems to be consistent only with the construction that the certificate should be signed and authenticated by the officer whose duty it was made to examine the claim upon which it should be issued.

This construction is sustained by the general purposes and objects of the Act; for the officers who were to examine, audit and allow the claims provided for were those in whose offices they were at the time, or should afterwards be filed. Those relating to the quartermaster general's department were filed, and were directed to be filed. He was the person who in the ordinary course of the exercise of his authority would be best acquainted with the merits of that description of claims, while he could not reasonably be expected to be familiar with the other class, including only the claims of the officers and soldiers in the militia. Those claims appertain to, and were especially within the province of the paymaster general, and it was to his audit and allowance that they were committed by the Act,

The Act further provided that when the claims subjected to the commission of which the quartermaster general was a member should be allowed, that they should be certified by a certificate authenticated in the form consistent with that allowance, by the acting quartermaster general of the State. He had no duty whatever to perform, concerning the claims made for the services rendered by the officers and soldiers of the militia, and could not be familiar with them, as he would be with the other class of claims; and it would not reasonably be expected that he should certify, as correct claims, those he was not required to examine or investigate and of which he could practically have no knowledge.

But what the Legislature designed by the Act was that the claims of each class should be certified by the officer knowing the fact of the truth of the certificate required to be made. And that intention is further disclosed by the thirteenth section of the Act directing the acting paymaster general to issue the certificates of state indebtedness for the amounts allowed for the services of the officers and soldiers; and he could not do that without authenticating them, as the law intended that to be done; and from that fact, as well as the general scope and tenor of the Act, it is quite manifest that in giving the form of the certificate in the Act, to be issued by the acting paymaster general, a mistake was made in omitting his official designation, and in place of it inserting the word "quartermaster." And as this was evidently a mistake it is required to be rejected, for the intent of the Act is clearly to that effect, and that intent is required to be followed in its construction.

That has not only been manifested by its general object and purpose, but in addition to that by the explicit direction that the paymaster general should be the officer who with the Governor should issue the certificate. This certificate must, accordingly, be held to have been issued in compliance with the authority contained in the Act, inasmuch as it was certified by the Governor and by the acting paymaster general. Upon its face, therefore, it was not a void instrument issued under the statute, and accordingly incapable of being the subject of a forgery within the principle supported by the cases of Cunningham v. People, 4 Hun, 455; and Fadner v. People, 2 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 553, and by 2 Bish. Crim. Laws, 553.

Neither was it invalidated by anything contained in section 52 of article 4 of the Constitution of the State of Missouri adopted in 1875; for that merely prohibited an appropriation of money by the Legislature of the State to pay these certificates until after the claims audited had been presented to and paid by the Government of the United States to the State of Missouri. This section of the Constitution leaves the certificates precisely as they were allowed to be made and issued under the Act of 1874.

The obligation expressed in them, as that was provided for by the Act, was in no manner changed or intended to be changed by the Constitution, and indeed it could not have been, as the Constitution of the United States restrained the State of Missouri from passing any Act impairing the obligation of its contracts. But it left the certificates as they had been issued, creating an obligation against the State to pay over the money whenever it should be received from the Government of the United States.

These instruments, being merely certificates of indebtedness to be paid by the State when the money should be received from the Federal Government, were not designed to be used or circulated in any form as money, but only to exhibit the obligation incurred by the State to the person named in each certificate; and they were accordingly not bills of credit, which the State was forbidden to issue by the Federal Constitution.

That was held in Craig v. Missouri, 4 Pet. 410-432 [29 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 903], not to include "contracts by which a State binds itself to pay money at a future day for services actually received or for money borrowed for present uses." And as a certificate of indebtedness it was capable of being sold and transferred by the person to whom it is stated to have been issued for evidence of an indebtedness, not restricted in the right to transfer it, may be assigned by the holder to any other person or persons, and a delivery of the instrument intending to pass the title to it is in judgment of law equivalent to its formal assignment, giving the assignee the right to demand and receive the money mentioned in it.

Upon neither of the grounds which have been considered, nor for any other reason presented by the case, does the conviction appear to have been unwarranted. It was, on the contrary, legal and regular, and the judgment should be affirmed.

Messrs. Alexander S. Bacon and Abraham Suydam, for appellant:

An instrument, to be the subject of forgery, must have upon its face some legal validity or efficacy. If it be legally null, void or invalid, it cannot be the subject of forgery.

Bish. Crim. Law, § 523; People v. Harrison, 8 Barb. 560; Moffat's Case, 2 East, P. A forgery may be "of any writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy or the foundation of a legal liability."

Bish. Crim. Law, § 523.

"It is not alone sufficient that there be a writing and that the writing be false; it must also be such as, if true, would be of some legal efficacy, real or apparent, since otherwise it has no legal tendency to defraud."

Bish. Crim. Law, § 533.

It is claimed that the certificate in question is not "an evidence of debt or engagement for the payment of money absolutely or upon any contingency."

Rev. Stat. § 32.

It has no "legal efficacy, real or apparent," and is not "the foundation of a legal liability."

Bish. Crim. Law, § 523.

The certificate in question is invalid on its face, because it does not conform to the requirements of the statute.

"A writing invalid on its face cannot be the subject of forgery, because it has no legal tendency to effect a fraud."

"If a statute authorizes an instrument not known to the common law, and so prescribes its form as to render any other form null, forgery cannot be committed by making a false statutory one in a form not provided for by the statute, even though it is so like the genuine as to deceive most persons."

Bish. Crim. Law, § 538; Cunningham v. People, 4 Hun, 455.

There is a fatal variance between the statutory form and the alleged forgery, and the certificate is, therefore, invalid.

Judgment affirmed on prevailing opinion below.

Clandius SHATTUCK et al., by Guardian, Respts.,
v.
George BASCOM, Appt

1. After land had been sold for taxes and the comptroller's deed given therefor, the original owner executed to a third person an instrument which purported to be a deed of the land but which was in reality a mortgage, and the grantee therein sued the holder of the comptroller's deed to remove the same as a cloud on title, which suit resulted in a judgment in favor of the holder of the comptroller's deed; thereafter the plaintiff in that suit reconveyed the land to the original owner. Held, that the original owner was not estopped by said judgment in the suit brought by his mortgagee, from afterwards questioning the validity of the comptroller's deed, in an action against him by the holder of such deed.
2. Where the statute prescribes the form of oath to be taken by the assessors and attached to the assessment roll, that form must be followed; and an assessment will be invalid if there is any material departure therefrom.
3. The substitution of "hereof" for "of proof," in the clause "value of the said real estate has been changed by reason of proof produced before us" in the assessors' oath prescribed by chapter 176 of the Laws of 1851, will render an assessment under that Act wholly void.

4. When a tax sale is for the aggregate taxes of several years, the entire sale will be rendered illegal and invalid and the comptroller's deed void, if the tax for any one of the years included is invalid.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Cattaraugus Circuit on a verdict directed for plaintiffs in an action to recover for hemlock bark cut and peeled from trees on premises alleged to be owned by plaintiffs. Reversed.

The facts and questions appear from the opinion.

Mr. E. D. Northrup, for appellant:

Every person may peaceably take possession of his own real estate.

Bliss v. Johnson, 73 N. Y. 529; Johnson v. Elwood, 53 N. Y. 431; Wood v. Phillips, 43 N. Y. 152; Benson v. Bolles, 8 Wend. 75.

The acts of the defendant amounted to actual possession and occupation at the time the taxes were assessed and levied, and also at the time the bark was taken.

Thompson v. Burhans, 79 N. Y. 99, 100; Miller v. Long Island R. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 383, 384.

The defendant was not a party to the action of Colman v. Shattuck.

The fact that Colman mistook his remedy and assumed to own the title under the mortgage, because it was in form a quitclaim deed, cannot prejudice the rights of the defendant, who was then a powerless debtor in the hands of Colman.

Otis v. Williams, 70 N. Y. 211.

The cases of bona fide purchasers for value of the mortgagee, whose mortgage is in form an absolute deed, do not apply to this case.

Berdell v. Berdell, 20 N. Y. Week. Dig. 81; McBurney v. Wellman, 42 Barb. 390.

The rules that apply to any other mortgage apply to the one in this case.

Clark v. Angell, 17 N. Y. Week. Dig. 29; Pardee v. Treat, 82 N. Y. 385; Miller v. McGuckin, 20 N.Y. Week. Dig. 429; Dodd v. Neilson, 90 N. Y. 243; Bond v. Collins, 18 N. Y. Week. Dig. 90; Gross v. Wellwood, 90 N. Y. 638.

The subsequent payment of this mortgage by the defendant left the full unincumbered title in the defendant.

Bond v. Collins, supra.

No instrument of any kind was needed, to accomplish this, and the quitclaim deeds from Colman to the defendant were in effect only satisfaction pieces made for the purpose of formally clearing up the record in the clerk's office.

Becker v. Howard, 47 How. Pr. 428; Same v. Same, 66 N. Y. 5; Pardee v. Treat, 82 N. Y. 385; 4 Hun, 359.

The following cases also show the law to be well settled that there is no distinction between the mortgage in the case at bar and any other mortgage.

Carr v. Carr, 52 N. Y. 251; Stoddard v. Whiting, 46 N. Y. 627; Genet v. Davenport, 56 N. Y. 676; Decker v. Leonard, 6 Lans. 264; Payne v. Wilson, 74 N. Y. 348; Morris v. Budlong, 78 N. Y. 543; Murray v. Walker, 31 N. Y. 399; Ford v. Belmont, 3 Jones & S. 135.

The plaintiffs not being bona fide purchasers under Colman, the mistaken action of Colman v. Shattuck cannot operate as an estoppel upon Bascom, who was not a party to it or a privy in any manner.

Murray v. Walker, 31 N. Y. 401.

For this reason the defendant's exception to the direction of the verdict was well taken.

Adams v. Filer, 7 Wis. 306; Carney v. Emmons, 9 Wis. 114; 1 Buller, N. P. 232; Chicago v. Robbins, 4 Wall. 657 (71 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 427); Campbell v. Hall, 16 N. Y. 575.

A mortgage is not an estate in lands.

Power v Lester, 23 N. Y. 533.

This action of replevin was improperly brought and cannot be maintained.

Barrett v. Warren, 3 Hill, 348.

Trespass (and therefore replevin) cannot be maintained for an injury to land committed by a person in actual possession, except for the original trespass (if any) of his entry.

Stockwell v. Phelps, 34 N. Y. 363; Wohler v. Buffalo etc. R. R. Co. 46 N. Y. 686; Wood v. La Fayette, 68 N. Y. 181, 190; Beals v. Stewart, 6 Lans. 408; Rich v. Baker, 3 Denio, 79; Holmes v. Seely, 19 Wend. 507; Houghtailing v. Houghtailing, 56 Barb. 194.

The plaintiffs' title being, as we shall see, void, the oldest possession would control; and the defendant was in actual possession as early as 1854, and has ever since remained in possession as fully as such premises can be possessed, claiming under the original title thereto.

Wood v. La Fayette, supra; Kellogg v. Vollentine, 21 How. Pr. 226; Rowland v. Fuller, How. App. Cas. 629; Haley v. Wheeler, 8 Hun. 569; Edwards v. Noyes, 65 N. Y. 125.

In order to recover, the plaintiffs must show title to the land in controversy, under the comptroller's tax sale of 1866. The said tax sale and consequently said tax deed are void. The land was sold for the accumulated taxes of three different years.

Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat. 119 (19 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 221); Nat. Fire Ins. Co. v. McKay, 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 445.

The case of Colman v. Shattuck, 62 N. Y. 348, does not in any manner decide this point. That case only decided that section 33, chapter 427, Laws of 1855, was directory as to the time that the comptroller should proceed to advertise and sell.

One erroneous tax vitiates the whole sale.

The evasion of the plain command of the statute in making a proper oath to the assessment roll of 1856 is a fatal error.

Where the interest of another is to be affected by an order which a statute says shall be drawn up in certain words, giving the form, by a schedule, this must be exactly pursued, or the order is void.

Atkins v. Kinnan, 20 Wend. 249.

The form of the assessor's oath is prescribed by the statute.

3 Edmonds, Stat. at Large, 350, § 8.

Messrs. Cary & Rumsey, for respondents: The judgment record in Colman v. Shattuck, 62 N. Y. 348, is conclusive.

Smith v. Smith, 79 N. Y. 634; Bennett v. Couchman, 48 Barb. 73.

Every judgment shall be conclusive as to the title established in the action against the party and all persons claiming under him.

Laws 1862, chap. 485; Cagger v. Lansing, 64 N. Y. 417.

The precise question which the defendant seeks to litigate in this action is the question whether the tax deeds under which plaintiffs hold were regularly issued and are valid. That was the precise question litigated in Colman v. Shattuck. There is no material difference in the facts presented in each case.

Smith v. Smith, 79 N. Y. 634.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court: The plaintiffs commenced this action to recover a quantity of hemlock bark which the defendant had peeled and taken from the trees standing on lot No. 54, containing 150 acres of land, situated in the Town of Portville, in the County of Cattaraugus. The defendant in his answer denied the plaintiffs' title to the land, and averred that he owned the land, consequently the bark taken therefrom.

Upon the trial it appeared that the plaintiffs claimed title under a deed executed by the comptroller of the State, pursuant to a sale of land in 1866, for arrears of taxes for the years 1856, 1858 and 1860. It is undisputed that the defendant has good title to the land unless it has been defeated by the tax sale and the deed of the comptroller.

The defendant claims that there were certain defects in the imposition of the taxes, and in the subsequent proceedings which rendered the comptroller's deed invalid. But the plaintiffs claim that he is estopped from assailing the comptroller's deed by certain facts which will now be mentioned:

In 1869 the defendant executed a quitclaim deed of the land to one Colman, which was duly recorded in the proper clerk's office, and while he held that deed and the apparent title to the land in 1873, Colman commenced an action against the father of the plaintiffs, under whom they claim, to set aside the comptroller's deed as a cloud upon his title, on the ground that the tax sale was void and the deed given in pursuance thereof invalid.

That action was tried and resulted in a judgment in favor of the defendant therein, which was finally affirmed in this court. Colman v. Shattuck, 2 Hun, 497, affirmed in 62 N. Y. 348.

Subsequently to the entry of that judgment, and before the commencement of this action, Colman reconveyed the land to this defendant; and upon the trial of this action it was undisputed that the deed by this defendant to Colman was given as security and was in fact a mortgage.

The trial judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, upon the ground that this defendant was bound and estopped by that judgment. Upon appeal by the defendant to the general term, the judgment of the trial term was affirmed, as appears by the opinion there pronounced, upon the ground that the plaintiffs' tax title was valid. But the court there further held that the defendant was not estopped by the judgment between his mortgagee and plaintiffs' father.

Although the conveyance from the defendant to Colman was in form a deed, it was in fact a mortgage and had all the incidents of a mortgage. Colman could not, upon that deed, have maintained an action of ejectment against his grantor or any other person. All that he acquired by the deed was a lien upon the land for the security of his debt; and upon payment of the debt his interest in the land and his lien thereon would absolutely cease. Reconveyance by him to this defendant was not necessary to reinvest him with the absolute title, and was necessary only to clear up the record title; Murray v. Walker, 31 N. Y. 399; Horn v. Keteltas, 46 N. Y. 605; Carr v. Carr, 52 N. Y. 251; Morris v. Budlong, 78 N. Y. 543; therefore the defendant did not in any sense take his title from Colman, but his title was anterior to any interest which Colman had in the land; and the legal title was in him at the time of the pendency of the action of Colman v. Shattuck. He was not a party to that action, and it was not carried on at his instance or for his benefit; and therefore he is not bound or estopped by the judgment rendered therein.

It would be quite a novel doctrine to hold that a mortgagor is bound and estopped by a judgment rendered in an action by the mortgagee against some other person to which he was not a party. It was, therefore, open to the defendant upon the trial of this action to assail the title of the plaintiffs.

The Act, chap. 209, Laws 1860, made the comptroller's deed presumptive evidence that the sale and all proceedings prior thereto were regular according to the provisions of law directing the same or in any manner relating thereto. But as the Act made the deed only presumptive evidence, a party against whom a tax title is asserted still has the right to show by any competent evidence that the proceedings for the assessment and collection of the taxes were illegal and defective, and that the comptroller's deed is in fact invalid.

Upon the trial of this action, and upon the argument of the appeal in this court, the counsel for the defendant pointed out various defects and irregularities, on account of which he claimed that the comptroller's deed is invalid. But we deem it important now to consider but one of the alleged defects, and that relates to the taxes of 1856.

The law in force at that time (chap. 176, Laws 1851) prescribed the form of oath which the assessors or a majority of them should take and attach to the assessment roll, and that, so far as pertains to real estate, is as follows:

"We, the undersigned, do severally depose and swear that we have set down in the foregoing assessment roll all the real estate situated in the (town or ward as the case may be) according to our best information; and that, with the exception of those cases in which the value of the said real estate has been changed by reason of proof produced before us, we have estimated the value of the said real estate at the sums which a majority of the assessors have decided to be the full and true value thereof, and at which they would appraise the same in payment of a just debt due from a solvent debtor."

This oath is intended to secure a just valuation of property to be taxed, and is thus for the protection of taxpayers and no assessment can be valid unless it has the sanction of the oath. The Legislature having prescribed the precise form of oath to be taken, that form must be followed; and an assessment will be invalid if there is any material departure therefrom; and so it has been held. Van Rensselaer v. Witbeck, 7 N. Y. 517; Parish v. Golden, 35 N. Y. 462; Bellinger v. Gray, 51 N.Y. 610; Westfall v. Preston, 49 N. Y. 349; Merritt v. PortChester, 71 N.Y. 309.

In the oath upon the assessment roll for 1856 a fatal defect appears. Instead of the language "value of the said real estate has been changed by reason of proof produced before us," the word "hereof" was inserted instead of the words "of proof;" so that the language is: "with the exception of those cases in which the value of the said real estate has been changed by reason hereof produced before us we have estimated the value of said real estate at the sums which a majority of the assessors decided to be the full and true value thereof."

The purport of that is simply that they had estimated the value of the real estate at the sums which a majority of the assessors decided to be the full and true value thereof, except in those cases in which the value had been changed for some reason undisclosed. That oath could have been truthfully taken by the assessors, even if they had overestimated or underestimated real estate and had thus made their assessment entirely unequal and unjust. Thus the entire value of the oath was lost, and it answered no purpose whatever so far as it pertained to the assessment of real estate, and might as well have been entirely omitted. Its form was such that it could not have laid the foundation for an indictment for perjury, no matter how grossly the assessors had violated their duty.

It must be presumed that the form of the oath prescribed by the statute was before the assessors at the time the oath was written; and we may assume that the material departure from the words of the statute was probably intentional, to accomplish some purpose not allowed by the letter of the law. We, therefore, entertain no doubt that this defect in the oath rendered the assessment of 1856 wholly void; and as the tax sale was made for the aggregate taxes of 1856, 1858 and 1860, the entire sale was illegal and invalid, and the deed given in pursuance thereof void. Blackwell, Tax Titles, 160; Riverside Co. v. Howell, 113 Ill. 256; Re Willis, 30 Hun, 13; People v. Hagadorn, 36 Hun, 610, recently affirmed in this court, 6 Cent. Rep. 658.

The invalidity of the comptroller's deed, on account of the defect in the oath of the assessors, did not come under consideration in Colman v. Shattuck. In that case there was no allegation of such a defect, and the record by some inadvertence, showed that the oath was correctly transcribed from the statute.

Therefore, without considering other alleged defects in the tax proceedings to which our attention has been called, we are of opinion that the judgment of the General and Special Terms should be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide event.

All concur.

1. Under a provision in a will empowering the executors to "receive the rents, interest and income," and to apply the net amounts of such rents and income to the use of the widow of the testator during her life, and after her death to divide the remaining estate among his heirs, a dividend declared upon railroad stock, assets of the estate, before the death of the testator but payable after his death, belonged to the executors. As soon as the profits on shares of the stock are ascertained and declared, they cease to be the property of the company, and the owner of the shares becomes entitled to the dividend; the fact that they are made payable at a future time is immaterial.
2. Prior to the death of the testator the railroad company, beyond its dividends earned and paid out, accumulated securities, money, and other assets, from earnings over and above expenses and dividends, and some two months after the testator's death it had on hand $1,102,000, as a sinking fund for the redemption of outstanding obligations; and at that time an agreement was entered into between certain stockholders, among them the executors, and a canal association, for the sale of their stock to the canal association for $250 for each share, and providing that the canal association should have the sinking fund, but that the stockholders should be paid a ratable portion of this surplus, which amounted to $15.74 per share. Held, that the price paid for the shares, although increased by this prospective advantage, belonged altogether to the remaindermen and was properly carried to principal and not income.
3. A dividend declared upon the stock by the railroad company after the death of the testator, from accumulated net earnings of the company running back for a considerable period of time, went to the widow as income under the provision of the will. Payments in respect to profits accruing and properly divisible as such, are income, and belong to the tenant for life, if the sum payable is ascertained and declared after the death of the testator.
4. A privilege or option to subscribe for and take at par, one or more bonds or shares of stock for a certain number of shares of stock before held by the estate, if accepted, operated as a change in the manner of investment of so much of the estate; and the value belonged to the estate and not to the life tenant.

5. Where the testator had held the principal moneys in hand for the purpose of investment and reinvestment, but mingled them with his own funds, it was not improper in settling with the life tenant whose funds were so held, to charge the testator with interest upon interest, as he forebore investment and used the moneys for his own convenience.
6. Under a provision in the will in these words: "It is also my request that all persons herein named as executors will consent to act as such executors and trustees; and that each executor and trustee, other than my wife, do also receive and take the full rate and commissions provided by law for each executor, intending thus to provide suitable compensation for their services in addition to the duties herein devolved upon them," the intention of the testator was to exclude his wife from compensation. Substantially the whole income of the estate, the result of the management of the executors, of whom she was one, is given to her, and it was not intended that she should be paid for caring for it.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a decree of the Surrogate of the County of New York on a judicial settlement of the account of executors. Decree and judgment modified and affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. M. W. Divine, for John Duer, executor of Eveline G. Marshall, the widow, appellant:

In this State the rule has never been questioned that cash dividends declared during a life tenancy from accumulated earnings, or profits, belong to the life tenant, whether such dividends be large or small.

Woodruff's Est. 1 Tucker, 58: Clarkson v. Clarkson, 18 Barb. 646; Simpson v. Moore, 30 Barb. 627; Goldsmith v. Swift, 25 Hun, 201; Riggs v. Cragg, 26 Hun, 103; S. C. 89 N. Ch. 240, 379; Scovel v. Roosevelt, 5 Redf. 121.

The question suggested but not passed upon in Riggs v. Cragg, 89 N. Y. 487, relates to the distribution as between capital and income of stock dividends, not of cash dividends.

The rule which now prevails in England on this subject is stated in the case of Sproule v. Bouch, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 653, as follows:

"When the testator or settlor directs or permits the subject of his disposition to remain as shares of stock in a company which has the power either of distributing its profits as dividends or of converting them into capital, and the company validly exercises this power, such exercise of its power is binding on all persons interested under him (the testator or settlor) in the shares, and, consequently what is paid by the company as dividend goes to the tenant for life; and what is paid by the company to the shareholder as capital, or appropriated as an increase of the capital stock of the concern, inures to the benefit of all who are interested in the capital. In a word, what the company says is income shall be income; and what it says is capital shall be capital."

In 2 Perry on Trusts, 3d ed. § 544, the rule is stated as follows: "Thus cash dividends, extra dividends or bonuses, declared from the earnings of corporations are now held to be income, and to belong to the tenant for life. So also dividends and bonuses earned before the testator's death, but declared afterwards, are held to be income and to belong to the tenant for life."

In Massachusetts the rule is well settled that cash dividends, however large, are income.

The same rule as to cash dividends prevails in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Rhode Island, New Hampshire and Connecticut.

The stock options or dividends were properly classed as income; and the rulings of the referee and surrogate, holding them to be principal, should be reversed.

I. Compound interest should never be calculated, except by special agreement made on consideration after the simple interest has become due.

Young v. Hill, 67 N. Y. 162; Connecticut v. Jackson, 1 Johns. Ch. 13.

The statute providing for the award of commissions by the surrogate, on the settlement of an executor's accounts, is not mandatory; it only furnishes a definite rule as to amount when any such rule is to be applied. It does not restrict a testator from fixing a compensation to the exclusion of statutory commissions, nor from forbidding any compensation whatever.

II. The day when a dividend is declared determines its ownership, without reference to the day of payment.

The amount which was admitted to be the value of the options and privileges, which the decree adjudged must be paid back by Eveline G. Marshall to the estate, was properly so adjudged to be paid back. The value of all such options and privileges were in all cases, capital.

Mr. William Jay, as special guardian for Marie Marshall, daughter of John R. Marshall, appellant and respondent:

The ownership of a dividend is determined on the day when it is declared, without reference to the day when it is actually paid.

Hyatt v. Allen, 56 N. Y. 553; Hall v. Newichawanick Co. 8 Hun, 459; affirmed in 71 N. Y. 593; Goldsmith v. Swift, 25 Hun, 201.

By the custom of the street, dividends remain attached to the ownership of the stock until the books of transfer are closed. In this case the books closed before the testator died.

The contention of Mrs. Marshall's executors: that the value of the options to subscribe for other stock was properly classed by the executors as income, and that the learned surrogate erred in allotting this sum to principal, is untenable. The fact that options to subscribe for stock at par have any value shows of itself that the corporate property must have advanced in value. The giving, by the corporation, of a privilege to each of its stockholders to subscribe for stock at less than its market price is, after all, only another way of making a new issue of stock to represent increased value of the corporate property.

Atkins v. Albree, 94 Mass. 359; Boardman v. Lake Shore etc. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 157; Moss' App. 83 Pa. 364; Minot v. Paine, 99 Mass. 101; Re Barton's Trust, L. R. 5 Eq. 238; Brinley v. Grou, 50 Conn. 66.

The rule upon the best settled authorities seems to be as follows: 1, a stockholder has no claim to the surplus until divided by the directors: 2, every dividend which increases the capitol stock of a corporation, whether in stock, scrip, or stock purchasing checks, is capital.

This last rule seems to be followed by the latest English cases, and also in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

The interest paid to Mrs. Marshall on her money in the testator's hands is excessive, in that interest is calculated upon interest; whereas, if the estate of the testator is liable for interest at all, simple interest only can be recovered.

Until a dividend is declared, the earnings pass with the transfer of the stock as a portion of the capital of the company.

Boardman v. Lake Shore etc. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 177.

When, however, a dividend is declared the amount represented by the dividend becomes entirely severed from the stock and will not pass to a purchaser of the stock, even though it is not payable until a subsequent date.

Hyatt v. Allen, 56 N. Y. 553; Hill v. Newichawanick Co. 8 Hun, 459; 71 N. Y. 593.

Every dividend which proceeds from a sale of corporate property is prima facie capital, no matter what form it takes. Every dividend which increases the capital stock of a corporation, whether in stock, scrip, or stock purchasing checks, is prima facie capital. Every dividend of cash, which neither directly nor indirectly (as in the case of checks empowered to purchase new stock) increases the capital stock of the corporation, is prima facie income. In every case evidence should be received to show when the dividend (whether in stock or cash) was earned, and the allottment must be made on this basis, the burden of proof, however, being always on the one claiming against the above rules. The principle of such apportionment is recognized.

The options or privileges are in no sense a dividend of the earnings, profit or income of the corporation.

Atkins v. Albree, 12 Allen, 359.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the supreme court affirming a decree of the surrogate of the County of New York, on a judicial settlement of the account of the executors of John R. Marshall, deceased.

The account was objected to by several of the parties interested, and with the objections, sent to a referee to hear and determine. Upon the coming in of his report, it was in substance confirmed by the surrogate, and upon appeal to the general term, his decision was affirmed.

All parties claim under the will of Mr. Marshall; and the principal questions now raised, concern the rights of the donee for life and the remaindermen, and depend for an answer upon the true construction of so much of the will as empowers the executors "to receive the rents, interest and income" of so much of the estate as was given to them in trust, to apply the net amounts of such rents or income to the use of the widow of the testator during her life, and after her death to divide the remaining estate among his surviving daughters and the issue, if any, of such as may have died.

Among the items of personal property left by the testator was one of 5,000 shares of the capital stock of the Panama Railroad Company. This was inventoried by the executors, at $100 per share, as its par value, and $275, as its market value, and $1,375,000 as its assessed value. On the 14th of April, 1881, a dividend of $25,000 (No. 90) was declared upon this stock, payable May 2, 1881.

The testator died during the night of April 20, at ten minutes past 11 o'clock. The executors treated this dividend as principal, and charged themselves with it in these words.

"Panama dividend declared April 14, 1881. Books closed for transfer April 20, 1881, 2 P. M., and payable May 2, 1881." Mrs. Marshall, the widow and executrix of the testator, objected to this in both characters, alleging that no such amount as the said sum of $25,000 formed any part of the estate of John R. Marshall at the time of his death, and that said statement and item and said amount of $25,000 should be stricken from said inventory and from said account, and added to the items of income and as such received by the executors.

The decision of the surrogate was against her contention, and we think properly. As soon as the profits on shares of stock are ascertained and declared, they cease to be the property of the company, and the owner of the shares becomes entitled to the dividend. It at once forms part of his estate. The fact that they are made payable at a future time is immaterial.

The dividend to which the life tenant may be entitled, as income, can only be that which the company may declare after that relation is acquired. In this case the dividend represented profits, or income, but had become a debt before the will took effect. Mrs. Marshall was entitled to income merely.

In Cogswell v. Cogswell, 2 Edw. Ch. 231, cited by the appellant, the testator directed that his wife be permitted "to take the interest or dividends" on certain stock, and the question submitted was "as to the time from which she would be entitled to dividends," and the vice chancellor said, "from the death of the testator, * * * that is to say," he adds, "the dividends which may accrue, or be declared, or become payable at any time after" that event.

The terms of the will and the question were unlike those before us. The will in one case gives income or profits, in the other, dividends, that is the share of income or profits already ascertained and declared. The first gives that to which the testator had no legal title. The other might include that of which he became the legal owner on the day when the dividend was declared, although it remained unpaid. Hyatt v. Allen, 56 N. Y. 553; Hill v. Newichawanick Co. 8 Hun, 459; affirmed in 71 N. Y. 593.

Second. It is stated in the account that the 5,000 shares of Panama Railroad stock were sold to the Panama Canal Company for $265.74⅞ per share, making $1,328,714.82. The life tenant objected to the account in this respect, alleging that in fact the stock was sold at $250 per share only and not $265.74⅞, as in the account stated.

The facts, so far as they are deemed material in presenting this question, and as found by the referee, show that prior to the death of the testator, the Panama Railroad Company had not only earned and paid dividends, but had accumulated securities, money and other assets from earnings over and above expenses and dividends, and on the 10th of June, 1881, had on hand $1,102,000 as a sinking fund for the redemption of outstanding obligations.

On the day last named an agreement was entered into between certain stockholders of the Railroad Company and the Universal Inter-Oceanic Canal Association for the sale of their stock to the Canal Association for $250 for each share, and also providing that the Canal Company should have the sinking fund, but that the stockholders should be paid by the Canal Company a sum equal to a ratable proportion of the $1,102,000 sinking fund above named, which was equivalent to $15.74 per share of the capital stock. This makes the sum of $78,714.84, and in the account of the executors is merged in the price at which the stock was sold to the Canal Company and credited to principal.

This was sustained by the referee and surrogate, the life tenant excepting thereto and claiming that it should have been carried to income. We think the exception cannot stand. The money was not paid as a dividend, nor was it distributed among stockholders, but only to such as sold their shares to the new company, the Canal Association. Indeed as stockholder, no one received any part of it. It was paid as a price to the seller.

The Panama Railroad Company was not dissolved; and its stockholders who did not sell have continued to receive dividends, and the Canal Company which purchased the shares once owned by the testator have received in like manner dividends on the shares so purchased.

Had the shares been retained by the executors, the money in question would not have been received by them. It is true that the sale in effect carried with it the interest which each shareholder as a member of the company had in the sinking fund, so that as to that the new shareholder was substituted for the old. The fund was the accumulation of profits and may properly be regarded as part of the capital of the company. But it still remained pledged for the bonds for the payment of which it was created, and its possible value only enhanced the value of the shares.

The price paid for the shares, although increased by this prospective advantage, belonged altogether to the remaindermen, and was properly carried to principal and not income.

Third. It was also provided, in the same agreement of June 10, that all earnings of the Railroad Company to and including June, 1881, and all moneys and other effects not by that agreement to be left with the Railroad Company, should be transferred by the Railroad Company to a trustee "for the benefit of all the existing stockholders," and belong to, and be divided among the shareholders "who are such at the time of the declaration of such dividend" or transfer of the Railroad Company. This was not carried out; but before June 30 the assets so referred to were sold and transferred by the Railroad Company to a syndicate for the sum of $1,698,200, and this was paid to the Railroad Company June 30, 1881. It amounted to $24.26 on each share of the capital stock of the Railroad Company, and on the same day the Railroad Company on the report of its treasurer that the amount of funds on hand "subject to distribution was sufficient to authorize a dividend of $24.26 upon each share of the capital stock of the company, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a dividend of $24.26 on each share of the capital stock of this company be, and the same is, hereby declared payable on and after Monday, the first day of August next, to the stockholders of record or their legal representatives. That the books of transfer be closed on the afternoon of the 30th instant, and be reopened on the morning of the second of August, 1881."

This dividend was numbered "91" in regular order, and was payable and paid at the time the usual quarterly dividends were paid. It appeared also that the assets, which formed the consideration of the payment by the syndicate, were accumulated net earnings, represented by cash or securities calling for cash.

The executors credited to income the above amount of $24.26 per share, making $121,300. It was objected, in behalf of the remaindermen, that the above credit to income was wrong, and that the sum of $121,300 should have gone into the principal of the estate.

The referee finds and reports that of this sum only $22,442.85 should be regarded as income belonging to the life tenant, and the residue, $98,857.15 should be regarded as a portion of the corpus of the estate. To so much of this finding as apportions any part to principal, exception was taken in behalf of the life tenant.

The referee made the apportionment in question by ascertaining how much was earned before and how much after the death of the testator; and so doing applied a rule which may be founded on general equity, viz.: that when a fund is given for life to one beneficiary, and remainder over, the first shall have its earnings after his life tenancy begins, and the remainderman the balance.

I find nothing in the will which indicates that the testator intended any such investigation or division, or that any other than the ordinary rule, which gives cash dividends declared from accumulated earnings or profits to the life tenant, should be applied. His direction to his executors is to receive the rents, interest and income of his estate and apply the net amount of such rents or other income (with certain exceptions not now material) to the use of his wife.

From the shares in question no income could accrue, no profits arise to the holder, until ascertained and declared by the company and allotted to the shareholder; and that act should be deemed to have been in the mind of the testator, and not the earnings or profits as ascertained by a third person, or a court upon an investigation of the business and affairs of the company, either upon an inspection of their books or otherwise. This was held in Clapp v. Astor, 2 Edw. Ch. 379, in construing a contract relating to "net profits or dividends," and by this court in Hyatt v. Allen, 56 N. Y. 553; and the principle stated was said to be founded in good sense and applied in construing an agreement made August 11, 1871, which provided that "All profits and dividends of and upon" certain "stock," up to the first of January, 1872, should be paid to defendant. No dividends were declared or distribution of profits made prior to that time, but in April, 1872, a dividend of $15 per share was declared and was received by defendant. Plaintiff sued to recover it, and a referee found that $250 of this dividend was earned between August 11, 1871, and July 1, 1872, and gave judgment for that amount. This court reversed the judgment, saying that there were profits earned by the corporation up to January 1, 1872, but they were not the profits of the stockholders in any legitimate sense. "There were no profits accruing to the stockholders until they were set apart by the corporation for their use."

The same principle is to be applied in determining the relative rights of a tenant for life and a remainderman. Payments in respect of profits accruing, and properly divisible as such are income and belong to the tenant for life, if the sum payable is ascertained and declared after the testator's death.

In Re Hopkins' Trust, L. R. 18 Eq. 696, a holder of shares bequeathed his personal estate to trustees in trust, to permit his wife to receive the dividends, interest and income thereof for her life, remainder over. He died in December, 1870. In January, 1873, an extraordinary dividend was declared on part of the shares for five years previously; and in July, 1873, a special dividend was declared on others for the half year previous. It was held that the life tenant was entitled to both; that although the company might have capitalized the earnings, they by resolution treated the money as dividends and not capital; and their decision was conclusive.

The same effect was given to the determination of the company in characterizing its earnings in Re Barton's Trust, L. R. 5 Eq. 238, 245; and the rule is a reasonable and proper one, which limits the right of a stockholder to profits by the action of the managers of a corporation or company. It is their sole and exclusive duty to divide profits and declare dividends, whenever in their judgment the condition of the affairs of the corporation renders it expedient; and it would lead to great embarrassment and confusion if a court should undertake to interfere with their discretion so long as they do not go beyond the scope of their powers and authority.

In this case no portion of the earnings which entered into the dividend had been capitalized by the company, and therefore the inquiry when the profits were earned out of which it was to be paid was immaterial. It is not claimed that the declaration of the dividend as dividend from profits was ultra vires, and whenever earned, they were not profits until the directors so declared.

In Hyatt v. Allen, supra, it was thought by the learned judge who spoke for the court that "A gift of the profits and dividends of stock for life, would not be held to carry dividends declared after the death of the beneficiary although made from profits accrued during his life," making the act of the company conclusive and giving the earnings to the time of the declaration of the dividend.

Sproule v. Bouch, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 635, 653, sustains this view. "The general principle applicable to these inquiries may in our opinion," says the court in that case, "be thus stated: When a testator or settlor directs or permits the subject of his disposition to remain as shares or stock in a company which has the power either of distributing its profits as dividend, or of converting them into capital, and the company validly exercised this power, such exercise of its power is binding on all persons interested under him (the testator or settlor) in the shares, and consequently what is paid by the company as dividend goes to the tenant for life; and what is paid by the company to the shareholder as capital, or appropriated as an increase of the capital stock in the concern, inures to the benefit of all who are interested in the capital. In a word what the company says is income, shall be income, and what it says is capital, shall be capital."

I think therefore the executors properly carried the whole of this dividend, 91, to income; that the referee and surrogate erred in making an apportionment, and, therefore, that the exception of the life tenant should prevail.

Fourth. The executors classed as income certain options or privileges given by the various companies in 1881, to subscribe for stocks and bonds, in all of the value of $44,478. This was objected to by the remaindermen and the objection sustained by the referee and surrogate.

The privilege or option was to subscribe for and take at par one or more bonds or shares of stock for a certain number of shares of stock already held by the estate. The right to subscribe belonged to the trust estate and accrued upon condition that the estate chose to pay for or purchase the bonds or stock. If the option was accepted, the purchase operated to increase the capital or change its manner of investment, and if not accepted the life tenant could neither complain of the choice of the trustees nor in any way control their discretion. We think the value did not belong to her and that the decisions of the referee and surrogate in regard thereto were correct.

Fifth. The guardian of Marie Marshall (a person of unsound mind) and the guardians for Kernochan (an infant) also appeal against: 1, allowance of compound interest on moneys found due to Mrs. Marshall from the testator; 2, commissions to Mrs. Marshall.

1. Both referee and surrogate were against the objectors as to the first. As to the second the referee sustained the objection, but the surrogate overruled it and allowed $15,000 to Mrs. Marshall, as commissions. As to the first: The testator had the principal moneys in hand for the purpose of investment and reinvestment, but mingled them with his own funds. It was not improper, therefore, under the circumstances of this case, to charge him with interest upon interest, as if received in the usual manner, for he forebore investment and used the moneys for his own convenience.

As to commissions: The referee found that Mrs. Marshall "duly qualified as executrix of the last will and testament of John R. Marshall, deceased, on the 8th day of October, 1881, and has been at all times since that date, ready and willing to take part, and has taken part in the management of the estate."

The objection raised in behalf of the remaindermen hangs upon the request of the testator contained in the will in these words:

"It is also my request that all persons herein named as executors will consent to act as such executors and trustees, and that each executor and trustee other than my wife, do also receive and take the full rate of commissions provided by law for each executor, intending thus to provide suitable compensation for their services in and attention to the duties herein devolved upon them."

We think the intention of the testator was to exclude his wife from compensation. Substantially the whole income of the estate, the result of the management of the executors of whom she was one, is given to her, and it cannot be supposed that he intended she should also be paid for caring for it.

The decree of the Surrogate and judgment of the Supreme Court should be modified according to the above opinion and, as so modified, affirmed, without costs in this court to either party.

Ruger, Ch. J., Rapallo and Finch, JJ., concur; Earl, J., concurs except as to allowance of compound interest, and as to that item he dissents; Andrews, J., dissents as to the $24.26 a share, on the ground that it was in substance a closing out of the sale of the stock and a distribution of capital.

John J. SPOWERS, Jr., Respt.

1. Under the Assignment Act of 1877, a general assignment for the benefit of creditors takes effect from the time of its acknowledgment and delivery, and not only from the time of its record in the proper county. (Warner v. Jaffray, 96 N. Y. 248, followed.)

2. A general assignment, made by a person living in one county and having his place of business in another, was acknowledged and delivered, and recorded only in the county in which the assignor resided; subsequently a receiver was appointed in supplementary proceedings against the assignor in the county wherein was the assignor's place of business, and thereafter the assignment was recorded in that county also, and not until after such recording was a copy of the order appointing the receiver filed in the county where the assignor resided. Held (applying the equity doctrine of relation), that the title of the assignee to the assignor's property, perfected by recording the assignment in the county in which was the assignor's place of business, related back to the delivery of the assignment, and gave the assignee priority over the receiver,—no rights of bona fide purchasers being affected.

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of New York City, overruling plaintiff's exceptions, heard at General Term in the first instance, to the ruling of the Trial Term dismissing the complaint and also ordering judgment for defendant in an action to recover the price of certain property sold by defendant. Affirmed.

Reported below, 20 Jones & S. 559.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Eugene H. Lewis, for appellant:

The title with which the receiver was vested, by filing of the order appointing him in the county of the debtors' residence, related back to dates prior to the 14th day of November, the day the debtors made an assignment; hence, unless the judgment debtors had, by a valid legal assignment, disposed of their property before the 14th day of November, 1883, the plaintiff became vested with title to it, and is entitled to sue for its recovery.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2469; Clark v. Gilbert, 10 Daly, 316; Campbell v. Foster, 35 N. Y. 364; Wright v. Nostrand, 94 N. Y. 31.

The right to assign one's property, in trust, for the benefit of creditors, existed at common law, and was not hampered or restricted by statutory provisions until 1860.

Thrasher v. Bentley, 1 Abb. N. C. 43.

The Act of 1860 is a statute not of creation but of direction; it recognizes the existence of the power in the citizen to make an assignment of his property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, and does no more than prescribe the mode in which the power shall be used, and furnish some safeguards against abuse. Id.

That Act prescribed certain requisites which must be preserved in every conveyance or assignment of his estate made by a debtor, to an assignee in trust for the creditors of such debtor.

Juliand v. Rathbone, 39 Barb. 99; Fairchild v. Gwynne, 16 Abb. Pr. 30.

It was repeatedly held while the Act of 1860 was in force that the provisions of section 1 were mandatory, and that unless those requisites were complied with, as therein set forth, an assignment was void.

Juliand v. Rathbone, 39 N. Y. 369; Hardmann v. Bowen, 39 N. Y. 196; Britton v. Lorenz, 45 N. Y. 51.

The sixth section of the Act of 1860 provided that every conveyance or assignment made by any debtor under the provisions of that Act should be recorded in the clerk's office of the county in which the debtor resided at the date thereof, and that every inventory of the property of such debtor made under the provisions of that Act should be filed in the same office where such assignment was recorded. The word "shall" was used as in the first section.

The conflict of decisions under the Act of 1860 existed almost entirely with reference to the construction to be placed upon those sections of the Act which followed section one.

It was argued that those sections related to things which were to be done after the assignment took effect, and were therefore not prerequisites to the validity of the assignment, but that the provisions in regard to them were simply directory.

The result of the judicial examination of those provisions relating to the filing of the inventory and bond was reached in the cases of Thrasher v. Bentley, 1 Abb. N. C. 39, and Brennan v. Wilson, 71 N. Y. 502, in which cases the doctrine was laid down that the vesting of title in an assignee did not depend upon a compliance with the requirements of those provisions.

Syracuse etc. R. R. Co. v. Collins, 1 Abb. N. C. 51.

This led to the passage of the Act of 1877, chap. 466, and its amendment of 1878, chap. 318, which together constitute the system under which debtors' estates, voluntarily assigned for the benefit of creditors, may be administered.

Section 25 of the Act of 1877 supplies an omission which existed in the Act of 1860, by expressly declaring at what stage in the history of a general assignment the equitable jurisdiction of the county court over the trust arises. The last clause of that section reads:

"And after the filing or recording of an assignment under this Act, the court may exercise the powers of a court of equity in reference to the trust and in the matters involved therein."

It cannot reasonably be assumed that the Legislature omitted from section 2 of the Act of 1877 the provision that the certificate of acknowledgment by the assignor should be indorsed upon the assignment before delivery, because it designed that the law in that particular should be changed, and meant to provide that no such certificate should any longer be a requisite of a valid legal assignment; but rather; 1, because it had in mind the fact that under the decisions of the court as they then existed, no such explicit provision was necessary to accomplish that result; and 2, because it wished to rebut the inference contained in the words "before delivery" that the delivery of an assignment was intended to be sufficient to vest title in an assignee.

If, as the court stated in Juliand v. Rathbone, 39 N. Y. 369, and as has since been held, the retention of the words "before delivery" was not necessary to require a mandatory construction of the provision as to acknowledgment, because that provision was found in the section which described the requisites of an assignment, that reasoning will, under the Act of 1877, apply equally to the provision as to recording an assignment. If the reasoning of that case is unsound, and the word "shall" is not, under section 2 of the Act of 1877, to be construed as mandatory, because the words "before delivery" have been omitted, then there is no reason why an unacknowledged assignment should not be delivered and vest title.

The only conclusion which can reasonably follow from the foregoing reasoning is that the provision that the assignor shall acknowledge the assignment is mandatory, because it holds a place in that section of the statute (Laws 1877, § 2; Laws 1860, § 1) which describes the essentials of a completed assignment.

Under the Act of 1860 the provision as to recording an assignment was found in section 3. While holding its place there, suspicion was cast upon it by the opinion of Mr. Commissioner Earl in the case of Syracuse etc. R. R. Co. v. Collins, supra; and it was then transferred by a wise Legislature to that section of the new statute, the provisions of which had, by uniform judicial sanction, acquired the dignity of mandates.

A sociis noscitur is the rule which was justly relied on by the law-making power, as the rule of construction which should give full effect to the provision.

Warner v. Jaffray, 96 N. Y. 253.

Mr. P. Q. Eckerson, for respondent:

The order appointing the receiver not having been made or filed in Kings County until long after the title to all the property had passed from the debtors to this defendant, their assignee, and hence beyond the reach of this plaintiff, it is clear that the title to this property never vested in the receiver, and this action cannot be maintained.

Dubois v. Cassidy, 75 N. Y. 301.

It was held under the Act of 1860 that although an assignment was never recorded or filed it was valid, to place the property of the assignors out of their control and out of the reach of their creditors.

Syracuse etc. R. R Co. v. Collins, 1 Abb. N. C. 51; Hardimann v. Bowen, 39 N. Y. 200; Brennan v. Wilson, 71 N. Y. 502.

The Act of 1877 did not change in any respect the requirement as to recording assignments, except if it be made by copartners it "shall be recorded in the county where the principal place of business of such copartners is situated."

Warner v. Jaffray, 96 N. Y. 248: McBlain v. Spellman, 35 Hun, 263.

The plaintiff as receiver seeks to get possession of all the property of the assignors. This he could not do, even if the assignment was void. The most he could get would be the amount of the judgment in the case in which he was appointed receiver.

Bostwick v. Menick, 40 N. Y. 383; Payne v. Becker, 87 N. Y. 153; reversing, 22 Hun, 28.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The general assignment for the benefit of creditors made by Stephens & Kellam to the defendant, was executed, acknowledged and delivered on the 27th of September, 1883, and was on the same day recorded in the office of the clerk of the County of Kings, where the assignors resided. Their place of business, however, being at the time of the assignment in the City of New York, section 2 of chapter 466 of the Laws of 1877, required that it should be recorded in that county. This was not done until November 14, 1883, and in the meantime the plaintiff was, under supplementary proceedings against Stephens & Kellam, appointed receiver of their property.

It is conceded by the appellant that if the assignment took effect at the time of its delivery, September 27, 1883, this action cannot be maintained. But he contends that it did not take effect until the 14th of November, 1883, when it was recorded in the City of New York, and that his title, as receiver, to the property of Stephens & Kellam, the assignors, had then attached.

The question in the case therefore is whether, under the Assignment Act of 1877, a general assignment takes effect from the time of its acknowledgment and delivery, or only from the time of its record in the proper county.

This precise question was decided in the case of Warner v. Jaffray, 96 N. Y. 248, which related to an assignment executed in 1881.

It is claimed on the part of the appellant that the point was not decided in that case; that what was said upon the question in the opinion of the court was obiter dictum, and that the case turned upon another point; that considering the question as an open one it should be held that the recording of the assignment was essential to its validity, and that his title as receiver, having accrued before the recording of the assignment in the County of New York, should prevail over that of the assignee; and he has presented an able argument in support of his contention.

But we think that that point was decided in Warner v. Jaffray. There was, it is true, another point involved and decided in that case, the contest being between the assignee and certain creditors of the assignor, residents of this State, who had attached his personal property situated in the State of Pennsylvania, after the delivery of the assignment, but before it had been recorded in Pennsylvania, and the attaching creditors having had no actual notice of the assignment.

The assignee having first demanded the attached property of the sheriff in Pennsylvania who had levied the attachments, commenced an action in the supreme court of this State against the attaching creditors to restrain them from further proceeding under their attachments in Pennsylvania. It was contended on the part of the defendants in that action that the lien of their attachments was superior to the title of the plaintiff under the assignment.

The question, therefore, was whether the title to the personal property of the debtors situate in Pennsylvania, had passed to the assignee before the levy of the attachments there.

It is evident that the first question presented was whether the plaintiff had any standing in court to restrain interference with the assigned property of the debtors anywhere. If he had not, it was unnecessary to go any farther with the case or to inquire into the validity of the lien of the defendants.

The question of the plaintiff's title lay at the threshold; and until that was passed the subsequent questions could not arise. It was held that the plaintiff, as assignee, acquired title to the personal property of the assignor generally. This would, on general principles, have been sufficient to entitle the assignee to claim the personal property of the assignor, wherever situated, being a title acquired by the voluntary act of the owner. But there was a statute in the State of Pennsylvania which provided that where a person residing out of that State made an assignment for the benefit of creditors, of property situated within the State, such assignment might be recorded in any county where the estate real or personal might be, and should take effect from its date, provided no bona fide purchaser, mortgagee or creditor having a lien thereon before the recording in the same county, and not having previous actual notice of the assignment, should be affected or prejudiced.

It was, therefore, further held in Warner v. Jaffray that the title of the plaintiff, as assignee, must yield to the law of the State where the property was actually situated, and that the defendants having obtained their lien by their attachments, before the assignment was recorded in the counties where the property was situated, and before they had any notice thereof, those liens were, under the Pennsylvania Statute referred to, saved from the operation of the assignment.

It is evident that this point could not have been reached and decided without first passing upon the general effect of the assignment on the property of the assignor. It would have been quite immaterial to determine whether the Pennsylvania Statute saved the property there from the operation of the assignment, if the assignment had no effect or operation anywhere. We must, therefore, regard the point now before us as having been adjudicated in the case of Warner v. Jaffray, and not open for discussion at this time.

There is still another view of the case, which leads to a conclusion adverse to the plaintiff. His title rests upon his appointment as receiver, made in proceedings supplementary to execution instituted subsequently to September 27, 1883, at which date the assignment to the plaintiff was delivered and recorded in Kings County; so that the defendant's title was in fact, in point of time, prior in its origin to that of the plaintiff and, except for the failure to record in New York also, would, even on the plaintiff's theory, be prior in all respects.

But the Statute in relation to receiverships required (Code Civ. Proc. § 2468) that "Where the judgment debtor, at the time the order is filed," referring to the order appointing a receiver, "resides in another county of this State, his personal property is vested in the receiver only from the time when a copy of the order, certified by the clerk in whose office it is recorded, is filed with the clerk of the county where he resides." Now the orders appointing the plaintiff receiver were entered in the City of New York, the judgment debtors residing in the County of Kings; and a certified copy was not filed in the last named county until February 1, 1884, which was long after the assignment to the defendant was made perfect, even according to the plaintiff's theory, by being recorded in the County of New York, viz.: November 14, 1883.

Therefore the title to the debtors' property had passed to the assignee before (under § 2468) any title thereto had vested in the plaintiff. To obviate this otherwise conclusive answer to the plaintiff's claim, he is obliged to resort to the doctrine of relation, which is recognized in section 2469, and by that means to make the title which he acquired by the filing of February 1, 1884, relate back to the institution of the proceedings under which he was appointed receiver, which proceedings were instituted after the delivery of the assignment but before it was recorded in New York, and thus to devest the title of the general assignee and secure a preference for the creditors whom he represents.

But why should not the assignee be allowed to invoke the same doctrine of relation? It is one which was originated by courts of equity and is resorted to by them whenever necessary to effect justice. Suppose that it was necessary to the taking effect of the assignment that it should be recorded in the proper county. That record was made on the 14th of November, 1883. Did not the title, thus perfected in the assignee, relate back to the time of the delivery of the assignment, and thus preserve his priority over the receivership?

I think that every equitable consideration requires that it should be so held. No rights of any bona fide purchaser would in this case be affected by so holding; but on the contrary the effect would be to secure the fund for distribution according to the terms of the assignment, which was earlier in its origin than any proceedings even, under which the plaintiff's title originated, and practically when the assignment comes to be carried into effect, it will have to be treated as having been made at the time it was delivered, and not as of the time when it was recorded in New York, even if the law were as contended for by the plaintiff.

It is, in my judgment, a proper case for the application of the familiar doctrine of relation, on general principles of equity, independently of any statutory enactments.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Reported below, 39 Hun, 79.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Walter S. Hubbell, for appellants:

The action was properly brought in the names of the individual members of the Board, with the corporate name of the Board attached.

See Acts relating to boards of health, 2 R. S. 7th ed. p. 1081; Haight v. Benson, 18 How. Pr. 302; Winchester v. McKee, 4 Alb. L. J. 138; Pomroy v. Sperry, 16 How. Pr. 211.

Sections 1926 and 1929 of the Code do not affect the question, as boards of health are not enumerated or referred to in either section.

The sole authority under which the resolution in question was passed is derived from sections 2 and 3, subdivisions 3 and 6, of the Act constituting boards of health in the various towns of this State. 2 R. S. 7th ed. p. 1081.

The authority thus conferred is plain and explicit. The Act reads as follows:

Sec. 2. "They shall have cognizance of the causes of injury or danger to the public health."

Sec. 3. "The several boards of health * * * shall have power and it shall be their duty. * * * Sub. 3. "To make orders and regulations, in their discretion, concerning * * * suppression and removal of nuisances, and all such other orders and regulations as they shall think necessary and proper for the preservation of the public health." And Sub. 6. "To publish such orders and regulations," etc.

There is no limitation as to the character of the nuisances, nor as to the residence of the party causing the nuisance, nor as to the place where the nuisance originates. The power conferred is as broad as the subject of which it treats. Whatever is detrimental to the health of the town may be the subject of the board's action.

The plain rules of statutory construction are in favor of this position.

Mead v. Stratton, 87 N. Y. 493; Re Will of O'Neil, 91 N. Y. 516; People v. Lacombe, 99 N. Y. 43; Buffalo v. Webster, 10 Wend. 99; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 2d ed. pp. 390, 391, § 304.

The statute authorizes two things: 1. The removal of nuisances. 2. The making of such other orders as the Board shall deem necessary.

This proves that it was intended to give remedies in two classes of cases, viz.: 1. Where nuisances existed in the town, and could be removed. 2. Where the ultimate cause of the nuisance was not in the town, and the nuisance could only be abated by injunction.

Mr. Ivan Powers, for respondent:

Local boards of health possess the power and can exercise the authority conferred upon them by the statute and none other.

People v. Supervisors, 18 Barb. 567, 569.

The Act under which the Brighton Board of Health is organized confers upon local boards of health no power or authority with reference to the removal or suppression of a condition of things existing outside of the limits of the town for which the local board acts, by reason of which nuisances are created within the limits of the town.

Laws 1882, chap. 351, § 3, subds. 3, 6, 7.

The orders made by the Brighton Board of Health being void as against the defendant, the complaint was properly dismissed.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The City of Rochester adjoins on the east the Town of Brighton. It constructed sewers which discharged into ditches near the boundary between the City and town, which carried the sewage upon and over lands in Brighton and ultimately into Thomas Creek, a small stream running through the town and having its outlet at Irondequoit Bay. The ditches were constructed by the City, under a general legislative authority to acquire land outside of the city limits and open ditches thereon to carry off the drainage of the City.

It is found that the discharge of the sewage through the ditches and into Thomas Creek created a nuisance in the Town of Brighton, dangerous to the public health.

On the first day of August, 1884, the plaintiffs, constituting the board of health of the town, enacted a rule or regulation prohibiting any person or corporation from discharging or causing to be discharged upon any of the lands, or into any of the streams in the Town of Brighton, the contents of any sewer in which is drained the contents of any privy, watercloset, or urinal, under a penalty.

On the same day the board passed a resolution declaring that the discharge of the sewage of the City of Rochester from the Monroe Avenue sewer and East Avenue sewer upon lands in the Town of Brighton, and from thence into Thomas Creek, was a nuisance, the suppression and removal of which was necessary for the preservation of the public health, and ordering that the nuisance be suppressed, and imposing a penalty for the violation of the regulation, and also authorizing the prosecution of any person or corporation violating the same, or the commencement of an action to restrain such violation, or otherwise to enforce the regulation.

By direction of the board a copy of the regulation was posted in the town and served upon the City of Rochester, by there delivering it to the proper authorities of the City.

It is sufficient to state, without entering into details, that the discharge of the filth from the sewers into the open ditches, and from them into Thomas Creek, created an offensive and dangerous nuisance in the town. The sole question here presented is whether the Board of Health of the Town of Brighton is authorized to maintain an action against the City, to enforce its regulation, and to restrain the continuance of the nuisance.

It is clear that there is a remedy by indictment, and also by civil action at the suit of persons sustaining special injury by the unlawful acts of the defendant. The right of the Board of Health of the Town of Brighton to maintain the action is challenged, on the ground that it has no general capacity to sue, but only such as is specially conferred by the law under which boards of health are organized, and that the circumstances of this case do not bring it within the authority conferred.

It would seem that an action by the body representing all the inhabitants of the town, invoking the equitable power of the court to restrain the continuance of a wrong so vitally affecting the interests both of individuals and of the public at large would be most appropriate. But it is undoubtedly true that the power to maintain the action, if it exists, must be found in the statute; and it is therefore necessary to ascertain what statutory powers are conferred upon boards of health, and whether they include an authority to maintain an action under the circumstances existing in this case.

The original statute (chap. 324, Laws 1850), entitled "For the Preservation of the Public Health," and providing for the organization of health boards in cities, villages and towns, conferred upon such boards, among other things, the power to make and publish rules and regulations for the "suppression and removal of nuisances" (§ 3, sub's 3, 6), and prescribed a penalty for the willful violation of any regulation "so made and published." Sec. 4.

But the Act conferred no power upon boards of health to maintain any action to enforce their regulations; and it was held that actions could not be maintained by the board. People v. Supervisors of Monroe Co. 18 Barb. 567.

The powers of boards of health were, however, subsequently enlarged by amendments to the original Act, and the powers of boards of health as they now exist, are declared in the supplementary Act, chap. 351, Laws of 1882. By the third section they are empowered "to make orders and regulations in their discretion (among other things) for the suppression and removal of nuisances, and all such other orders and regulations as they shall think necessary and proper for the preservation of the public health," and to enter upon any place or premises where conditions dangerous to the public health are known or believed to exist, for the purpose of inspection, and also "to receive and examine into the nature of complaints made by any of the inhabitants concerning causes of danger or injury to the public health, within the limits of its jurisdiction."

Subdivision 6 of the same section confers the power and makes it the duty of the boards of health "To publish from time to time all such orders and regulations of general obligation as they shall have made, in such manner as to secure early and full publicity thereto, and to make, without publication thereof, such orders and regulations in special or individual cases, not of general application, as they may see fit, concerning the suppression and removal of nuisances, and concerning all other matters in their judgment detrimental to the public health, and to serve copies thereof upon any occupant or occupants of any premises whereon any such nuisances or other matters aforesaid shall exist, or by posting the same in some conspicuous place on such premises."

The power of boards of health to impose penalties and to maintain actions is declared in subdivision 9 as follows: "To impose penalties for the violation of, or noncompliance with their orders and regulations, and to maintain actions in any court of competent jurisdiction to collect such penalties, not exceeding $100 in any one case, or to restrain by injunction such violations, or otherwise to enforce such orders and regulations."

The power to maintain an action for an injunction, given by subdivision 9 above quoted, is, as will be observed, auxiliary only. It is not a general power to maintain actions for the suppression or removal of nuisances. It is a right of action limited to the special purpose of enforcing orders made by the board, or to restrain their violation. It presupposes, therefore, as a condition of its exercise, the existence of a lawful order, duly made, which has been violated or disregarded.

The courts below, while uniting in denying the right of the plaintiffs to maintain the action, differ in the grounds of their decision. The learned judge at special term, after asserting the proposition that the jurisdiction of the Board of Health of the Town of Brighton over nuisances was limited to nuisances existing within the territorial limits of the town, put his decision upon the ground that the order or regulation of August 1, 1884, was ineffectual and in excess of the power conferred upon boards of health, because the nuisance in question was created and had its origin in the City of Rochester, and that the town board could make no valid regulation in respect thereto, because, in the language of the court, its powers "are confined to the abatement of nuisances within the town, and the regulations they make have no force outside of the town lines."

It seems to us that this is quite too narrow a view of the situation. It is undoubtedly true that the authorities of Brighton could not go into the City of Rochester and interfere with its sewers. But the collection of foul substances in the sewers was not the immediate cause of the nuisance. The immediate cause was the discharge by the City, of the sewage after it was collected in the sewers, into open drains constructed by the City across lands in the Town of Brighton. This discharge was prohibited by the order of August 1, 1884. The City, notwithstanding the order and in violation of it, continued the nuisance and permitted the sewers to continue to discharge their contents as before; and it continued also to use the ditches it had constructed in the town, to carry the offensive matter to the creek. In respect to the East Avenue sewer, the nuisance had its origin at Culver Street, the dividing line between the City and town, where the sewer terminated.

It seems to us that the order of the board of health related to a matter within the town and within the jurisdiction of the board.

We agree with the special term that the board could not execute its order by going within the City to close the sewers; but the fact that it had no power to enforce a summary jurisdiction of this kind does not justify the conclusion that it could not invoke the action of the court to enforce in an orderly way the abatement of the nuisance.

The case of Regina v. Cotton, 1 Ell. & Ell. 203, arose under the Nuisance Removal Act (18 and 19 Vic. chap. 121), and it was held that it did not authorize a summary proceeding before justices, at the instance of one parish, for the removal of a nuisance originating in another parish. The court said Erle, J.:

"It would be most dangerous to take away from the regular tribunals the investigation of such a question, often a most complicated and important one, and to transfer it to the jurisdiction of any two justices of the peace."

The general term as we understand its opinion, put its affirmance of the judgment on the ground that, under the Act of 1882, it is a condition precedent to the right of a board of health to maintain an action to restrain the violation of, or to enforce an order made by the board, that the order should have been served on the defendant, and that service under the Act must be made within the territorial jurisdiction of the board.

The order in question was served on the defendant by service on its proper officers within the City. It was, therefore, held that such service was not a compliance with the Act and was not a performance of the condition precedent. We are unable to concur in this conclusion. The order of August 1, 1884, was not a rule or regulation of general obligation, of which publication was required within the first clause of section 3 (subd. 6), but was an order made in a special and individual case, under the last clause of the subdivision, which is to be served on the occupant or occupants of the premises on which the nuisance exists, or by posting the same on the premises. But the statute does not in terms require the order to be served within the town or jurisdiction where the nuisance exists, and we see no reason for so construing it.

It is not necessary to determine whether the Board of Health of Brighton would have jurisdiction if the nuisance complained of was merely consequential; that is, if the nuisance having been created, and existing in the City, affected injuriously, by corrupting the air or otherwise, the Town of Brighton. But in this case the City of Rochester constructed and controlled the ditches in the town through which the sewage was carried, and used them for its purposes. We think the City was, within the Act, the occupant of premises in the town on which the nuisance existed, and was properly served with notice.

The claim that the City did no new act after the order was made, if material, is not well founded in fact. It continued to discharge the sewage on to the town as before. If it had refrained from using the sewers, the nuisance would have abated without further action.

The case of Reed v. People, 1 Park. Crim. Cas. 481, is not in point. That was an indictment for violating a regulation of a board of health, founded on the fourth section of the Act of 1850, before amendment, which made a willful violation of a regulation "read and published" by a board of health, a misdemeanor. The regulation claimed in that case to have been violated had not been published, and this was a complete answer to the indictment. The court also expressed its opinion that service of notice upon a nonresident out of the jurisdiction, although he owned the premises on which the nuisance existed, followed by a mere omission to act thereunder, would not render him liable to indictment.

We think the judgment in this case should be reversed. The statute should have a liberal construction in aid of the beneficial purpose of its enactment. The objections to the maintenance of the action are quite technical and ought not, we think, to prevail.

All concur.

Annie Cooke LAWRENCE, An Infant, etc.,
Respt.,
v.

1. Where, by one clause of his will a father devised his residuary estate to his daughter, "to have and to hold the same, unto her heirs and assigns forever," and in the following clause committed to her the guardianship of his grandchild, the child of a deceased daughter, with the words "I enjoin upon her to make such provision for said grandchild out of my residuary estate now in her hands, in such manner, at such times, and in such amounts, as she may judge to be expedient and conducive to the welfare of such grandchild, and her own sense of justice and Christian duty shall dictate," and the general guardian of the grandchild, in a complaint, alleged that for more than two years after the will took effect the daughter had refused and neglected to make any provision for his ward, and asked to have a trust in her favor declared and enforced, and the daughter answered, denying that a trust was created by the will, but admitted the force of the moral considerations in favor of the ward, and averred her intention fully and in good faith to comply with the same, the judgment of the general term declaring and enforcing a trust was reversed on appeal, and the judgment of the special term was affirmed, dismissing the complaint.

2. If by the clause the testator had enjoined the defendant to make a suitable provision out of the residuary estate for the support of the grandchild, the daughter would have taken it subject to a charge, the amount of which might be ascertained by a court of equity, and satisfaction decreed. But as the provision was drawn, it was not intended to relieve the father of the grandchild from his legal obligation to support his own child. It was the will of the testator that the daughter should be the sole judge of the manner in which provision for the grandchild should be made, at what time it should be made, and to what amount. It was beyond the power of any court to substitute its discretion for hers; and no trust was created which a court of equity could exclude, contrary to her judgment. The provision vested the absolute title to his residuary estate in his daughter.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, reversing a judgment of the Special Term dismissing an action by a guardian to have a trust declared and enforced in favor of his ward. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. W. R. Darling, for appellant:

The general term erred in holding that the seventh clause creates a trust for plaintiff. The preceding absolute devise of the whole residuary estate to the defendant stands clear, independent and alone.

Campbell v. Beaumont, 91 N. Y. 465; Freeman v. Coit, 96 N. Y. 63; Roseboom v. Roseboom, 81 N. Y. 356; Parsons v. Best, 1 Thomp. & C. 211; approved, 88 N. Y. 232; White & T. L. Cas. pt. 2, Am. note, p. 1859; 1 Perry, Trusts, 3d ed. § 115.

After an absolute devise no subsequent language less decisive than itself is sufficient to show an intent to cut it down or charge it.

Hopkins v. Glunt, 2 Cent. Rep. 63.

As to how full and clear such diminishing language must be, and that the rule admits of no exceptions, see: Thornhill v. Hall, 2 Clark & F. 22; approved, 81 N. Y. 359; 96 N. Y. 63; Reid v. Atkinson, 5 Irish Rep. 373, 377, 378-386.

The tendency of modern decisions is against raising a trust by mere inference from doubtful words.

Campbell v. Beaumont, 91 N. Y. 465; Foose v. Whitmore, 82 N. Y. 406; Lewin, Trusts, p. 173.

No expressions used in the seventh clause are sufficient to cut down or charge the absolute title given by the preceding clause. Only two are relied upon, viz.: "I commit my granddaughter," etc., and "I enjoin," etc.

In construing a residuary clause, courts will look at surrounding circumstances.

Kerr v. Dougherty, 79 N. Y. 327. See 99 N. Y. 74, 79.

The testator could not "commit the charge and guardianship" to the defendant, or have intended so to do; they were not his to give. Such an intent would be illegal and will not be imputed.

Dubois v. Ray, 35 N. Y. 162.

The word "enjoin" of the seventh clause, upon which alone the general term's judgment of reversal seems to be put, when read as qualified by the words with which it is coupled (Meredith v. Heneage, 1 Sim. 542, 556; Hone v. Kent, 11 Barb, 315; Kane v. Astor, 5 Sandf. 457; Hill, Trustees, p. 73), is shorn of all legal imperative force and reduced to merely precatory significance.

In the light of the testator's expression of personal confidence in defendant, his idea seems to have been to substitute the defendant's irresponsible discretion for what would have been his own if he had lived.

McCormick v. Grogan, L. R. 4 H. L. 95; Meredith v. Heneage, 1 Sim. 542, 556; Lines v. Darden, 5 Fla. 51, 72.

The phrase, "Out of my residuary estate, now in her hands," although a merely interjected and unnecessary parenthesis, is important as showing that in the seventh clause the testator understood and still intended the full, absolute gift of the previous clause, leaving the moral appeal as the basis and security of the seventh clause.

The main intent of the testator was for the defendant, his daughter. The previous clause shows this without doubt, and in construction the particular intent must yield to this.

Roseboom v. Roseboom, 81 N. Y. 356, 360; Delaney v. Van Aulen, 84 N. Y. 16, 26; Giddings v. Seward, 16 N. Y. 365, 367; McDonald v. Walgrove, 1 Sandf. Ch. 274; Jackson v. Veeder, 11 Johns. 169.

The words "such provision" and "as she may judge expedient," are to be considered. Where by judicial decisions words have been given a fixed meaning, that meaning prevails; and courts are bound by it, rather than by conjectural interpretation.

Lytle v. Beveridge, 58 N. Y. 598; Myers v. Eddy, 47 Barb. 263.

The words "as she shall think expedient," have been held to confer an absolute discretion to give or not to give, and how much.

The word "enjoin," was itself held not imperative, in a direction to executors not to sell within three years.

Stewart v. Hamilton, 37 Hun, 19; Hill, Trustees, p. 73.

The words "my will and desire is," were held not enough to cut down or charge an absolute gift; and the court said that if it was so intended, it was void as repugnant.

Campbell v. Beaumont, 91 N. Y. 468; Lines v. Darden, 5 Fla. 51, 72.

"Earnestly conjure," held insufficient.

Winch v. Brutton, 14 Sim. 379.

A devise expressly made "subject to," etc., held to raise no trust.

Parsons v. Best, 1 Thomp. & C. 211; approved, 88 N. Y. 282; Re Hutchinson, L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 540.

An absolute devise to a wife, with the words "she is of course to charge herself," etc., held insufficient to cut down or charge the fee.

Spooner v. Lovejoy, 108 Mass. 529; Webb v. Wools, 2 Sim. N. S. 267; Costabadie v. Costabadie, 6 Hare, 410, 413; Lambe v. Eames, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 599. See also Rose v. Porter, 1 New Eng. Rep. 750.

The word "provision" qualified and coupled nearly as in this case has expressly been held too obscure to raise a trust.

Winch v. Brutton, 14 Sim. 379; Abraham v. Alman, 1 Russ. Ch. 509; Macnab v. Whitbread, 17 Beav. 299.

Another settled reason against construing a trust from the seventh clause is the uncertainty which would exist, as to its subject and its term.

Crouse v. Frothingham, 97 N. Y. 105, 112; Colton v. Colton, 21 Fed. Rep. 594, 596.

It is well settled that the subject will be held as too uncertain to raise a trust, when the amount given for the purpose is made to depend on the will of the first taker; and such uncertainty is treated by the court as evidence that the mind of the testator was not to create a trust.

It is not sufficient merely to point out the general fund out of which the portion is intended to be carved, as when this testator says; "out of my residuary estate," etc., but the extent of the portion itself must appear; and the greatest clearness as to this is required by all the cases.

Lines v. Darden, 5 Fla. 72, 75, 77; Mills v. Newberry, 112 Ill. 123; Colton v. Colton, 21 Fed. Rep. 594, 596; Gilbert v. Chapin, 19 Conn. 342, 346; Harper v. Phelps, 21 Conn. 257, 269, 270; Bardswell v. Bardswell, 9 Sim. 319; Tolson v. Tolson, 10 Gill & J. 159.

Directions involving a personal trust and discretion can only be exercised by the person named for that purpose.

Crooke v. Kings Co. 97 N. Y. 421, 453; Beekman v. Bonsor, 23 N. Y. 298, 304; Hull v. Hull, 24 N. Y. 647, 651. See also Nichols v. Eaton, 91 U. S. 724, 725 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 256); 2 Perry, Trusts, 28; Costabadie v. Costabadie, 6 Hare, 410, 413; Gisborne v. Gisborne, 25 Week. Rep. (Eng.) 517.

Where, all circumstances considered, it is more probable that the testator meant only to communicate a mere discretion, there would be (even under the old rule) no trust.

Lewin, Trusts, p. 172; Hill, Trustees, p. 117.

Nor do the words of the seventh paragraph raise a power in trust (within §§ 95, 96 of the R. S. chap. 1, pt. 4, title 2, "On Powers"), because the execution or nonexecution is made expressly to depend on the will of the defendant as to the "provision" itself and all details of it.

Lines v. Darden and Bardswell v. Bardswell, supra; Delaney v. McCormack, 88 N. Y. 174, 182.

For the same reason it fails as a power in trust, under the test of section 103.

Decker v. Saltsman, 1 Hun, 421; Munsell v. Lewis, 4 Hill, 641, 642.

In any aspect of the case, and admitting (for argument only) the existence either of a trust or a power, still this action is premature, since, even if some provision is imperative, the time and manner of it are left to defendant, and she may do it by will; in other words, "she has her whole life in which to perform it."

Mackett v. Mackett, L. R. 14 Eq. 49; Meredith v. Heneage, 1 Sim. 542, 551; Gilbert v. Chapin, 19 Conn. 342, 346; Parsons v. Best, 1 Thomp. & C. 211; approved in 88 N. Y. 282.

Even if the seventh clause of the will really raises a trust, still the interlocutory judgment of the general term was wrong, because it set aside the defendant, and substituted its own discretion and judgment for her's, without any admission in the pleadings or finding in the case that she had refused the trust, or by any bad faith or wrong exercise of its authority had forfeited the right to its administration.

Mr. Henry W. Johnson, with Mr. Luke A. Lockwood, for respondent:

The question whether there was a trust created by the will in favor of plaintiff depends upon the intention of the testator, provided such intention can be fairly gathered from the language used in disposing of his property, and that it does not conflict with any statute or contravene any rule of public policy.

One of the best tests in arriving at the intention of the testator is to consider, in the first place, what he manifestly did not intend by his will.

Applying this test to the will in question, it is manifest that the testator did not intend to leave his granddaughter, the plaintiff, to the tender mercies of the world without any provision whatever for her support. This is indicated by the appointment of the defendant as guardian of his granddaughter; by pointing directly and unmistakably to his residuary estate, as the source from which the support of the ward is to come; by the use of language which signifies something more than a mere request that that residuary estate shall be used for the benefit of his grandchild.

The testator did not intend that the defendant should receive his residuary estate wholly exempt from any obligation or duty towards the plaintiff. This is indicated by his attempt to make the defendant the guardian of the plaintiff, as has already been stated; by mentioning his grandchild as a person for whom he intended some provision should be made out of his residuary estate; by requiring that such provision should be made out of his residuary estate as the defendant should deem expedient and conducive to the welfare of his grandchild. (Surely this language does not import that the testator ever contemplated that the plaintiff would not need any support. The most that can be claimed is that the extent of that support should be determined by the defendant; but it cannot be claimed that this language fairly implies that she may exercise her "sense of justice and Christian duty" in favor of the plaintiff or not as she pleases); by the use of language in reference to his residuary estate, which is mandatory in its character.

The testator enjoins something upon his donee. He does not beseech, he commands. It is the utterance of one having power to give or withhold—and to give absolutely or conditionally.

"Enjoin" is not precatory language. It is defined by Webster to mean "to charge;" to lay upon with, as an order or command; to put an injunction on; to give a command to; to direct with authority; to order. Worcester's definition is substatially the same, and both of them are more in accord with the legal meaning of the word than is Johnson's definition.

1 Bouv. Law Dic. p. 526, title "To Enjoin" citing 1 Hale, P. C. 587; 1 East, P. C. 298, 304; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 12, § 13; Ry. & M. Cr. Cas. 93.

"Precatory" is defined by Worcester as "suppliant" "beseeching". He gives its derivation as "L., precatorius, precor, precatus, to beg, to ask." Precatory words are defined by Burrill to be "words of entreaty, request, desire or recommendation employed in wills as distinguished from direct and imperative terms.".

The distinction between precatory and mandatory language is pointed out by a well recognized authority on the subjects of trusts, in the following language: "However strong the language of recommendation or request may be, a trust will not be implied if the testator declares that such is not his intention; as, if he declares that the gift shall not be unfettered or unlimited, or if he recommends but does not enjoin."

Perry, Trusts, §115, citing Meredith v. Heneage, 1 Sim. 542; 10 Price, 230; Hoy v. Master, 6 Sim. 568; Young v. Martin, 2 Younge & Col. Ch. 582; Huskisson v. Bridge, 4 DeG. & Sm. 245; Warner v. Bates, 98 Mass. 277; Whipple v. Adams, 1 Met. 444; Eaton v. Watts, L. R. 4 Eq. 151.

Where precatory words are used, one of the rules of construction is that the presumption against a trust will not be overcome where the object, the property, or the way it shall go, are left at all in doubt. This rule finds abundant illustration in the authorities cited by the learned counsel for the defendant, on the argument below, and especially in the following:

Mackett v. Mackett, L. R. 14 Eq. 49; Meredith v. Heneage, 1 Sim. 542; Lambe v. Eames, L. R. 10 Eq. 267; Reeves v. Baker, 18 Beav. 372; Winch v. Brutton, 14 Sim. 379; Greene v. Greene, 3 Irish Rep. Eq. 629; Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 10 Ves. Jr. 535; Wynne v. Hawkins, 1 Bro. Ch. 179; Bernard v. Minshull, 1 Johns. Eng. Ch. 276; Foose v. Whitmore, 82 N. Y. 405; Young v. Martin, 2 Younge & Col. Ch. 582.

Another rule is that it must appear from the context that they are not used to invoke the exercise of a merely discretionary power; otherwise, a trust cannot be implied; in other words, it must appear from what follows that the wish, desire or recommendation is not left entirely to the caprice or discretion of the person to whom it is addressed. Some of the cases last above cited also illustrate this rule, but it is more clearly indicated in the following:

Harper v. Phelps, 21 Conn. 256; Parsons v. Best, 1 Thomp. & C. 211; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 115; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1069.

Where imperative words are used, so that the court can see that the testator clearly intended to create a trust, the court will give such effect to the words used as is necessary to carry out the intention of the testator, if possible.

1 Perry, Trusts, § 114; 1 Jarm. Wills, p. 332; 2 Redf. Wills, 415, 421.

In the following cases, although precatory words were used by the testator, they were held to be imperative, and created a trust by reason of the manifest intent of the language following those words:

Harding v. Glyn, 1 Atk. 469; Ware v. Mallard, 16 Jur. 492; Warner v. Bates, 98 Mass. 277; Forbes v. Ball, 3 Meriv. 437.

The foregoing views, as to what the testator manifestly did not intend by his will, necessarily lead to the conclusion that he did intend to make some pecuniary provision for his grandchild.

Winch v. Brutton and Lines v. Darden, supra.

As it was urged on the trial below that the will did not create an express trust, within section 55 of title 2, chapter 1 of part 3 of the Revised Statutes, we submit that it is not important to determine that question now, inasmuch as that provision does not apply to personal property.

Kane v. Gott,* 24 Wend. 641; Gott v. Cook, 7 Paige, 521; Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 561; Brown v. Harris, 25 Barb. 134.

If a valid trust is created as to the personal estate, that is sufficient.

De Peyster v. Clendining, 8 Paige, 295; Dupre v. Thompson, 4 Barb. 279; Vail v. Vail, 7 Barb. 226; Irving v. DeKay, 9 Paige, 521; Parks v. Parks, 9 Paige, 107.

There is no uncertainty as to the nature or extent of the trust created by the will. It clearly points out: 1, the object, that is the person in whose behalf the trust is created; 2, the subject of the trust, and that is the testator's residuary estate; 3, the intention that some provision shall be made out of the subject of the trust.

On that point no discretion is conferred. The extent of the estate, or the interest of the donee of the power, does not affect its construction as a trust.

Pierson v. Garnet, 2 Bro. Ch. 38; Harding v. Glyn, 1 Atk. 469; Brown v. Higgs, 4 Ves. 708; 8 Ves. 561; Parsons v. Baker, 18 Ves. 476; Prevost v. Clarke, 2 Madd. Ch. 458; Forbes v. Ball, 3 Meriv. 437; Burrough v. Philcox, 5 Myl. & Cr. 72; Dominick v. Sayre, 3 Sandf. 555.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The grandfather of the plaintiff (Chauncey L. Cooke) by the sixth and seventh clauses of his will, which took effect in December, 1878, devised and bequeathed his residuary estate, as follows:

"VI. The residue of my estate, both real and personal, of whatever name or kind, I give, devise and bequeath to my daughter Sara L. Cooke, to have and to hold the same, unto her heirs and assigns forever." "VII. I commit my granddaughter, Annie C. Lawrence, child of my daughter Annie, now deceased, to the charge and guardianship of my daughter Sara L. Cooke, in whose honesty, good will and integrity I repose the utmost confidence. I enjoin upon her to make such provision for said grandchild, out of my residuary estate now in her hands, in such manner, at such times, and in such amounts, as she may judge to be expedient and conducive to the welfare of said grandchild, and her own sense of justice and Christain duty shall dictate."

The complainant alleged that in the month of March, 1880, and in the month of January, 1881, the plaintiff, through her general guardian, who was her father, requested the defendant to make, out of the estate so devised and bequeathed to her, provision for the plaintiff, but that the defendant had neglected and refused so to do; and demanded judgment; that by the terms of the will a trust was imposed upon the defendant in favor of the plaintiff; that the defendant render an account of the residuary estate and the income thereof, and that the court should determine and make such provision for the plaintiff out of said residuary estate as should be conducive to the welfare of the plaintiff, and that a receiver should be appointed of such residuary estate, etc.

The defendant, by her answer, denied that any trust was created by the will, but also denied that she had refused to make provision for the plaintiff. She admitted the full force of the moral considerations in favor of the plaintiff, arising from the will, and averred that she intended and had always intended fully and in good faith, to comply with the same.

The action was tried at special term before Lawrence, J., who held that no trust was created by the clause referred to, and that the defendant took, under the will of her father, an absolute title to his residuary estate; and he dismissed the complaint. His judgment was reversed at the general term; and a reference was ordered, to ascertain the amount of the residuary estate, and report what provision should be made for the plaintiff, out of such residuary estate.

The referee reported the proofs taken before him, and that in his opinion the sum of $1,080 per annum would be a proper provision to be made for the plaintiff, until she should attain the age of fourteen years. This report was confirmed by the court, and judgment was rendered that the defendant pay that sum to William H. Lawrence, the father and general guardian of the plaintiff, until the further order of the court.

Full and exhaustive opinions were delivered, both at special and general terms, in which the authorities bearing upon the question are reviewed at length. Without going over the ground covered by those opinions we deem it sufficient to say that we concur in that of Lawrence, J., at special term, which was to the effect that the defendant took an absolute title to the residuary estate, and that the provision to be made for the plaintiff was left wholly to the discretion of the defendant.

The opinions at general term were by Brady and Daniels, JJ., Davis, P. J., delivering a brief dissenting opinion. The prevailing opinions rest upon the word "enjoin" used by the testator in clause VII. If the clause had been that the testator enjoined upon the defendant to make suitable provision out of the residuary estate for the support of the plaintiff, there would be force in the argument; not indeed that the defendant took the residuary estate in trust, but that she took it subject to a charge, the amount of which might be ascertained by a court of equity and satisfaction thereof decreed.

But such is not the language of the will. It is: "I enjoin upon her to make such provision for said grandchild, out of my residuary estate, in such manner, at such times and in such amounts, as she may judge to be expedient and conducive to the welfare of said grandchild."

She might, under the broad discretion thus conferred upon her, deem it best for the grandchild to wait until she should become of age, and then give her a portion of the estate, or otherwise provide for her. There was nothing in the will which required her to provide for the support of the grandchild during her minority. She was living with her father, out of the State. No obligation was imposed upon the defendant, by her father's will, to indemnify the father of the plaintiff for her support, or to furnish him with means therefor. The provision in the will was not intended for the benefit of the father of the plaintiff, nor to relieve him from his legal obligation to support his own child. All these matters were left wholly to the discretion of the defendant, uncontrolled by any consideration, except, to use the language of the testator, what "her own sense of justice and Christian duty shall dictate."

*See classified citations on this subject at end of case in Lawyers' edition. [Ed.]

It was the will of the testator that the defendant should be the sole judge of the manner in which provision for the plaintiff should be made; at what time it should be made, and to what amount. It was beyond the power of any court to substitute its discretion for hers; and no trust was created which a court of equity could execute, contrary to her judgment.

The moral obligation imposed upon the defendant is very strong. The plaintiff is the representative of the deceased sister of the defendant; and if the testator had died intestate, the plaintiff would have been entitled to one third of his estate. For reasons of his own, however, the testator preferred not to permit any title to any part of his estate to vest in this grandchild, but to leave entirely to the discretion of the defendant what portion she would take, in what manner and at what time. He therefore vested the absolute title to his residuary estate in the defendant, enjoining upon her only the duty of exercising this discretion, and expressing his conviction that she would do so honestly and fairly. She recognizes this moral obligation and avers her intention of performing it.

It is not for the courts to repudiate the confidence which the testator chose to repose in the defendant, and to assume a power which was not intended to be exercised by them, by determining in what manner, at what time and to what amount, the provision shall be made.

The orders of the General Term and subsequent proceedings should be reversed, and the judgment of the Special Term dismissing the complaint affirmed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT.

EXECUTORS OF Elizabeth RORER, Plffs. in Err.,
v.
William H. RORER.

*It is not error to permit a jury to take to their room, where they retire to consider of their verdict, an itemized account, used by counsel and referred to in the course of the trial, but not offered in evidence, proof as to the items of the account having been given, and the court having instructed the jury not to use it as evidence, except for the purpose of aiding the memory as to amount claimed by a party, should the jury find he was entitled to a verdict.

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas of Monmouth County, to review a judgment on a verdict for defendant in an action of assumpsit to recover the amount claimed to be due on two promissory notes and also on an account. Affirmed.

Argued before Beasley, Ch. J., Knapp, Magie and Parker, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. George C. Beekman, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. D. Holt, contra.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An action in assumpsit was brought in the Monmouth Pleas, by the executors of Elizabeth Rorer, deceased, against William H. Rorer to recover the amount claimed to be due on two promissory notes, and also on an account.

The defendant pleaded the general issue and gave notice of set-off, but did not attach a bill of particulars of his account; nor did the plaintiffs, before trial, demand of him a bill of particulars.

During the trial the counsel of the defendant, in examining his witness, made use of a paper containing a long itemized account of the demand on which his plea was founded; and the counsel for plaintiffs, in cross examination, used and referred to the same paper, but it was not offered in evidence.

At the conclusion of the testimony the defendant's counsel requested the court to permit the jury, when they should retire to consider of their verdict, to take said paper with them, for the purpose of aiding their memory as to the figures thereon, about which witnesses had testified.

The court allowed the jury to take the paper with them when they retired, to which decision of the court the plaintiffs' counsel objected, and prayed an exception, which was allowed.

In charging the jury the court instructed them that the said paper was not evidence of defendant's claim, and that they were permitted to take it out with them and use it only for the purpose of refreshing the memory as to the figures thereon, which had been sworn to. Was this error?

In some States this question is committed to the discretion of the courts by statute, and in those States the action of the trial court on this subject is final. There is no such statute here.

In their work on Juries, Thompson and Merriam state, as a general principle, that bills of particulars, statements of claims and computations, used on the trial for reference, although not received in evidence, may be taken to the jury room if so directed by the court; giving as a reason that such papers, like the pleadings in a cause, may be material aid to the jury in determining what the claim of a party really is; provided, however, that the jury are told by the court, and made to understand, that such papers must not be regarded by them as evidence.

In the State of Pennsylvania the courts permit parties to send out with the jury statements of their claims, accounts, computations, etc., simply to enable the jurors to remember what has been proved, which the memory is not expected to retain without such statements before them. This practice is sustained by numerous decisions in that State.

In the State of Michigan the same practice prevails. In Miller v. Cuddy, 43 Mich. 273, the court said: "There was no error in permitting the jury to take to their room the computation made by the plaintiff's attorney. It was but an aid to the jury in estimating the amount due the plaintiff, if they found his theory of the case correct. They were in no way bound by it, and were not misled thereby, as they could not consider it as evidence. It was in accordance with well settled practice and was unobjectionable."

The same rule prevails in the State of Vermont, where the courts say to the jurors that they may take such papers to the jury room, but must not regard them as evidence (where they have not been so admitted at the trial) but can use them merely to refresh memory.

In the case now under consideration, the paper which the court permitted the jury to take to their room was an itemized account of the defendant's claim, concerning which there was proof at the trial. The counsel on both sides had referred to the paper in the course of the examination of witnesses. The court was careful to instruct the jury that the paper was not evidence of defendant's demand.

We find no error in this, and the judgment is affirmed.

CERTIORARI to review a judgment of a justice of the peace on a verdict for claimant in attachment proceedings. Reversed.

Argued before Depue, Dixon and Reed, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. T. Cowles, for plaintiff in certiorari.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This certiorari brings up the proceedings had before a justice of the peace on trial of a claim to a wagon which had been attached as belonging to Peter C. Schmidt.

The claimant, Henry R. Fechtman, rested his claim upon a mortgage of the wagon given to him by Schmidt, dated May 11, 1885, securing payment of a note for $100 of the same date, due in sixty days thereafter. The mortgage contained a provision that in case default should be made in payment of the note, the mortgagee might take possession of the wagon, but until such default the mortgagor was to remain in quiet and peaceable possession and full and free enjoyment of the same.

The claim was presented June 12, 1885, and the trial took place June 16, 1885. The note did not mature until July 13, 1885.

When the attachment was levied, the wagon was in the possession of the defendant in attachment, who was the general owner. The claimant did not become entitled to possession until the maturity of his debt. While the mortgagor retained possession of the wagon it was subject to seizure by virtue of an execution or attachment against him; Fox v. Cronan, 18 Vroom, 493; and the possession under such legal process could not lawfully be disturbed by any one whose right of possession had not become perfect against the defendant.

The trial upon the claim was to determine whether the property belonged to the claimant; Rev. p. 550, § 60; and inasmuch as, by his own showing, it appeared that he was neither the owner of the wagon nor entitled to possession of it, it could not, in any just sense, be said that the wagon belonged to him; and consequently the justice should, as requested, have instructed the jury to that effect. He refused, however, to do so, and the jury found for the claimant.

The finding and judgment thereon should be reversed.

Samuel E. LIPPINCOTT, Admr., etc.

*Where a rule, to show cause why a judgment of non pros. should not be set aside, was obtained on the ground that the files of the court in the suit showed that the judgment had been irregularly entered, and the rule recited the matters appearing by the files, the plaintiff, on a motion to make the rule absolute, may produce the files without other formality.

RULE to show cause why a judgment of non pros. should not be set aside, in an action of debt. Rule made absolute.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. A. Armstrong, for the rule.

Mr. A. Flanders, contra.

Per Curiam:

A rule to show cause why a judgment of non pros. should not be set aside was obtained, on the ground that the files of the court in the suit showed the judgment to have been irregularly entered. The rule recited the matters appearing by the files, which indicated the irregularity. The rule was served on the defendant's attorney, but nothing further was done under it until the time mentioned for showing cause.

The plaintiff then moved that the rule be made absolute, and produced the files in support of his motion. The defendant objected that the files had not been offered in evidence previously, under the rule to show cause, so that he might have had an opportunity of impugning their accuracy.

The plaintiff, having apprised the defendant of the files upon which he would rely, may produce them without other formality.

The rule should be made absolute.

1. In a suit brought by a turnpike company to recover tolls it is no defense that the company has not complied with its charter in making its road, nor that such road was not in a proper state when defendant used it.
2. The company is answerable for such delinquencies to the public at large in a public prosecution, but not to the defendant nor any other individual.

ERROR to the Middlesex Circuit Court, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action to recover upon a contract to pay tolls. Affirmed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Alan H. Strong, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. A. V. Schenck, for defendant in error.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought to recover tolls alleged to be due from Mrs. Stults to the Company, for travel by her over its road.

The action is in assumpsit, and is based upon a contract to pay $65 a year, in monthly payments, in commutation of tolls. There are also common counts, including counts for tolls, in the declaration. Mrs. Stults pleaded the general issue, and pleaded also, specially, that the Company had not complied with the requirements of the charter, in that it had not constructed the road according to the provisions of that instrument, and had not kept it in good repair, etc.

* Head note by the Court.

One of the assignments of error is in reference to the exclusion of evidence of a conversation which, it is alleged, took place between Mr. Stults and J. Biddle Herbert, a director of the Company, prior to the making of the contract. It does not appear by the record what the subject of the conversation was which it was thus proposed to put in evidence. The same may be said in respect to the objection to the refusal to admit testimony as to what certain persons—one, the engineer of the Company, another, the superintendent, and the third, a toll-gate keeper—said when the witness complained to them of the condition of the road. It may be added that it does not appear that the statements of those persons upon the subject, whatever they might have been, were made under such circumstances as to be binding upon the Company.

The charge of the judge upon the subject of the Company's compliance with the requirements of its charter as to the construction of the road is also made the subject of objection. It was correct.

The cause was tried upon the issues, but it should be said the defenses set up by the special pleas were not allowable. Those matters constituted no defense to the action. To an action by a turnpike company for the recovery of tolls, it is not permissible to set up as a defense that the company has not complied with the requirements of the charter in making the road, nor that the road was not in a proper state when the defendant passed over it. The company is answerable for such delinquencies to the public at large in a public prosecution, and not to the defendant, or any other individual. Vinkestone v. Ebden, 1 Salk. 249; Adams v. Beach, 6 Hill, 271; Centre Turnpike Co. v. Smith, 12 Vt. 212; Strong v. Dunlap, 10 Humph. 423; Proprietors of Quincy Canal v. Newcomb, 7 Met. 276.

In Vinkestone v. Ebden, ubi supra, where the question was as to the liability to pay port duties, it was held that to entitle the town to recover the duties it was not necessary that it should show that it actually did keep the port in repair, for the consideration of the liability to pay the duties was not the keeping of the port in repair, but the fact that the town was bound to do so.

In Proprietors etc. v. Newcomb, ubi supra, which was a suit for tolls for using a canal, the court said: "This canal is a public highway * * * and every individual has a right to use the canal, on paying the toll. Levying a toll on a public highway, whether by land or water, is a claim of franchise; and whoever makes such claim without authority is liable to an information in the nature of a quo warranto. So if the canal is not made according to the provisions of the Act of incorporation, it is the failure to perform a public duty, for which indictment or information will lie. If the canal was opened, and the toll claimed, and the public did not interfere, and the defendant used the canal, he thereby subjected himself to the payment of the toll. By demanding the toll the plaintiffs claim to have complied with the conditions and provisions of their Act of incorporation; and the defendant, by using their canal, is estopped to deny their right to the payment of the toll; although they might be proceeded against by quo warranto for the repeal and dissolution of their charter, or by indictment for a misdemeanor in not keeping it in repair." See also Nicholson v. Williamstown etc. Turnpike Co. 4 Dutch. 142.

The charter of the Company authorized it to erect toll gates and take tolls, so soon as one mile of the road had been completed, and it provides a prompt, ready and efficient remedy in case the road should not be kept in proper repair. That remedy is by complaint to a judge of the court of common pleas, who is to appoint three disinterested freeholders to view the road and report whether it is in such a condition as required by law, and if their report be that it is not in such condition, the judge is to order that the gates be kept open until further order.

The judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

For affirmance—The Chancellor, Chief Justice, Depue, Dixon, Knapp, Magie, Parker, Reed, Van Syckel, Brown, Clement, Cole, McGregor, Whitaker—14.

For reversal—None.

Settle v. Alison, 8 Ga. 201-209; Marquand v. Webb, 16 Johns. 89-91; Delaware etc. Canal Co. v. Barnes, 31 Pa. 193, 196, 197.

The necessity for the withdrawing, by the court, of any incompetent evidence from the consideration of the jury is recognized and enforced in the following cases.

Deerfield v. Northwood, 10 N. H. 269; Hamblett v. Hamblett, 6 N. H. 334; Randall v. Doane, 9 Gray, 408; Tullidge v. Wade, 3 Wils. 18.

So carefully have the courts guarded the rights of litigants, to a perfectly fair trial, by strictly legal methods and upon entirely competent proof only, that it has been held that even the direction of the court to the jury to disregard illegal evidence is not enough to cover the error of its admission.

Shaeffer v. Kreitzer, 6 Binn. 430; Nash v. Gilkeson, 5 Serg. & R. 352; Ingham v. Crary, 1 Penr. & W. 389; Gillet v. Mead, 7 Wend. 193.

The courts of review hold that incompetent evidence having been admitted in the trial court, the court of review must set the verdict aside and grant a new trial.

Gage v. M'Ilwain, 1 Strob. Law (S. C.) 135; Den v. Johnson, 3 Harrison (N. J.) 101.

The return of surveyors, of August 19, 1820, was not competent evidence by which to prove the existence of a public road, when objection was made to its admission in evidence. It is not the record of the proceedings of the court of common pleas, but of the proceedings of the surveyors who were exercising a special authority given by the statute, not conferred by the court.

In all cases when the exercise of a special authority is delegated to particular persons, or special and limited tribunals, the preliminaries which give them power to act must appear on the face of the proceedings themselves.

State v. Lewis, 2 Zab. 564.

The return itself shows no compliance with jurisdictional requirements and cannot be offered as a means of proof. There are several grounds of objection.

1. The return does not show due proof of advertisement of the meeting of the surveyors.

That the surveyors shall act on the proof of the advertisement of their meeting is a jurisdictional fact which is necessary to give validity to their action.

State v. Scott, 4 Halst. Law, 22; Turner v. Bank of N. A. 4 Dall. 8 (4 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 718); State v. Van Geison, 3 J. S. Green, 341, 342; *N. J. etc. R. J.) 78; State v. Lewis, 2 Zab. 564, 566; State v. Lord, 2 Dutch. 140; Matter of Highway, 1 Harrison (N. J.) 93.

2. The return shows that five of the surveyors acted, and made and signed the return; but it does not show whether the sixth was present and did not concur, or if absent whether he was served with such notice as the law requires. This omission is fatal.

State v. Van Geison, State v. Scott, N. J. etc. R. R. etc. Co. v. Suydam, and State v. Lord, supra; Griscom v. Gilmore, 1 Harrison (N. J.) 106.

3. In the return an adjournment to a different place than that fixed by the court is set out, but no showing of any notice, either verbal to parties or written to the sixth surveyor.

Act 1818, § 5; State v. Lippincott, 1 Dutch. 434.

4. The surveyors do not show by the return that they regarded either public or private convenience, the shortest distance or best ground.

State, Parmley, v. White, 6 Vroom, 204.

The highest courts of New Jersey have repeatedly held the proceedings of special and limited jurisdictions to be void, when jurisdictional facts do not affirmatively appear, and that they may be impeached collaterally.

Martin v. Carron, 2 Dutch. 230; S. C. Id. 594; Nixon v. Ruple, 1 Vroom, 58; Munday v. Vail, 5 Vroom, 420; Cross v. Morristown, 3 C. E. Green, 305.

In Tainter v. Mayor of Morristown, 4 C. E. Green, 46, a return made under Act of 1774 was challenged because it did not appear that proper notice of the meeting of surveyors had been given. No proof of any notice whatever was required by this Statute of 1774; and consequently the return, if attacked on that ground directly by certiorari, would not have been set aside, as the chancellor admits in his opinion. It was then a perfectly good return, and unimpeachable either by direct attack or collateral inquiry. All that the court says beyond this is therefore mere dicta.

Taintor v. Morristown, 4 Vroom, 65, 66.

Messrs. C. H. Sinnickson and Wm. E. Potter, for defendant in error:

Said street or road became a public highway.

2. By user, having been used by the public as a highway for more than twenty years.

3. By dedication by the owners of the soil.

This bill is not a mere statement of documentary evidence to be offered by plaintiffs, but is a specific statement of the nature of the plaintiffs' claim, and they are confined to it.

Graham v. Whitely, 2 Dutch. 255.

That the court of common pleas is a court of general jurisdiction is undeniable.

Den, Vanderveere, v. Gaston, 4 Zab. 818; Dean v. Thatcher, 3 Vroom, 470.

If proceedings to lay out roads, under the Act of 1818, with its supplements, constitute "proceedings in the course of judicial action" before that court, they must stand until reversed by direct attack, and cannot be collaterally questioned.

That they are such proceedings appears to be patent. 1, they are begun by petition to the court; 2, the court exercises a discretion in the selection of surveyors.

Oxford v. Brands, 16 Vroom, 332.

Such discretion is not reviewable.

Parsell v. State, 1 Vroom, 530.

The proceeding to lay out a road has been, directly and in terms, decided by the supreme court to be "a proceeding in the course of judicial action."

Although the verdict is not in form and does not find the technical issue raised by the pleadings, if it is at the same time a verdict that the court can understand, and there is no difficulty in concluding a verdict out of the finding, it is the duty of the court to mold and work it into form, according to the justice of the case.

Coxe v. Field, 1 J. S. Green, 216; Willis v. Fernald, 4 Vroom, 206.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A suit in ejectment was brought by the Mayor and Council of the Borough of Woodstown against Edward B. Humphreys, to recover possession of a parcel of land in said Borough, containing forty-seven square feet.

The nature of the controversy between the parties is briefly stated in the bill of particulars furnished by the plaintiffs before the trial, which, by consent of counsel, was made part of the record. In it the plaintiffs claim that the premises in question are included within the bounds of a public road or street in the Borough of Woodstown, and that said road or street, including the locus in quo, had been used by the public as a road for more than twenty years, and had become a public highway by user.

It was also claimed that a public road, including the land, the possession of which was in dispute, had been laid out by surveyors of the highway in the year 1820, and the return of same, in August, of that year, recorded in the clerk's office of the County of Salem.

At the trial a number of witnesses were called and examined upon the question of user. The plaintiffs also offered in evidence the book of minutes of the Court of Common Pleas of the County of Salem of June Term, 1820, containing the order of the court appointing surveyors of the highways to lay out a public road. The return of the road laid out by the surveyors, dated August 19, 1820, was also offered.

To these offers objection was made, not on account of the mode of proof, but because of alleged defects and irregularities in the proceedings of the surveyors, appearing on the face of the order and return. The objections were overruled, the evidence admitted, and exception taken.

Upon the question of user the judge charged the jury first to determine and return, as matter of fact, whether the locus in quo had been used for a public road, running over the place in dispute, for more than twenty years before the year 1865, the time of the erection by defendant of the railing and cellar way complained of.

The judge further charged that if the jury found that question in the affirmative, they need not proceed further in the investigation, but return a verdict for the plaintiffs; but if they were not satisfied, from the evidence, that there was a public road there by user for a period of over twenty years previous to 1865, including the locus in quo, then they should proceed to inquire and to determine whether the public road laid out and returned by surveyors of the highways August 19, 1820, included within its bounds the locus in quo.

When the jury rendered their verdict the judge was not present; and by consent of counsel the clerk received it. The verdict rendered by the jury was as follows, viz.: "We find for the plaintiffs; and we find that the place in dispute was within the limits of a public street for a period of at least twenty years anterior to the erection of the railing and cellar way by the defendant in 1865."

Application upon notice was made to the court to mold the verdict into proper form, which was heard; and the judge thereupon made the following order, viz.:

"It appearing to the court that the jury impaneled in above stated cause did find and return a verdict in said cause, which, as recorded by the clerk, is as follows, viz.: (as above stated) and application being made to the court to mold said verdict into proper form, and it appearing that due notice of the making of this application hath been given to the attorney of record of the said defendant, and the court having heard such application, and having duly considered the matter in question, it is, on this 26th day of October, A. D. 1885, ordered, on motion of the attorney of record of the plaintiffs, that the verdict of the jury aforesaid be and the same is hereby amended and molded into proper form, so that the same shall read as follows, viz.: 'We find that the said defendant, Edward B. Humphreys, is guilty in manner and form as the said plaintiffs, the Mayor and Council of the Borough of Woodstown, complained against him; and we do assess the damages of the said plaintiffs, over and above their costs and charges, to six cents; and we do also find that the place in dispute was within the limits of a public street, for a period of at least twenty years anterior to the erection of the railing and cellar way by the defendant in 1865.' And it is further ordered that the clerk of the court make entry of the verdict returned by the jury aforesaid in manner and form as the same is herein above molded and amended by the court."

Thus it appears that the jury found the locus in quo to be in a public highway, made so by user for more than twenty years before the occupation thereof by defendant in 1865; and upon such finding the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment of possession, whether the public road laid out in 1820 by surveyors of the highways included the premises in dispute or not. The jury did not pass upon any question, except whether the premises were within a public highway, made so by user; and finding that issue in the affirmative, it was not necessary for them to consider, and they did not consider and determine, whether the disputed premises were within the bounds of the public road laid out in 1820.

The exceptions taken at the trial related to the admission of evidence, and refusals to charge in reference to the public road laid out in 1820. As the verdict was based alone on the fact of a highway by user, which included the locus in quo, the admission in evidence of the minutes of the court of common pleas, and the return of the road laid out in 1820, could not affect the result. The plaintiffs were entitled to a verdict, whether that evidence was legal or not.

So, also, it matters not whether the trial judge was right or wrong in refusing to charge as requested, because the requests related to the road laid out in 1820, a subject which was eliminated from the cause, when the jury based their verdict solely upon the fact of a highway by user, including the locus in quo.

If the judge had erred in admitting in evidence the book of minutes and the return of the surveyors, and in refusing to charge as requested, no injury to the defendant resulted, because the verdict was grounded only on the question of user, in relation to which no exception to evidence or to the charge was taken. The charge of the court, or refusal to charge, can be assigned for error only when the party objecting or requesting is injured by the ruling.

The counsel for the plaintiff in error insist that the admission of the return of the public road of 1820 by the surveyors of the highways, and the book of minutes of the court of common pleas, injured the defendant, because it tended to incline the jury to the result they reached on the question of user.

The argument is that if the jury had evidence before them that a public road had been laid out by surveyors of the highways, over the locality in question, more than sixty years previous, they would be more likely to reach the conclusion that there was a highway there by user. It is difficult to perceive how this would be possible, in view of the charge of the court, which submitted to the jury the questions separately, in clear terms. The judge charged distinctly that the jury should first consider and determine whether the place in dispute was within the limits of a public highway created by user for more than twenty years, and if they so found they need not go further, but return a verdict for the plaintiffs; but if they did not so find, then they might proceed to the consideration of the question whether the premises in dispute were within the bounds of the public road laid out in 1820.

But suppose the admission in evidence of the book of minutes, and the return of the surveyors, did have some influence upon the jury, tending towards the result arrived at, and manifested by their verdict; if such evidence was not illegal, the judgment entered on the verdict will not be disturbed. It is clear that the judge did not err in admitting the evidence.

It will be observed that no objection was made to the mode of proof; but it is contended that upon inspecting the order for the appointment of surveyors of highways, and the return of the road, there appears on the face of the papers that there was a noncompliance with the law, in respect to jurisdictional requirements, which rendered the return of the road illegal and of no probative force, and therefore inadmissible as evidence.

One alleged defect is that it does not appear that proof was made before the surveyors that the advertisements of their meeting had been set up according to law; or that any notice whatever of their meeting had been given. Another alleged defect is that while it appears on the face of the return that only five of the surveyors signed it, it does not appear whether the sixth surveyor was present, or if he had notice of the meeting.

If these objections to the legality of the return of the road had been made before the Court of Common Pleas of the County of Salem, in 1820, at the term succeeding the coming in of the return, it is probable it would have been set aside by that court; and if not set aside there, the proceedings might have been removed, within the time limited by law, to the supreme court, where they would undoubtedly have been declared illegal. But the legality of the return cannot be questioned in this cause, by reason of alleged unlawful action or want of action by the surveyors of the highway. The court of common pleas had at that time jurisdiction over the subject matter, but a recorded road return cannot be attacked collaterally. At this distant period of time, upon the production and proof of a road return, the court will presume that whatever was necessary to make the return valid was done; and a party will not be permitted to go behind the return, to question the proceedings.

In Frame v. Boyd, 6 Vroom, 457, it was decided that the return of a public road was a proceeding in the course of judicial action. The court of common pleas, under a well settled course of adjudication, has power to set the return aside, if defective. If not set aside, it was the duty of the court to order the return recorded; and this involved judicial inquiry.

The opinion in the case just cited holds that the return of a public road is not merely a statutory proceeding outside the court, filed in the office, over which the court has no control, but, although statutory, it is part of a judicial proceeding. The recorded return of a road is equivalent to a judgment, and cannot be questioned collaterally.

In direct conflict with the uniform practice of the courts of common pleas of the various counties of this State, and in opposition to the decisions of the courts, the counsel for the plaintiffs in error cannot successfully contend that the court of common pleas has jurisdiction over the subject of roads only to the extent of deciding whether proper notice of the application had been given, and selecting the surveyors to serve, and that when that had been done, the jurisdiction of the court ceased. If the court of common pleas was invested with such power only, it might be considered a tribunal of special and limited jurisdiction; and the result of its action might be impeached collaterally, when jurisdictional facts did not appear. But the court of common pleas, in regard to the subject under consideration, is a court of general jurisdiction.

The Road Act of 1818, under which the road in question was laid, is similar to the present Act, the eighth section of which provides that if no caveat be entered, the clerk shall, by order of the court, record the return; and every road so recorded shall be a lawful highway. Should there be a caveat, and the return not be set aside by the court of common pleas, and application be made for review by chosen freeholders, the court appoints them; and when they make their certificate the same has no binding effect until the court orders it to be recorded. Thus it is seen that the court of common pleas has jurisdiction over the subject matter.

In Tainter v. Morristown, 4 C. E. Green, 46, where the return of a road came up collaterally, it was decided that it could not be adjudged void for any irregularity or deficiency, and that where the road had been used under a return, the court would presume that the proceedings of the surveyors were lawful, although facts requisite to give the surveyors jurisdiction did not appear.

The evidence admitted was legal, and there was no error in the ruling of the court to receive it.

The seventy-eighth section of the Road Act provides that all public roads having been laid out by surveyors or otherwise, and not opened, worked or used, for more than twenty years next before the 24th day of March, 1859, shall be considered and are declared by said section to be vacated.

In view of this section the counsel of defendant requested the court to charge that if the jury believed that the road of 1820 was not opened and used over the locus in quo for twenty years or more next after the same was laid out, then it was, to the extent of the locus in quo, vacated.

The court properly refused so to charge. There was no evidence showing that the locus in quo was not used as part of a public highway for twenty years or more after it was laid out. A request to charge must be supported by evidence; and if a request be made which is not supported by any testimony, and the court refuses to charge as requested, it is not error. Davison v. Schooley, 5 Halst. Law, 171.

The question upon which a charge is requested must appear not to be merely hypothetcal, but must be warranted by the evidence, and necessarily involved in the verdict. Allen v. Wanamaker, 2 Vroom, 370.

The proposition contained in the request is not the law. The section in the Road Act just cited refers to cases where no part of the road laid out has been opened and used. A road may be opened, used and worked throughout its entire length, and yet not used and worked on every foot of its entire breadth; and if the locus in quo, being within the lines of the road, was not actually passed over by the wheels of vehicles, it would not therefore be vacated.

It has been settled in this State that encroachment on a highway cannot be legalized by lapse of time. If the public once acquires a right to any part of a road, it cannot be lost by negligence of public officers. 4 C. E. Green, 59.

In that case the chancellor said that "Time does not run against the State or the public. * * * To protect highways from encroachments, that it is the business of no one to resist, requires that the public be allowed to resume its rights at any distance of time, disregarding any loss to those who have appropriated it and erected improvements on the public domain."

The last assignment of error is directed against the power of the court to mold the verdict of the jury. The attorney of plaintiff in error, attending upon notice, made no objection to the court directing the verdict put in proper form, nor did he except to the order made by the judge on that subject. Under the circumstances, counsel of the plaintiff in error has no right now to be heard on that question. But supposing the question properly before this court, it is clear that there was no error in the ruling. The verdict was not changed in substance, but only put in proper form. This practice is of almost daily occurrence. It is seldom that a verdict is stated by a jury with technical correctness. The one hundred thirty-eighth section of the Practice Act (Rev. p. 869) gives ample power to the court, in order to prevent the failure of justice by formal objections, to amend as may be necessary to determine the question in controversy.

It has been decided repeatedly, in this and other States, that if the point at issue can be concluded from the finding of the jury the court will mold it into form and give it due and legal effect. Stewart v. Fitch and Price v. N. J. R. R. & T. Co. 2 Vroom, 17, 229; Phillips v. Kent, 3 Zab. 155.

The right of the Borough to bring the suit was not controverted; and the court has not, therefore, considered that question.

There being no error in the rulings of the court, the judgment is affirmed.

(June Term, 1886.)

*Head notes by SCUDDER, J.

ERROR to the Supreme Court, to review a judgment affirming on certiorari an assessment for a tax and invalidating a sale therefor. Affirmed.

Land in the City of Rahway was assessed to Julia Chapman for taxes of 1876, and in default of payment thereof sold to the mayor, etc., of the city, and the city subsequently assigned the certificate of the sale to Caroline R. Hunt.

The case was heard in the Supreme Court at the February Term, 1885, before Depue, Van Syckel and Scudder, JJ., on certiorari to review the assessment and sale, and the following opinion was there delivered by SCUDDER, J.:

The first motion is made on behalf of the defendants, to dismiss the writ of certiorari, because not allowed within six years from the date or time of the sale, according to the "supplement to the Act to regulate the practice of courts of law," (P. L. 1884, p. 269) approved April 25, 1884.

The sale of these lands for taxes was made January 5, 1878; the certificate of sale is dated March 20, 1878, and the writ was allowed October 20, 1884, after more than six years had elapsed. The writ was purchased in aid of an action of ejectment and is within time, unless this recent statute is applicable. State, Baxter, v. Jersey City, 7 Vroom, 188.

The Act is brief, and enacts "That no writ of certiorari shall hereafter be granted or allowed to review any assessment for taxes, to recover which taxes any sale has been had or made by virtue of any special or local law, or to review the proceedings of any such sale, unless such writ be granted or allowed within six years from the date or time of such sale." It is to take effect immediately.

This sale was made under a special and local law, to wit: the charter of the City of Rahway, and is, in this respect, within the terms of the statute. But the important question is whether the whole Act is intended to be retrospective, or prospective only. Its terms are prospective, and apply to all cases where, in the future, any sale has been had or made for the recovery of taxes. The fact of such sale is made the point on which the limitation shall begin to act; and the writ can only be granted or allowed within six years thereafter.

It is true that the words "has been had," or "has been made," might apply to a sale that had been made before the law was enacted; but the construction already given, that it may indicate a sale in the future, is sufficient to decide which shall be adopted, for the rule of construction of statutes is that every reasonable endeavor shall be made so to interpret the statutory text as to give the law a prospective and not a retroactive effect. Proprietors v. Jones, 7 Vroom, 206; State, Alden, v. Newark, 11 Vroom, 92; State, McGovern, v. Connell, 14 Vroom, 106; Citizens' Gas Light Co. v. Alden, 15 Vroom, 648; Boylan v. Kelly, 9 Stew. Eq. 331.

If a retroactive effect were given, then the cases of municipal sales in the past, where the parties may, by statute (Rev. p. 1045, § 15), have the proceedings reviewed by certiorari, are suddenly deprived of this remedy without any time given before the Act takes effect. A law limiting the time in which an action shall be brought has been held not to apply to a suit which was begun after the Act was passed, but before it took effect. State, Vreeland, v. Bergen, 5 Vroom, 438.

It is conceded that while there is no power in the Legislature to take from this court the right to allow a writ of certiorari, or to deprive the writ of any of its essential attributes as a prerogative writ, yet a reasonable regulation or limitation as to the time within which it is to be sued for and allowed, is valid. State, Green, v. Jersey City, 18 Vroom, 118.

But it has been doubted whether any such limitation can be imposed, where an assessment on lands has been made under a statute which is challenged as unconstitutional. State, Van Cleef, v. New Brunswick, 9 Vroom, 320.

It is essential that all statutes of limitation which affect existing rights and remedies shall allow a reasonable time after they take effect, for the commencement of suits upon such causes of action.

This is a general rule which has been applied in many cases. Cooley, Const. Lim. § 366, and notes.

To give this statute immediate effect as a retroactive law would take away rights now secured by statute, without any time given for their assertion. This will not be presumed to be the legislative intention; nor will such construction be given, unless the words used are so positive as to permit no other interpretation.

The other reasons relating to the form of the assessment are either not sustained by the facts, as proved, or are amendable under the Statute of 1881, and may be corrected by evidence outside the return. Woodbridge v. State, Allen, 14 Vroom, 262; Conover v. Honce, 17 Vroom, 347. It is not necessary to refer to them in detail.

There is, however, a defect in the advertisement of sale which cannot be remedied. The only notice of what property is to be sold is in these words: "Third Ward, Chapman, Julia A., cost 1.50, Int. 24.22, Tax, 177.23—Total 202.95."

This is the only advertisement of eight parcels of land in the Third Ward belonging to Julia A. Chapman. To hold such notice of sales of land for taxes good would go far beyond any case yet decided.

State, Allen, v. Woodbridge, 13 Vroom, 401, where there was a fuller description given, says it should be such as to warn the owner for what property he is assessed, and such as to secure a fair sale, by showing to purchasers what property is to be sold. Here, there was no notice to purchasers to indicate whether one lot or eight lots were to be sold, and no description whatever, by which they could be identified.

This omission will invalidate the sale and all that follows it, including the certificate of sale to the city and the declaration of sale to Caroline R. Hunt.

The assessment is particular and sufficiently descriptive of the land, giving the name of the owner, the ward, the streets, number of lots, and amount assessed.

This will, therefore, be affirmed, but without costs to either party.

Messrs. Vail & Ward, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Robert E. Chetwood, for defendant in error:

The defect in the advertisement of sale, cannot be remedied by invoking the aid of the Statute of March 23, 1881, P. L. page 194, because this Act gives jurisdiction to the court to amend in case of irregularities or defects in form only.

State v. Montclair etc. R. R. Co. 14 Vroom, 524; State, Peckham, v. Newark, 14 Vroom, 576; Conover v. Honce, 17 Vroom, 347.

The absence of the description of the property in the advertisement of the sale is not an irregularity or defect in form only. The description of the property is essential and necessary to a valid advertisement and sale of the property. It is a condition precedent to such advertisement and sale. Without a description of some kind the sale is absolutely void. The want of such description is not an irregularity or defect in form only, and therefore is not within the terms of the statute.

Per Curiam :

The judgment in this case is affirmed, for the reasons given by the Supreme Court in its opinion.

For affirmance—The Chancellor, Chief Justice, Dixon, Knapp, Magie, Parker, Reed, Brown, Clement, Cole, McGregor, Paterson, Whitaker.—13.

For reversal—None.

v.
John C. FARR et al.

A sale, by partners to a copartner, of all the partnership property, which was conceived in fraud, and carried through by fraudulent representation on the part of the vendee, cannot be upheld; it will, at the suit of a creditor of the firm, be declared void; and where the property sold has been converted into money, the proceeds must be accounted for.

BILL to set aside, as fraudulent towards partnership creditors, a transfer by partners to a copartner. Decree advised declaring transfer void.

The facts in this case are the same as those in Second National Bank of Red Bank v. Farr, 6 Cent. Rep. 321.

Messrs. Collins & Corbin and A. C. Hartshorne, for complainants.

Mr. W. S. Stuhr, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

This case was heard with that of Second Nat. Bank of Red Bank v. Farr, ante, 321.

I have taken still more time to consider this than that. And after all, my mind is that the whole transaction was conceived in fraud, and was, by fraudulent misrepresentations, carried through.

However much Mr. Farr may have been convinced of his ability to accomplish what he said he could, it was the merest delusion, as every step taken by him, after the purchase of the interests of his copartners proved. This is, in the law, a fraud which cannot be upheld by the courts.

I will advise that the sale be declared void. As the property has been converted into money, the proceeds must all be accounted for. When an application is made for distribution other questions which have been raised, will be determined. The complainants are entitled to costs.

Ella CHADWICK
ISLAND BEACH CO. et al.

1. The practice of the court of chancery is to put the purchaser at a foreclosure sale in possession by a writ of assistance, when the person refusing to deliver possession was a party defendant in the foreclosure proceedings.
2. Where the complainant and defendant in a foreclosure proceeding both derived a title to the mortgaged premises from the same source, but defendant also had title from another source, which latter title defendant claims is the superior and better title, and complainant only alleged in the proceedings the title of defendant derived from the common source, defendant's default only admits such title, leaving the title derived from the other source undecided; and against such latter title complainant is not entitled to a writ of assistance.

MOTION for writ of assistance. Denial of motion advised.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. J. Pancoast, for complainant, for the motion.

Mr. P. L. Voorhees, for defendant Island Beach Co., contra.

Bird, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

The complainant filed her bill to foreclose a mortgage given by E. P. Carpenter to H. W. Torra, to secure the payment of a bond for $15,000 on certain premises conveyed by said Torra to said Carpenter, in which mortgage the premises are described as follows: "Being all that part of Tucker's Island and Flat Beach lying on the southwesterly side of the new inlet, to the northwesterly side of where Brigantine Inlet formerly ran, containing within the last mentioned boundaries one hundred acres of land, be the same more or less."

One of the defendants, the Island Beach Company, was in the possession of the premises covered by the mortgage. Such proceedings were had that the complainant obtained a final decree directing a sale. An execution was issued, a sale of the premises was made by the sheriff, and the complainant was the purchaser. She now comes into this court by her petition asking the aid of this court, in obtaining possession, the said Island Beach Company having refused to deliver possession to her on demand.

The Company resists this motion. It disputes the title of the complainant, who was the purchaser and is now the petitioner. It says it is true the complainant had a mortgage which purported to cover certain lands, but which mortgage was worthless, because the mortgagor really had no title to the lands included in the mortgage which he gave. In other words, the Island Beach Company says, You and your grantors for some time past describe certain lands and premises in your and their conveyances; but neither you nor they had, in reality any title whatever thereto. It says, If at any time any of your grantors had title to lands in the vicinity of the lands in question, they were situated a considerable distance from the lands described in the complainant's mortgage and were no part of them.

It further says that it has procured title from the board of proprietors for this very land, which the said board caused to be located for it, and that thereby it has a perfect title as against the complainant. It insists, also, that whatever may be the rights of the parties, the complainant cannot proceed, in this summary way, to recover possession; urging upon our attention the well settled practice that when there is a dispute as to title the purchaser must settle it by an action at law.

But the practice also is for the court of chancery to put the purchaser in possession by a writ of assistance, when the person refusing to deliver possession was a party defendant in the foreclosure proceedings.

In this case the defendant company was in possession of the premises as owner of the fee. It procured a title subsequently to the execution of the mortgage which was foreclosed, taking such title from E. B. Carpenter, the then owner of the fee, subject to the payments, conditions and agreements of the mortgage aforesaid. It surveyed said premises, made a map of them, plotting them and offering lots for sale, and has sold and conveyed several hundred lots, being parcels of the said mortgaged premises. The title which it took from the board of proprietors bears date January 24, 1882, subsequent to complainant's mortgage.

The title deeds offered in evidence, by the complainant, being sixteen or seventeen in number, carry us back to February 19, 1881; and these all describe the land included in the mortgage in the same terms as nearly as may be, and as above set forth.

Under such circumstances (the complainant and defendant both deriving their title on the one hand from the same source, but the defendant procuring title from another source, which it says is the superior and better title, and the defendant being in possession of the premises when the bill was filed and made a party thereto and allowing a decree to go against him by default) will it be proper for this court to aid the purchaser in obtaining possession?

The insistment that the court should implies that all the rights of the respective parties have been adjudicated which is in reality not true. No right or interest or title has been adjudicated or settled by the foreclosure proceedings and the final decree therein, except such as was alleged to be in the complainant for the purpose of perfecting his title, or such as was alleged to be in the defendant, or alleged to be claimed by the defendant for the purpose of removing it or having it declared subsequent or subject to the title of the complainant.

The complainant alleges that the defendant company took title by deed to these premises from Carpenter, and alleges that that conveyance was subsequent to her mortgage. This raised an issue which the defendant admitted, by not answering, to be in favor of the complainant, and consequently the decree pro confesso. But there was no issue raised with respect to any other title of the defendant company which now alleges, in answer to this petition, that it took title to these lands from the board of proprietors, who surveyed and located them to it, for the first time. So far as appears, the defendant had a right to take such title; and, if it be true that it has the first survey and location, it may ultimately be established, however many difficulties may present themselves, that such title is superior to all others.

I cannot now decide it. No issue has been made respecting it. Certainly there is difficulty enough before me not to attempt to override it or to disregard it, by putting the purchaser in possession.

The complainant had it in her power to raise this very issue by alleging, not only that the defendant held a deed of conveyance for the fee of the premises and claimed some interest therein, but also by alleging that the complainant claimed title from the board of proprietors, and then denying the legality or priority of that title. But this she did not do, and the issue thereby suggested remains undetermined.

The case of Wade v. Miller, 3 Vroom, 296, is quite in point. In that case a widow who had an interest in dower in lands took title to the same from her husband, through a third person, after the husband had executed a mortgage thereon in which she did not join. This mortgage was foreclosed after the death of the husband. The widow was made a party as the owner of the equity of redemption. Nothing was said in the bill, respecting her right or claim of dower. After decree, the property was sold and conveyed to the purchaser. The widow brought her action for dower, and it was declared that she was not deprived thereof by the decree because the question of her right of dower had not been raised. See also Kirkpatrick v. Corning, 11 Stew. Eq. 234.

This principle may be likened to the mortgage of a leasehold interest and the foreclosure thereof and sale of the term, without making the remainderman a party, who has obtained possession either through some default of the lessee or the expiration of term, before the sale under foreclosure. In such case, I think, the court would not award a writ of assistance.

I will advise an order denying the motion, with costs

Louis M. FINGER
v.
Jacob H. HAHN.

Where one sold out his butcher business, and covenanted with the purchaser that he would "not carry on the retail butcher business on his own account, or operate any butcher business, except a wholesale butcher business, within the limits of the city," held, that his engaging with another as an assistant in the retail butcher business in such city, at a salary, was a violation of his covenant.

BILL for an injunction to restrain the defendant from engaging in business. On final hearing or pleadings and proofs. Decree advised making injunction perpetual.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. E. Bradner, for complainant.

Mr. G. H. Lambert, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

The complainant, Finger, purchased the butcher business of the defendant, Hahn, in which he was engaged in the City of Newark. Hahn entered into a covenant, in these words: "Does hereby covenant to and with the party of the second part * * * that he will not carry on the retail butcher business on his own account, or operate any butcher business, except a wholesale butcher business, within the corporate limits of the City of Newark," during a period not yet expired.

Soon thereafter Hahn commenced the grocery business; this proving a failure, he desired to sell it; to do which he had an opportunity, provided the purchaser, one Horst, could establish, in connection therewith, the butcher business. Hahn sold to Horst and the butcher business was established in connection with the grocery business. Horst employed Hahn to assist in the butcher business, as well as the grocery.

Hahn says he was to receive $30 a week as compensation for his services, but didn't know whether that would be his compensation or not, if he could not cut meats. Hahn bought all the meats for the establishment, and, as I understand his testimony, continues to do so.

The prayer of the bill is that Hahn may be restrained from carrying on the retail butcher business on his own account or operating any butcher business except a wholesale butcher business, within the corporate limits of the City of Newark during the period fixed by the agreement.

It is strenuously insisted that there has been no violation of the agreement. Let us see if Hahn has engaged in any business which seems reasonably to be a violation of his covenant. He engaged with Horst to cut meats for him, as well as to assist in the grocery business. It may be said that this is not proof of his "carrying on the retail butcher business on his own account," but it cannot be claimed that it does not bring him within the other phrase "or operating any butcher business." I cannot perceive that the mere fact of his being employed at a salary protects him against this covenant.

In my judgment the letter and spirit of the covenant are just as certainly violated, as though he were in partnership with Horst or had the entire ownership and control of the business himself. In common sense or reason, the object of every such covenant is to get rid of the competition which endangers the business of the purchasing party; to remove beyond reach the influence of the vendor's popularity, business integrity, knowledge or skill; and to make it impossible for personal influences and friendly considerations, arising from long continued business acquaintance, exerting themselves to the prejudice of such purchaser. Without these considerations such contracts are quite meaningless. But not one of these influences is there which will not be felt or brought to bear, to a greater or less extent, if the vendor engaged in business even as a clerk.

This reasoning is established beyond controversy in this very case; for persons who had been purchasers of Hahn, before he sold to Finger, continued to buy meats of Finger, until a short time after Horst purchased the grocery business of Hahn and opened in connection therewith the butcher business, when they left Finger and made their purchases of Horst. So many did this that it certainly was very damaging to Finger.

Now there is nothing whatever to show that these customers left Finger and went to Horst on account of Horst, or because of his skill in the business. Indeed I think that Horst was a stranger to them, absolutely, and was a comparative stranger in the City of Newark, and to the butcher business, although he had formerly been engaged in business in Decatur, Illinois. How then can the mind escape the conclusion that Hahn, engaging with Horst as clerk, and assisting in the butcher shop as well as in the grocery, did violate his covenant not to operate any butcher business except to wholesale? Certainly he injured Finger.

The legal effect of this, the defendant's counsel endeavors to overcome by insisting that it does not appear that Hahn really did any act which was in violation of his contract. This argument I think is overcome by the facts disclosed in his testimony. Mr. Hahn says in answer to certain questions viz.:

Q. What do you do for Mr. Horst at the present time? How are you engaged?

A. I do all the buying for him for the place.

Q. Buying what?

A. Of everything that he sells there; meats, groceries, vegetables, fruits and everything.

Now I think everyone will say that no part of the butcher business is of greater importance than that of buying, and that the experience and skill of Hahn in that particular was of great value to Horst and, if brought in competition with Finger, must be very damaging to him. The only difference between this and running a business on his own account, absolutely, is that of degree or extent.

Again, Hahn says to the questions:

Q. Where do you take orders?

A. Inside of the grocery store.

Q. And how do you take them? What are the orders for that you take?

A. Well, regular routine of goods they want; groceries, meats or anything they want.

He also says he calls off orders from the books after they are taken down; this he says he is doing right along. To a lady customer who was on her way to Finger's and who was speaking to him about meats, in front of Horst's store, and who said to him that she could buy much cheaper down there, meaning Finger's, Hahn said: "The boys ought to be able to sell to you as cheap as anywheres, because I buy it cheap enough for them." When he said this he stood under the sign first adopted by himself in large letters: "J. H. Hahn & Co.," just above which was the sign "Park Market Co." adopted by Horst.

I conclude that the facts bring this case within the spirit and reason of the cases heretofore decided by the most eminent judges.

ANGLECEY v. COLGAN.

On an application by complainant for an injunction restraining defendant from executing a judgment at law in ejectment against him, it appearing from the statements in the bill that the plaintiff has no equity, and no fraud or mistake or surprise requiring the interference of this court being shown, the injunction is denied.

(Filed April 11, 1887.)

BILL for an injunction to restrain the execution of a judgment at law in ejectment. Denied.

The case is stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. Peter Bentley, for complainant.
Mr. M. T. Newbold, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The complainant, Anglecey, asks for an injunction restraining the defendant, Colgan, from executing a judgment at law in ejectment against him. An order to show cause was awarded.

Is Anglecey entitled to a preliminary injunction as the case now stands? Taking the statements of the bill, it appears that one Kelly was the owner of four lots of land which were plotted and mapped on the map of Jersey City and numbered 93, 97, 98 and 99. On June 1, 1875, Kelly conveyed said lots to one B., and B. secured a part of the consideration money by his bond and a mortgage on lot 97, together with other property, for $3,000; that Kelly foreclosed this mortgage and, at sale made by the sheriff, became the purchaser of said lot 97 and took a deed therefor, and that Kelly went into the possession of said lot and occupied the house thereon, and on April 25, 1879, sold and conveyed to Anglecey.

The bill states that K. represented that he was the owner of said house and land, and then states that all of the deeds refer to said lot by lot and "block" number "referring to the map, and that said lot 97, on said map, referred to in said deeds, is twenty-three feet, four inches (23 ft. 4 in.) in width, but that the house upon said lot ninety-seven (97) which was erected for many years before Kelly sold" it to B., is about twenty-five feet in width, "and was located about two feet, eight inches, on the northerly side of lot ninety-eight."

It appears that the other three lots (93, 98 and 99) were in 1876 conveyed by said Kelly to one Colgan and his wife, who is the defendant; that afterwards (1878) said Colgan conveyed his interest to his wife, and that she brought her action at law in ejectment against Anglecey to recover that portion of lot 99, being about two feet and eight inches, which is covered by the house standing principally on lot 97, and which was standing there before the land was mapped and plotted into lots, and that in that action Colgan recovered a judgment and now threatens to execute.

The bill then states that the complainant, Anglecey, has other evidence which he was unable to produce at the trial of the action at law, further stating that said Kelly knew all about the arrangements; but it does not appear that Kelly was subpenaed or that he could not be reached; and also that said B. was subpenaed but failed to appear, and that his testimony is important.

Now is there any equity in this? First, as to representations. What were they? When Kelly sold lot 97 to Anglecey he was in possession of the house which had for a long time stood partly on lot 99, which last lot was then owned by the defendant. Such possession of the house by Kelly may have been some advertisement to the world that he was the owner or had some rights or interests in all of the land which it covered. It was enough, perhaps, to put anyone bargaining for lot 99 upon inquiry; but was the fact of possession of the house enough to justify Anglecey in dispensing with all further inquiry as to the title and quantity of land? Was it enough when the deed which Anglecey accepted referred to the number of the lot and to the map, which was a matter of record and which correctly described the lot, giving its true width?

It would seem that if the possession by Kelly was an advertisement of ownership of any value in determining the equity of the parties, the unequivocal advertisement or notice in the deed that there was a map of the premises, a public record should be at least of equal account. Undoubtedly Anglecey was bound to heed that notice. Kelly sold to him lot numbered 97 on a certain map, which was as potent, to all intents, as though it had been copied in or attached to the deed.

In the second place it is said that Kelly represented that "he was the owner of the house and lot;" but the bill does not show that Kelly represented that he was the owner of the two feet and eight inches of lot 99 covered by the house. Indeed, the bill does not show that that particular question was in any sense alluded to by the parties. Nor does the bill state that the complainant, Anglecey, believing such representations to be true, relied upon them and made the purchase with the full conviction that he was entitled to all the land covered by the house.

In the third place it is too plain for discussion that no equities arise from anything that was done or omitted at the circuit. It does not appear that Kelly was subpenaed. B., who was subpenaed, did not attend; but it does not appear that the court refused to postpone the trial. I can see no fraud, nor any mistake or surprise requiring the interference of this court.

I will advise an order setting aside the order to show cause and dissolving the ad interim restraining order. The costs will abide the final determination of the suit.

1. On the facts in this case held, that defendant was guilty of adultery as charged in the petition.
2. The law will not charge a husband with condonation because he takes time to consider whether the allegations against his wife are likely to be sustained.

(Filed April 11, 1887.)

PETITION for divorce, on the ground of adultery. Decree for complainant advised. The case is stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Messrs. J. W. Shultz and H. S. Harris, for complainant.

Mr. J. F. Dumont, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions: The conduct of the defendant with one Rinker is such as to awaken the gravest suspicions respecting her chastity. I cannot avoid the conclusion that her mind, her heart, her desires, must have been depraved and sensual. It seems impossible to believe that any female could go so far as she admits she did without more. That she took every step in the downward path but the last fatal one is overwhelmingly proved. And when these things have all been established by the most indubitable proof, the court seems obliged to conclude that the crime charged has also been committed.

After a very short acquaintance Rinker would meet Mrs. Reading at the theater, and accompany her home, late at night. Mrs. Reading would make arrangements for him and a lady friend, a Mrs. H. to call and spend the evening in her bedroom. This they would do, and while there they would drink beer and sometimes more intoxicating beverages. This happened several times. Rinker would sometimes call before the rest and sometimes remain after they left.

On one of these occasions Mrs. H. and the defendant Mrs. Reading, were on the bed, with Rinker lying between them, when Mrs. H. made the most indecent remarks about the person of Rinker, and swears that Mrs. Reading did also. This Mrs. Reading denies; but she admits being on the bed with them, and admits that she allowed Mrs. H. to take her hand and to place it upon the private parts of Rinker. Mrs. H. swears that Mrs. Reading voluntarily laid down on the bed beside Rinker after she and Rinker had lain down; this Mrs. Reading denies and says that Rinker caught hold of her and threw her on the bed. How can such things be without more? There was no outcry, nor expression of indignation, as of outraged innocence and virtue.

Mrs. Reading soon learned that Mrs. H. was a woman of the very strongest desires of a lustful character; she had seen her on the sofa, in the embrace of this same Rinker; and she had had many other proofs that she was not only most low and groveling in her appetite, but that no woman could possibly associate with her without suffering the foulest contamination. And such was the inevitable result in this case. It soon came to pass that the parties were vying with each other for the chief place in Rinker's affections. And all these meetings, entertainments, and carousals, took place in the absence of Mr. Reading. He never so much as was informed, when he came home every other night, that Mrs. Reading had made the acquaintance of a man by the name of Rinker. For full three months, this was concealed. And on one occasion, when Rinker was in the house of Mrs. H. with Mrs. Reading and Mr. Reading was about to enter, Mrs. Reading either advised Rinker to leave so as to avoid meeting Mr. Reading there, or consented thereto at the suggestion of Mrs. H. No; Mrs. Reading concealed all until a scandalous story had spread over the community. Then it was that she first spoke to her husband about Rinker, and endeavored to prepare his mind for the sad news which must very soon reach him.

About this time Rinker, himself a married man, left the neighborhood; but Mrs. Reading wrote him one or more letters. She also called upon his father, whom she had not known before, and make important inquiries and statements concerning Rinker; and, likewise, wrote entreating letters to a colored woman who had been employed in the hotel where it is said the principal transactions between Mrs. Reading and Rinker took place, and who waited on them and carried their liquors for them. This colored woman was produced as witness against Mrs. Reading; and her statements seemed so extravagant as to baffle all belief; but when the letters of Mrs. Reading to her are considered, and when the admissions of Mrs. Reading as to what took place on the bed are considered, and when the testimony of Mrs. H. and another woman, as to what they saw and as to what Mrs. Reading admitted to them, is considered, there seems to be some grounds for believing that the statements of the colored woman may, in many particulars at least, be true.

I conclude that Mrs. Reading was guilty of adultery with Rinker, as charged in the petition.

But it is said that if this be so there was a condonation. I am not prepared so to advise. I think that as soon as Mr. Reading became convinced of his wife's crime he abandoned her. He did not cast her off when he first heard of the accusation. But why not? She opened the subject herself and protested her innocence. He had a right to trust and to believe her above all others; and if he did so for a reasonable time, if he did so until the proofs became reasonably certain of her misconduct, the law will not, because of such trust and confidence, condemn him to a life of the most loathsome bondage. The load of shame, of sorrow, and of regret which he will have to bear, surely, is sufficient without being chained to the author of these afflictions.

The law will reward a man for caution in such case, rather than condemn him. The law does not mean to charge a husband with condonation because he takes time to consider whether the allegations against his wife are likely to be sustained. Besides, it is not at all clear that in any event there was any conduct that can be construed to amount to condonation.

I will advise a decree according to the prayer of the petition.

Theodore R. ROBINS et al., v. Rialto O. ARNOLD, Admr.

1. 2. A creditor whose claim was not duly presented cannot receive a dividend thereon with the other creditors who duly presented their claims in the usual and prescribed way within the time limited by the order to limit creditors made by the orphans' court.

BILL for relief. On final hearing upon bill and answer. Bill dismissed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. T. Cowenhoven, for complainants.

Messrs. Collins & Corbin, for defendant.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The object of this suit is to establish a claim (for trust funds) of the complainants against the insolvent estate of Wright Robins, deceased, the trustee, in order that the complainants may receive a dividend thereon with the other creditors who duly presented their claims in this usual and prescribed way within the time limited by an order to limit creditors made by the Orphans' Court of Middlesex County.

The complainants claim that they duly presented their claim by the filing by them of a bill in this court against the executrix, within such limited period. The bill was filed for a discovery of the trust funds and to follow them into certain land mentioned in the bill. The bill stated that there was due to the complainants in this suit (Theodore R. Robins and Margaret R. Robins), out of what was called "the Maria Robins fund," about the sum of $17,720, and that there was due to them also their shares of what was called "the Caroline McClure fund." It was not verified by any oath.

The executrix did not answer. On August 6, 1884, the bill was dismissed as to the Maria Robins fund, and as to the other it was dismissed at the final hearing. Cuming v. Robins, 12 Stew. Eq. 46.

On the 4th of September, 1884, the administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo answered. The executrix was discharged and he was appointed in May, 1883. He admitted the liability of the estate for the Maria Robins trust money to the amount of $17,750, besides interest. The order to limit was made April 8, 1882, and the nine months limited therein expired in January, 1883. An order barring creditors who had not proved their claims was made on the fifteenth of that month. The bill was filed in December, 1882.

After the dismissal of that bill the complainants brought suit in this court in 1884 to establish their claim, by virtue of their interest in the Maria Robins fund, to certain land which they alleged that the testator had purchased with money of that fund belonging to them. An answer was filed by the administrator. The suit resulted in a decree that some of the lands mentioned in the bill, of which the testator died seised, had been purchased with the money of that fund, and that it therefore belonged to the complainants, and that a certain sum of money of that fund should be charged on other land of the testator. Arnold v. Robins, 13 Stew. Eq. 723.

The complainants did not present their claim as they might have done, in the form contemplated by the statute. The statute provides that claims "shall be presented in writing, specifying the amount claimed and the particulars of the claim, and shall be verified under oath, or the bringing in of the same shall be of on effect."

On the 12th of April, 1882, the executrix represented to the orphans' court that the estate was insolvent; and on the third day of April, 1883, after having given due notice, she filed a report of the claims presented and an account of the personal estate and an inventory of the real estate. The complainants' claim was not included in the report. No exceptions were filed to the account; and on the 22d of May following the orphans' court decreed that the estate was insolvent. On the 28th of the same month the executrix was discharged (as before stated) upon her own application; and the defendant was appointed administrator with the will annexed. She accounted and her account was allowed, and she paid over the balance to the administrator. On the 28th of July, 1885, the latter applied to the orphans' court for an order for the sale of lands to pay debts.

In his application for the order he stated the claims against the estate just as they were stated by the executrix in her report, before referred to, and stated that the appeal was pending from the decree of this court in the before mentioned suit begun in 1884, and asked for an order for the sale of all of the real estate except the land in question in that suit. In no report to the orphans' court was any mention made of the complainants' claim. The creditors and all other persons interested would have had the right to file exceptions to the claim if it had appeared in the report by the executrix, and the complainants, if they had the right to have it there, might have excepted because it was not there.

The executrix did not answer the bill in Cuming v. Robins, and the answer of the administrator was filed long after the expiration of the period fixed in the order to limit. There was therefore neither verification nor admission of the claim in question within that period.

In Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co. v. Howell, 5 Stew. Eq. 146, it was held that the filing of a bill for foreclosure in this court, claiming decree for deficiency, was not a presentation of a claim for the deficiency within the meaning of the statute. See also Lewis v. Champion, 13 Stew. Eq. 59.

The bill will be dismissed, but without costs.

Alexander GRANT, Jr., Assignee, etc., v. David S. CROWELL.

BILL for relief. On general demurrer. Demurrer allowed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. M. Olds & H. K. Coddington, for demurrant.

Mr. W. G. Cumming, for complainant.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The bill states that the complainant is assignee of David Thompson under an assignment made by him for the equal benefit of his creditors under the Act "To secure to creditors an equal and just division of the estates of debtors who convey to assignees for the benefit of creditors;" that as such assignee he has given the bond required by the statute: that Thompson carried on business under the name of Bolles Brothers from about May 2, 1881, to the 10th of July, 1886; that in some way the business of the Bolles Export Company was, on or about March 7, 1885, added to that which up to that time had been carried on under the name of Bolles Brothers; that by entries on the books of Thompson it appears that the defendant contributed all of the capital invested in the business of the Bolles Export Company except $3, and that he virtually owned that branch of the business: that on or about September 14, 1883, another business, that of manufacturing and selling perfumery extracts, was added to the branches which were then carried on, the capital for which last mentioned branch appears by Thompson's books to have been furnished by the defendant; that on or about the first day of November, 1884, still another branch—the manufacture of sarsaparilla powder—was added: the right to manufacture which was, as appears by those books, bought with the defendant's note; that on or about the 8th of October, 1883, the manufacture of a certain oil was added, one half of the cost of the right to manufacture which was, according to the books, paid for by the defendant and the other half by Thompson; that it appears by the books that the defendant from time to time between September 14, 1883, and June 30, 1885, contributed to the business carried on under the name of Bolles Brothers divers other sums of money and at different times during that period drew out of the business considerable sums; that on or about June 30, 1885, a very considerable quantity of the stock of that concern was burned, and that of the insurance money there was paid to the defendant the sum of $7,714.07, as appears by the before mentioned books; that the defendant appears by the books to have drawn from the business divers large sums of money (about $1,700 in the aggregate) for interest upon alleged advances and loans claimed to have been made to the concern by him before February, 1886; that he continued to pay into and draw out money from the concern up to some time in June, 1886, and that when the before mentioned money was drawn out by him for interest the concern was insolvent; that it appears from the inventory annexed to the deed of assignment that the assets of the concern amounted nominally to the sum of $10,946.93, and that the amount due creditors was $11,853.90, exclusive of $5,500 therein stated to be due to the defendant; that among the assets is a house and lot valued in the inventory at $5,000, which was incumbered to almost, if not quite, the full value thereof: that the inventory includes personal property of the assignor, not employed in the business, of the estimated value of about $500, and that for the property in or connected with the business not over 50 per cent of the valuation can be realized; that the business and credit of the concern were increased by the money contributed thereto by the defendant, and that he, by his personal visits to the place of business and otherwise, manifested great interest in the business; that when the $7,714.07 were paid to the defendant out of the insurance money he promised to return that money in a few days; that the money was paid to him upon that promise, but he never returned it but appropriated it to his own use; that the withdrawal of that money so crippled the concern that from that time it ceased to be prosperous, and thenceforward until it ceased its business was conducted at a loss, and the concern has never been able since then to meet its liabilities; that the present creditors of the concern are to a great extent those who had dealt with it before the withdrawal of the $7,714.17, and that they continued to deal with the concern afterwards in the belief that it was conducted in the same manner and with the same command of resources as before that time.

The bill prays a discovery and an account, and that the defendant may be decreed to pay to the complainant, as assignee, the $7,714.07 and the moneys withdrawn by him from the capital of the business since June 30, 1885, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose, to enable him to pay in full such of the creditors of the concern as have proved their claims before him or as may apply to this court.

The object of this suit is to ascertain whether the defendant was not a partner with Thompson in his business, and, if he shall be shown to have been such, to hold him liable accordingly. There is enough stated in the bill to warrant the court in retaining it, provided the complainant is entitled to the relief which he seeks. The objection that it does not appear by the bill that the complainant has given bond and filed an inventory as required by the Assignment Act is of no weight. It is not necessary in order to enable him to sue as assignee that he should aver that he has complied with all the requirements of the statute.

But the bill has no merits. The complainant shows no ground of claim. As the assignee of Thompson he might bring suit to recover property conveyed away by the latter in fraud of his creditors, if such property were required in order to satisfy the debts of the creditors, who (if they were themselves to sue for that object) would be entitled to such relief. Pillsbury v. Kingon, 6 Stew. Eq. 287.

But no such relief is sought in this case. It is not denied that the money paid by Thompson to the defendant was due to the latter as between them, and therefore as between them it was properly paid and properly received. If such payment was an injustice to the creditors of Thompson, it must be because there was a copartnership between Thompson and the defendant. But if there was such copartnership, the complainant is not assignee thereof; he is assignee of Thompson alone. As such assignee he voluntarily champions the cause of Thompson's creditors, and endeavors by this suit to ascertain whether they have not an equity against the defendant; and if they have such equity he seeks to make it available to them for the payment of their debts.

This is no part of his duty as assignee of Thompson. If the defendant was a partner of Thompson, and therefore ought to contribute to pay partnership debts, the complainant would have the right to maintain a suit under the proper conditions, to compel him to make such contribution; but the bill makes no claim that there was such partnership inter sese; it suggests that there may have been a partnership as to the creditors, or some of them, of the Bolles Brothers' concern; so that the complainant does not seek to recover from the defendant money due to Thompson, but money which was lawfully paid by Thompson to the defendant and which the latter lawfully received from him and which as between them he is entitled to retain.

While the complainant as assignee represents, to a certain degree, the creditors of the assignor, he does not represent them to such an extent as to clothe him with their rights or charge him with the duty of seeking out and protecting those rights, under such circumstances as are presented by the bill in this case. If the creditors have an equity against the defendant in respect to the matters set up in the bill, they are the proper ones to enforce it.

The demurrer will be allowed.

OSBORNE
v.
OSBORNE.

In a suit for divorce for adultery where complainant is entitled to a decree for that cause, the court cannot grant the divorce on the ground of cruelty and desertion set up in the answer of defendant.

(Filed April 15, 1887.)

BILL for divorce on the ground of adultery. Decree for complainant advised.

The case is stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. H. H. Wainright, for complainant.
Mr. W. F. Abbott, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The complainant is entitled to a decree. The proof satisfies my mind that Mrs. Osborne has been guilty of adultery with one Stratton. Stratton was a married man; he had a wife and two children; and not very long after his intimacy with Mrs. Osborne began, he abandoned them. Very soon after his acquaintance with Mrs. Osborne there was very great familiarity between them. They would take Mr. Osborne's horse and carriage and ride out together.

Stratton taught school near by where Osborne lived and for several weeks boarded at Osborne's. He afterwards taught school two miles distant from Osborne's, but continued boarding there, although there can be no doubt that he could have procured board in the immediate vicinity of the school. While teaching at the last place referred to, Mrs. Osborne would take him to the school or drive there for him. This she did several times. Mr. Osborne was then living at Manasquan, N. J. Soon after he moved to New York City. Before going there Mrs. Osborne promised Mr. Osborne that she would not see Stratton any more; but Stratton met them at Jersey City when on their way to New York; and it was not long before Mrs. Osborne took him to board with her in 49th Street. He continued to board with her, most of the time for several years and until the commencement of these proceedings; and although the intimacy between Mrs. Osborne and Stratton was enough to prompt Mr. Osborne to commence these proceedings, yet the institution of this suit was not enough to drive Stratton away from her daily presence nor to compel her to turn her back upon him. They visited Philadelphia together. Mrs. Osborne and her son and daughter went to Niagara, and Stratton went along. She spent some time at the Catskills and Stratton was there with her. But, it is true he paid his own bills.

Mrs. Osborne was upon the witness stand, but she did not deny having committed adultery with Stratton. Stratton was called by her, nor did he deny having committed adultery with Mrs. Osborne. She says Stratton always conducted himself as a gentleman.

The defendant in her answer, by way of cross bill, sets up recriminatory charges of cruelty and desertion; and upon the argument counsel said if there must be a divorce, let it be on the ground of desertion, for the sake of the children. The court cannot do any such thing. I suppose every court would most gladly throw the mantle of oblivion over the faults of citizens if, by so doing, justice could at the same time be done to the complaining party. I would not have made reference to this appeal did I not think that it involved a strong conviction on the part of counsel of the guilt of Mrs. Osborne.

Clemence BORDEN et al.

In a suit to set aside an assignment to defendant of a bond and mortgage, made by complainant when he was weak in body and mind, in consideration of an agreement by defendant to maintain him and provide a home for him during his life, which agreement defendant refused to perform, held, on the facts, that the assignment was fraudulently obtained and that the same be set aside and that complainant credit defendant for board, etc., furnished by the latter to the former.

BILL for relief. On final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Decree for complainant.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. M. Nevius, for complainant.

Mr. J. Steen, for defendants:

Cited Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 395.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

This suit is brought to set aside an assignment made by the complainant April 26, 1879, to the defendant, Clemence Borden, of a bond and mortgage. The bond and mortgage were given to the complainant on the 12th of January, 1874, the bond by Borden and the mortgage by him and his wife upon real estate of his in Shrewsbury Township, in Monmouth County. The instruments were given to secure the payment of $2,700, then lent by the complainant to Borden, in one year, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum.

The bill states that about the first of April, 1874, an agreement was made by and between the complainant (who was an elderly single man) and the Bordens, that the latter would board the complainant in their house, which was upon the mortgaged premises, and do his washing and take care of him in sickness in consideration of the interest upon the bond and mortgage; he to furnish his room; that he boarded with the defendants under that agreement from the first of April, 1874, until April 25, 1879, when (induced, as he alleges, by the persuasion of Mrs. Borden, he having then just recovered from a very severe illness, and being weak in body and mind), he assigned the bond and mortgage to her in consideration of an agreement then made by her with him to provide him a home and maintain him in the family during all the rest of his life; that he continued to live with them under that agreement until the 12th of June, 1886, when Borden and his wife refused him admittance to their house and told him that he must seek a home elsewhere; that he was then compelled to find another place of abode; that he is fifty-four years old and is weak and sickly and unable to work or to support himself, and that he is without means or property except the bond and mortgage and is homeless and dependent upon his friends for support.

The bill prays that the assignment may be set aside, as having been obtained by fraud, and that the amount due Borden for the complainant's board, etc., from April 25, 1879, the date of the assignment, to June 12, 1886, when the Bordens refused to support him longer, may be credited upon the bond and mortgage.

The defendants by their answer, which is under oath in pursuance of the requirement of the bill, deny that they or either of them agreed to board the complainant and do his washing and take care of him in sickness in consideration of the interest upon the bond and mortgage; and they deny that they or either of them ever agreed to support him for life in consideration of the assignment of the bond and mortgage, but they allege that the consideration of the assignment was money which he then owed to them, and money which he expected to and did in fact afterwards owe them for board, and for money paid by Borden to or for him and for his benefit, and that the money so due for board and the money so paid together amounted to the sum due upon the bond and mortgage, and that although the defendants boarded him after the making of the assignment, they did so, not from obligation on their part, but merely from benevolence and friendship.

The evidence establishes the truth of the complainant's allegation that he went to board and boarded with the defendants as and under the agreement stated in the bill. Opposed to the defendants' denial is the complainant's testimony on the subject, which is corroborated by the circumstance that Borden never made any charge against the complainant for board or washing or care in sickness, but took a receipt from him upon the bond under date of the 12th of January in each year from the date of the mortgage up to 1879 (in which year the last one was taken) for the interest for the preceding year. For such receipts he paid nothing, and he had no accounting with the complainant and never called upon him to pay anything more.

Had there been no agreement between the complainant and Borden that the interest should pay for the board it is reasonable to presume that Borden would have insisted upon a credit upon the principal of the bond and mortgage of whatever was due to him above the amount of interest. The conduct of Borden in the transaction has been consistent only with the existence of the agreement. The Bordens have no claim against the complainant for board or washing or care in sickness, up to the date of the assignment; and on the other hand it will be held that the interest on the bond and mortgage is paid up to that date.

The bill alleges that the complainant was induced by Mrs. Borden's persuasion to assign the bond and mortgage to her, and that the consideration of the assignment was an agreement that she would provide him a home and maintain him in the family for life. The answer denies, as before stated, that such agreement was made; and it denies that the complainant was induced to make the assignment by the persuasion of Mrs. Borden; but it alleges that money due to Borden from the complainant for board and money advanced by the former to the latter of which Borden had kept no account and which exceeded $1,200, constituted the true consideration of the assignment.

In his testimony Borden says that the complainant then owed him for board to June 12, 1886, $3,170, and for money advanced more than $1,200; so that, according to the answer, the complainant owed Borden at the date of the assignment over $4,370. In fact, as already appears, he owed him nothing for board up to that time; and there is no satisfactory evidence that he owed him anything at that time for money advanced. In his testimony Borden says that he can safely say that the money which he has paid out for the complainant will amount to $500; but in the answer he said it was, at the time when the assignment was made, over $1,200. Moreover, the $500 includes $152.22 paid by him to William W. Clayton at the request of the complainant in January, 1880, after the assignment was made, and which he says he did not (when the assignment was made) promise to pay. While he says that an agreement for the future support of the complainant was no part of the consideration of the assignment, he nevertheless boarded the complainant afterwards without charge. He says he did not do so pursuant to any understanding, but did it gratuitously; and he adds that he expected so to keep him so long as the complainant should conduct himself properly. The defendants admit that they refused to keep him, as stated in the bill; and they give no proof of any reason for doing so.

The complainant says that Mrs. Borden urged him to make the assignment because she was apprehensive that "some one would sell the mortgage from them." She probably expressed an apprehension that the mortgage would get into the hands of some one who would foreclose it. She does not deny this allegation, but corroborates the complainant in the statement, by saying that he said to her that he "would fix her so that she need never worry about it."

It is quite clear that the assignment was obtained from the complainant when he was feeble in mind and body, and under circumstances which should induce the court to annul it. It will be set aside as having been fraudulently obtained; and it will be decreed that the defendants deliver the bond and mortgage to the complainant, but he will be required to credit thereon whatever shall appear to be justly due to the Bordens for board and washing and care in sickness since the assignment and for money advanced.

There will be an account as prayed in the bill. The complainant is entitled to costs.

John KERR
v.
Henry S. LITTLE, Receiver.

In an action to recover damages for the breach of a contract, made by the former receiver of a railroad company, that the complainant should keep clean for a year the ash pit where the engines of the company emptied their ashes, and for his compensation should have the cinders and coal from such pit, the contract having been broken by the receiver, held, that the complainant is entitled to damages, and that the court will not refuse to sanction the contract on the ground that it was an improvident one.

BILL for relief. On final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Decree for complainant. The facts and case appear in the opinion.

Mr. A. A. Clark, for complainant.

Mr. B. Williamson, for defendant.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

This suit is brought to recover damages for the breach of a contract which the complainant alleges was made with him by Francis S. Lathrop, the former Receiver of the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey, by which it was agreed between the parties that the complainant should clean and keep clean for a year from March 7, 1878, the ash pit at a place called Junction Station in Hunterdon County, where the locomotive engines of the company emptied their ashes, and that for his compensation the complainant should have for his own use cinders and coals to be taken by him from the pit with the ashes.

The grounds of jurisdiction in this case, which is merely a suit for damages, were stated in the decision overruling the demurrer. Kerr v. Little, 12 Stew. Eq. 83.

The complainant (who was a lime burner), had the benefit of the contract for six months when he was discharged, not because of any fault on his part, but because Mr. Stearns, the assistant general superintendent of the company, thought it proper to do so in order to put a stop to jealousies which the fact that the complainant had the benefit of the contract had engendered in the minds of other lime burners in the neighborhood.

In his letter of August 31, 1878, to George W. Howland, then an employee under him but now deceased, and George W. Abbott, then also an employee and by whom the contract in question was made, Mr. Stearns said: "From September 1, prox. we will discontinue the contract arrangement of having Hampton ash pit cleaned by outsiders for the contents of same, and hereafter do the work ourselves, same as at other points, and dispose of the cinders the same as we did formerly. This will put a stop to any jealousy or ill feeling on the part of the lime men who are not individually benefited by the present arrangement."

The defendant denies that the arrangement was for any specified period, but insists that it was a mere privilege, determinable at the will of the company. The proof is that the agreement was made as the complainant alleges. Mr. Abbott, by whom it was made on behalf of the company, says not only that the arrangement was to continue for a year, but that he had authority from Mr. Stearns to make it for such period, and neither more nor less. The contract having been broken by the Receiver, without fault on the part of the complainant, and not only without his consent but against his protest, the complainant is entitled to damages.

It appears that the coals and cinders were worth to him, not only for use in lime burning, in view of which use of them he made the contract, but also for sale, $3 a ton; and the average amount which he got daily was 4½ tons and the cost was $2 a day.

There will be a decree in his favor, for damages to the amount of $1,794, with lawful interest from the first of May, 1879.

It is urged on behalf of the defendant that the contract was an improvident one and that therefore this court should not sanction it by giving damages for the breach of it on the part of the Receiver. But it was not broken on that account; and it seems to have been regarded as desirable, except for the reason that being held by a lime burner it created jealousy and ill feeling on the part of other neighboring lime burners. The complainant was bound by the contract, and might have been compelled to pay damages for breach of it on his part.

On the other hand he should be protected in his interest in it. It was not, to say the least of it, so uneconomical an arrangement for the railroad company that he could be held to have had notice that it was one which the court probably would not sanction.

BILL for relief. On final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Decree for complainant. The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Carl Lentz, for complainant.

Mr. F. E. Blackwell of New York, for defendants.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The complainant was married to Peter Weiss on the 11th of February, 1872. They lived together until October 9, 1881, when he died. John Zipfel, by deed dated February 27, 1875, conveyed to them in fee a lot of land in Newark. The conveyance was made to "Peter Weiss and Kunigunda, his wife" and the consideration was $2,040—of which sum $440 was paid in cash on the delivery of the deed; and for the rest, $1,600, a mortgage was given by them to Zipfel, payable in five years from date (the date of the deed) with interest. The mortgage was canceled January 2, 1878, although it was not due until February 27, 1880.

The complainant had three children by Weiss, two of whom are still living. After Weiss' death she learned that when he married her he had a wife, the defendant (Caroline Weiss), living. She brings this suit against the latter and her two children, to get a decree assuring to her the title to the whole of the property, on the ground that the property was paid for entirely with her own money, and that the fact that Weiss' name was inserted in the deed as one of the grantees was due solely to his fraud in marrying her and inducing her to believe that he was her lawful husband. She swears that the whole of the purchase money of the property was paid with her money. When asked why the title was taken in the names of both herself and Weiss, as her husband, she answers that the scrivener told her that after Weiss' death the property would be hers. The scrivener supposed that the deed was to husband and wife, as grantees, when in fact no lawful marital relation existed between her and Weiss. But she and the scrivener both thought that it did.

The complainant swears that she paid the greater part of the consideration with money which she received from her father: and she is corroborated in that statement by the testimony of her sister and brother-in-law. She swears that of the cash ($440) paid on the delivery of the deed, she drew $410 from the savings bank in which it was deposited in her own name, and in this she is corroborated by the books of the bank. When he married her (in 1872) Weiss had no money. He appears to have been working at his trade for small weekly wages (he was a workman in a tailor's shop) up to February, 1873; and although he carried on the business of manufacturing clothing in the house upon the property in question, yet he was too ill to conduct business for four years before his death, that is, from 1877; so that he carried on that business there for only about two years. It does not appear that he paid any part of the purchase money of the property with the proceeds of that business, and it does not seem probable that he did so. After he became ill she herself conducted the business. She not only paid her money for the property, but also for the repairs and improvements which were put upon it after the purchase; and she did it all in the belief that she was the lawful wife of Weiss; and she accepted the conveyance made to him and her as husband and wife, because she believed that that relation in fact existed between them, and that in case she should survive him the property would be wholly hers.

Those who claim under him have no better claim to the property than he would have. The law of evidence prevents her from testifying to his statements or to his transactions with her in reference to the matter, and so far she is under disadvantage. She is competent to prove the fact that she bought the property, and that she paid for it, and for the improvements and repairs, with her own money, and that Weiss neither paid for them nor paid anything on account of them.

The transaction in question in this suit is the purchase of property by her; and the necessity of seeking relief arises from his fraud in marrying her. Through his deceit and only through his deceit his name was inserted in the deed as one of the grantees; and indeed it may be added that but for his fraud she would not have invested her money in the property at all. It was to get a home for him and her and their children that, in the belief that she was his lawful wife, she bought the property. It may be added that the deed itself is evidence of an agreement between the parties that the conveyance was to be so drawn that she should be sole owner of the property in case she should survive him. And she now asks that under the circumstances, that agreement may be effectuated in equity. Obviously, Weiss would not have been permitted to retain the interest in the property which he obtained by his gross fraud upon her. Neither can the defendants be permitted to hold it.

There will be a decree in favor of the complainant. The defendants were admitted to defend in forma pauperis. No costs will be awarded.

BILL for partition. On final hearing on pleadings. Decree for complainant.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hawkins & Durand, for complainant.

Messrs. S. Patterson and G. C. Beekman, for defendants.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The complainant seeks partition of the land of her late mother, Harriet E. Manning, deceased, and an account of the rents and profits thereof coming to her, and an account of the personal estate of her mother and a decree that her share thereof be invested for her benefit. She claims, under the will of her mother, a life interest in one sixth of the whole estate.

By the will the testratrix, after directing payment of her debts and funeral expenses by her executor and trustee named, gave and bequeathed to her daughter, Frances M. G. Wilson, "the interest of the one equal undivided one sixth part or portion" of her whole estate during Mrs. Wilson's natural life, and directed that upon the death of Mrs. Wilson "the said interest and principal thereof" be paid absolutely to Georgiana Sweet, a granddaughter of the testatrix.

She then gave and bequeathed to her daughter, the complainant, "the interest of the one equal undivided one sixth interest, part or portion" of the whole estate during the complainant's natural life, and directed that on the death of the complainant "the said interest as well as principal thereof" be paid absolutely to the before mentioned Georgiana Sweet.

She next gave a legacy of $1,000 to her sister, Mrs. Hendrickson (which, however, she subsequently revoked by a codicil), and $5,000 absolutely to her granddaughter, Bessie Belle Bateman, daughter of her daughter Nellie J. Smith, on her attaining the age of twenty-one years, and $2,000 absolutely to Harriet L. Smith, another daughter of Mrs. Smith, upon her attaining her majority; and she then gave and devised all the balance and residue of all her property, both real and personal, of whatever nature or kind, and wheresoever situated, to James A. Bradley, her executor, "in trust for the execution of her will," and gave to her daughter Mrs. Smith, all the rents, issues and profits of all her estate, both real and personal, so to be held in trust, and directed the executor to pay over to her those rents, issues and profits, quarterly, for and during her natural life; and upon her death gave, bequeathed and devised all the remainder and residue of her estate, both real and personal, to Mrs. Smith's two daughters, before mentioned, absolutely. The value of the personal property was, it is said, about $700, that of the real estate about $42,000, and the debts amounted to about $14,200.

The gift to the complainant is of the clear one sixth of the estate, real and personal. The scheme of the will is to give to her and Mrs. Wilson, each, one sixth of the entire estate for life, with remainder to the complainant's daughter; to give to Mrs. Smith's two daughters $7,000 and then to give the residue of the estate to the executor to pay debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and then to pay over to Mrs. Smith, quarterly, the rents, issues and profits of the balance of the residue, and at her death to hand over such balance to Mrs. Smith's two daughters.

The shares of the complainant' and Mrs. Wilson are not subject to the trust created for the residue. The words "for the execution of my will" are employed in the will to qualify the trust; but they are superfluous and do not extend it over the shares of the complainant and her sister Mrs. Wilson. The debts and the pecuniary legacies of $5,000 and $2,000 to Mrs. Smith's daughters are to be paid out of the residue in exoneration of those shares. The complainant and Mrs. Wilson are each entitled to an undivided one sixth of all the testator's estate real and personal, without any deduction for the payment of debts or for the payment of the pecuniary legacies.

The trust of the residue did not devolve upon the administrator with the will annexed. Brush v. Young, 4 Dutch. 237; Lanning v. Sisters of St. Francis, 8 Stew. Eq. 392.

The complainant is entitled to have her share set off to her for her use. If good reason be shown for so doing, a mixed trust estate is partible in equity. Wetmore v. Zabriskie, 2 Stew. Eq. 62.

It is manifest from the language of the bequest that the testatrix contemplated a conversion of the share into money and the investment thereof for the benefit of the complainant for life. The gift to her is of the "interest of the equal undivided one sixth part or portion" of the estate and the will directs that after her death the "said interest and principal thereof" be "paid" to Georgiana Sweet.

And so, too, the gift to Mrs. Wilson is of the "interest of the one equal undivided sixth interest, part or portion" of the estate for life, with a direction that upon her death the "interest as well as the principal thereof" be "paid" to Georgiana Sweet. The testatrix indeed gives no express power of sale of the real estate, and in the gift of the residue to Mrs. Smith appears not to have contemplated the sale of the real estate therein, for she gives to her the rents, issues and profits for life, and gives, bequeaths and devises the property, after Mrs. Smith's death, to Mrs. Smith's daughters.

The difference between the provision for the complainant and Mrs. Wilson and the provision for Mrs. Smith is very marked. The testatrix appoints no trustee of the shares of the complainant and Mrs. Wilson, but she evidently meant to create a trust as to those shares. In such case, where such a trust is created and no trustee is appointed, the trust would devolve upon the executor. But the executor has renounced and refuses to act and the administrator has no authority to execute the trust. Under such circumstances this court would appoint a trustee. If the real estate can be partitioned, without prejudice to the interests of the owners, the share of the complainant may be set off and she may enjoy it as tenant for life.

By the will the testatrix declares that her reason for bequeathing a larger share of her estate to Mrs. Smith than to the complainant and Mrs. Wilson, was not want of affection for the latter, but because they were "amply provided for in this world's goods;" whereas, Mrs. Smith was poor and had no property of her own whatever; and that her reason for giving more of her estate to Mrs. Smith's two daughters than to her other granddaughter, Georgiana Sweet, was that they were poor and had no property whatever, while Georgiana Sweet had ample means, and property in her own right.

It is urged on behalf of Mrs. Smith and her daughters that, under the construction which is above put upon the will, the testatrix's intention to give to Mrs. Smith more than she gave to the complainant and Mrs. Wilson, will be frustrated. But this consideration cannot control in the construction of the will, inasmuch as the language and terms of the instrument are not doubtful. The fact that the testatrix's plan of division of her property fails to effectuate her purpose in this respect, will not justify the court in disregarding the plain provisions of the will. If her design is defeated, it is because she overvalued her property, or because it has fallen in value or because she contracted debts or met with losses after the making of the will. Where the testator's language and the provisions of the will are plain the court must be guided by them.

RUSLING'S Exrs.

1. When the trustee is the husband of the cestui que trust, nothing short of clear and satisfactory proof will establish that the obligation of the former to the latter has been discharged or forgiven.
2. The Statute of Limitations is not a bar to trusts of such a character; nor is it a bar to the obligation of a bailee of money to hold or invest, where there is no stipulation as to the length of time he should hold it, and there has been no demand.
3. Where a husband in his will recognized a claim of his wife against him, for money loaned, and there is no certain proof that it was ever satisfied or extinguished, it will be presumed to be still outstanding.
4. A legacy will generally be presumed to be in satisfaction of a demand against the testator. Circumstances may arise or facts may appear on the face of the will showing a different intention. The intention of the testator is to govern. A devise of land is not to be taken in satisfaction of a debt.
5. If a testator declares that all his debts and legacies shall be paid, it will overcome the presumption that he intended the legacy to be in satisfaction of a debt due from him. The presumption is also overcome if the amount of the legacy be less than the debt, or if the debt be unliquidated, or if the legacy be not given to the creditor but to a third person.
6. When the testator does not provide that his just debts and legacies shall be paid, but that his just debts shall be paid if any he has, and the legacy given is in excess of the amount of the debt and interest due his wife, and he directs that the bequests in favor of his wife shall be in lieu of dower or any other claim against his estate, held, that he thereby intended to discharge and satisfy his indebtedness to his wife.

BILL to recover of executors a sum of money alleged to have been loaned to testator. Dismissal of bill advised.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Isaac R. Wilson, and C. A. Skillman, for complainant.

Messrs. J. F. Rusling, and B. Gummere, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

Mrs. Rusling, the complainant, is the widow of Gershom Rusling, who died in 1881, leaving a last will, in which the defendants were named as executors. Mrs. Rusling brings this suit to recover $1,000, and the interest thereon, which $1,000 she alleges she gave to her husband in May, 1863, to invest for her. I will set forth the principal facts:

The testator married Mrs. Rusling in 1861. About the first of May, 1863, Mrs. Rusling received $1,000 as her own separate estate; this she gave to her husband to invest for her and to pay to her the interest. I think he paid her the interest for the first year after he accepted the trust, which was thereby created. December 5, 1863, before the expiration of the first year after he received the $1,000, Mr. Rusling made his will. In this will he directed that all his debts should be paid; gave to his wife $120 yearly, so long as she remained his widow; gave her also the sum of $1,000 in cash, using this language:

"The same being the amount of certain moneys which I received from her of her separate estate after my marriage with her, and which said sum I direct to be paid to her by my executors within one year from the time of my death, with interest thereon from the time of my death. And I further direct that all the household goods and furniture, silverware, and personal property of every description, which she had of her own separate property at and after her marriage with me, be given to and taken by her as her own property."

September 23, 1865, Mr. Rusling made and published another will, differing in the particulars above named in no material respect, except that he made the $120, $180.

It is a fact that some of the children of Mr. Rusling by a former wife were greatly displeased with Mrs. Rusling's presence in the household, without sharing any of the burdens thereof out of her separate estate. From time to time they expressed their displeasure to her, but when does not appear to any degree of certainty. It is insisted that in view of this dissatisfaction Mrs. Rusling gave this $1,000 to her husband and thereby, to that extent, contributed to the daily recurring wants. It will not be amiss to note that if she made any such donation, and Mr. Rusling so regarded it, it must have been after September 23, 1865, the date of the last will named; for it will be seen that in that will he directed the $1,000 to be paid to her, with interest.

January 8, 1873, Mr. Rusling executed another will, directing all his just debts to be paid; giving to his wife $2,000 with interest from the time of his death, to be paid to her in one year thereafter; directing his executors to pay to her annually from the time of his death a sum equal to the interest of $3,000 and to invest a sum sufficient for that purpose; making the same direction as in the former wills, with respect to her personal property; and declaring the said gifts to be in lieu of her right of dower; after which he made disposition of all the balance of his estate.

October 4, 1873, Mr. Rusling executed another will in all material respects, so far as it affected Mrs. Rusling, like the one last referred to, except instead of giving her the interest of $3,000 he gave her the interest of $4,000; and directed that such gifts be in lieu of "her right of dower or any other claim that she might have against my (his) estate."

During the year in which these last two wills were made Mrs. Rusling built herself a cottage at Ocean Grove, and for that purpose borrowed about $900 of her husband, which shortly thereafter she paid back to him. This was done without any claim on her part of the $1,000 which she gave to him to invest in 1863 and without any accounting between them therefor.

December 10, 1874, Mr. Rusling made another will directing his just debts to be paid, saying: "If any I have;" giving to Mrs. Rusling the $2,000 as in the two former wills last mentioned, and the interest of $4,000 during her natural life, if she should so long remain his widow; making the same directions as to her personal property, and declaring that such gifts should be in lieu of dower or any other claim against his estate and disposing of all the balance of his estate.

The last will in the series, and which was admitted to probate, is dated January 4, 1875, after which time Mr. Rusling lived about six years. In this will he directed "that all of my just debts, if any I have," should be paid. He gave to his wife $2,000 and directed that it should be paid to her with interest from his death in one year thereafter; gave to her the interest of $4,000 to be paid to her annually during her life, if she so long remained his widow; directing that all her goods, silverware, and personal property of every description, should be taken by her as her own separate property; and adding: "And it is my will and I do hereby direct that the said bequests in favor of my said wife shall be in lieu and in bar of her right of dower, or any other claim that she might have against my estate."

About the time of making these last wills, and before, Mr. Rusling said that his wife had brought him $1,000 and that he had invested it for her, that he had paid her one year's interest and that he wanted her to have it after his death.

After the making of these wills, and after Mr. Rusling had said that he had this $1,000 from his wife, she said that she had given Mr. Rusling $1,000; and when the witness to whom she made the statement was asked if she gave any reason for so doing, she said Mrs. Rusling replied that it was "to have peace in the family;" that "she had unpleasant times with them" "because she didn't bring anything in the family, and she gave him $1,000 to make peace, and afterwards she said there was peace; they were satisfied."

One witness says that Mrs. Rusling told this to her frequently. Another witness says that about the same time Mrs. Rusling told her that she had given Mr. Rusling $1,000 and that he had never given her a cent of interest. In 1876 or 1877 Mrs. Rusling told another witness that she had given her husband $1,000 in 1863 "to pacify him and his children;" saying "there existed a little unpleasantness in the family;" "they had an idea that she ought to have brought something into the family as his other wives had done, and that in order to pacify them she gave him this $1,000."

While it is true that Mrs. Rusling either denies making these statements or says she does not remember them, all rules applicable in such cases require me to regard these alleged statements as established facts, the decided preponderance of testimony being against her.

From these facts the first question is, What relation was Mr. Rusling in, to Mrs. Rusling, with respect to her separate estate, at any time during their married lives? One of his wills shows that he accepted from her the $1,000 and, by the same will, gave it back to her with interest from the time of his death. This will bears date December 5, 1863, about six months after he received the money. This clause was retained in the next will dated September 23, 1865. These unmistakable declarations, with the other undisputed facts, establish the relation of principal and agent or, what I think more nearly expresses the truth, of cestui que trust and trustee.

But it may be said that the gift of $1,000 in 1865, with interest from the death of the testator, will not satisfy the demands of a trust of $1,000 created two years or more before. Truly not; but it does not fail, any the less, to establish the relation of the parties. And speaking with reference to this natural and logical criticism, I remark that the will is to be read as a whole; and so reading it, it is seen that while the $1,000 stands as before, the annuity, which in the first will was $120, is in the second increased to $180.

I conclude, therefore, that the relation of cestui que trust and trustee was established. The next question is, Was the obligation created by that relation discharged by the trustee in his lifetime, except as provided in his last will? Or if not discharged by him, was it released by Mrs. Rusling?

It is important to observe that the trustee was the husband of the cestui que trust. This being the case nothing short of clear and satisfactory proof will convince the court that the obligation has either been discharged or forgiven. I feel it my duty to say that ordinary expressions, importing a gift, or satisfaction, or discharge, provoked or called forth by dissatisfied members of the household, are wholly insufficient to justify the court in pronouncing judgment in favor of the trustee.

The fact that about ten years after the advance of $1,000 to Mr. Rusling, Mrs. Rusling borrowed of him about $900 to use in building herself a cottage, and soon thereafter paid it back to him, is in the law of much more significance. Ordinarily, under such circumstances, the creditor would require the debtor to account for the money already due, with interest, rather than become himself the debtor by borrowing. But, as stated above, it cannot be forgotten that Mrs. Rusling was the wife; and however greatly the law has extended to her the privilege of asserting and maintaining her own rights, in her separate estate, nothing is more certain or better known than that in multitudes of instances, the married woman confides and trusts the management of her affairs, absolutely, to the husband. With this view of the case before me I cannot conclude that the obligation resting upon Mr. Rusling, as trustee, was, by that transaction of borrowing and repaying, discharged.

During the progress of the cause it was insisted that the Statute of Limitations was a bar. If I am right in my conclusions, this view cannot prevail, since it has been declared many times that the statute is not a bar to trusts of this character. Besides this view, it may safely be said that Mr. Rusling not only stood in the relation of trustee, but also that of bailee; for he took this money to hold or to invest for Mrs. Rusling and to pay her the interest, it not appearing that any stipulation was made as to the length of time he should hold it; nor does it appear that she ever made demand for the money. I cannot conclude, therefore, that the statute has any application to this case. See Boughton v. Flint, 74 N. Y. 481, 482.

I am brought now to the declarations of Mrs. Rusling, made long after she placed the money in the hands of Mr. Rusling, made five or six years after she borrowed the $900 of him, which she repaid without requiring him to account for the $1,000, and nine or ten years' interest then due thereon, and made three or four years after the execution of the last will of Mr. Rusling.

Mrs. Rusling is a most highly respectable lady, and in every way worthy of credit; but it is difficult, according to the ordinary rules applicable to such cases, to disbelieve the other witnesses, and for the court to say that two who appear to be truthful and to be disinterested are less worthy of credit than one who is much more advanced in years and whose recollection would be much more likely to be influenced or be clouded by her interest. I must, therefore, conclude that Mrs. Rusling said that she had given the $1,000 to her husband for the sake of peace.

In so deciding I do not forget that one of the witnesses produced by the defendants said that Mrs. Rusling told her that she had given Mr. Rusling $1,000 to put out at interest for her. But it cannot be overlooked, as stated above, that two other witnesses very distinctly stated that Mrs. Rusling told them repeatedly that she had given Mr. Rusling the $1,000 for the sake of peace.

But whether, as between husband and wife, this ought to be regarded as sufficient to discharge the husband from his trust, under the circumstances, is not clear to my mind, nor will I now pause to determine,—because of another view of the case, which must necessarily be considered. Mr. Rusling not only recognized this claim, in his first will, but (as I understand the testimony) distinctly did so to two of the witnesses between the years 1870 and 1876. And, in my judgment, although he did not name this particular sum, he recognized some claim of Mrs. Rusling against him, in his last three wills: one made in October, 1873, one in December, 1874, and the one which was proved in January, 1875, in each of which he directed that the bequests in favor of his wife should be in lieu of and in bar of her right of dower or any other claim that she might have against his estate.

The bequests referred to were the $2,000, payable one year after his death with interest, and the interest on $4,000 payable during her lifetime. The testator declares this to be in lieu of dower, which all understand to have a certain definite meaning and application, and also in lieu of any other claim, which certainly must be understood as referring to something in the mind of the testator besides dower. It was aimed at an object. It was not an idle, careless, meaningless expression, interjected at random. The court cannot disregard it. If it be possible, every word and phrase must be assigned to some purpose. And the fact appearing that Mrs. Rusling once had this just claim and there being no certain proof that it was ever satisfied or extinguished, the expression in the will or "any other claim" will be applied to it; the court will say that the testator thereby intended to recognize this claim.

I cannot escape the conclusion that some indebtedness must have existed and been recognized by the testator, which awakened in his mind and called forth this expression, just as certainly so as her right of dower prompted him to expressly provide and guard against her making claim therefor and also taking the legacies.

But the question remains: Did Mr. Rusling intend by the gifts made to discharge this claim? Both as to the general rule of law in such cases and the exceptions thereto there is no controversy. The general rule is stated, in Van Riper v. Van Riper, to be that a legacy will be presumed to be in satisfaction of a demand against the testator. Circumstances may arise, or facts may appear on the face of the will, showing a different intention. The intention of the testator is to govern. 1 Green, Ch. 1, 3, and cases there cited.

A devise of land cannot be taken in satisfaction of a debt. If the testator declares that all his debts and legacies shall be paid, it is regarded as sufficient to overcome the presumption that he intended a legacy to be in satisfaction of a debt due from him. The presumption is likewise overcome, if the amount of the legacy be less than the debt, or, if the debt be unliquidated, or the legacy be not given to the creditor, but to a third person. See Van Riper v. Van Riper, 1 Green, Ch. 1; Reynolds v. Robinson, 82 N. Y. 103; Boughton v. Flint, 74 N. Y. 476; Chancy v. Wootton, Select Cas. in Ch. 44 and note at the end of the case found in 13 Eng. Ch. 118.

In Phillips v McCombs, 53 N. Y. 494, it was said: "The debt being due and the legacy being payable two years after the testator's death, no legal presumption arises upon the face of the will that the legacy was intended as a payment of the debt." Now, what appears upon the face of this will to guide me in this matter? The testator does not say that "All of my just debts and legacies shall be paid," but says "All my just debts if any I have." The $2,000 given was payable in one year after the testator's death.

These expressions, and the one above quoted declaring the bequest and that the annuity should be in lieu and in bar of dower or any other claim, are the only expressions which can aid me in ascertaining the intention of the testator, under the rules above presented. The $2,000 given was at the date of the will considerably in excess of the amount of principal and interest due at the date of the will, and also at the death of the testator, from which time the legacy drew interest because of which it became impossible for the debt and interest to be equal to the legacy. This I think takes the case out of the rule laid down in Phillips v. McCoombs, supra.

And it seems to me that the direction that the bequests in favor of his wife shall be in lieu of dower or any other claim takes it out of the rule established in many of the cases, that where the testator directs that all of his debts shall be paid the presumption is that it was not his intention that a legacy should be in satisfaction of a debt; and it gives to the defendants in this case the benefit of the general rule. It seems to me it would not have been stronger if the testator had said that the bequests made to her were intended to be "in payment and discharge of any and every debt, claim or demand that she now has against me." It will strike the mind of everyone that this case is not within the exception to the general rule which provides that when the testator says that his debts and legacies shall be paid; for in this case he only directs that his debts be paid, if any he have. Edmunds v. Low, 3 Kay & J. 318, 321; Lead. Cas. Eq. 777.

In this work I have found a more complete and useful analysis of the whole subject than elsewhere. See pp. 774, etc. 820, etc.

I conclude that the testator was indebted to Mrs. Rusling at the time of making his last will; and that by his bequest therein of $2,000 he intended to satisfy and discharge such indebtedness. And the creditor, Mrs. Rusling, having accepted such bequest, she was not justified in filing her bill to enforce her claim.

The bill must therefore be dismissed, with costs. I will so advise.

BILL for an account, etc. On final hearing upon pleadings and proofs. Decree for an account.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. A. Drake, for complainant.

Mr. H. M. Cooper, for defendant.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The complainant was the husband of Ellen C. Barclay, deceased (who was one of the daughters of Joseph W. Cooper, deceased), and he sues as her administrator. Her father died in 1871. By his will and the codicil thereto, after making provision for his widow (who is dead), he gave all the residue of his estate to his four children, Samuel C., Mary E., Ellen C., and Walter M. The executors were the widow and the two sons Samuel and Walter. They all proved the will and codicil.

Walter died in 1882, intestate and without issue. Letters of administration upon his estate were issued to his brother Samuel, the defendant. Ellen was married to the complainant in October, 1882. She died intestate about one year afterwards, leaving one child who is still living. The estate of Joseph W. Cooper appears to have been managed by the defendant. Upon Walter's death each of the three surviving children was the owner of one third of the property. Up to the death of Ellen, Samuel managed the estate in the interest of and for all three and without charge to his sisters for his services, under an arrangement that he should not charge for his services, should make annual settlements and should pay no interest for balances in his hands. After Ellen's death he continued still to manage it in like manner, with (as he says) the consent of the complainant.

The bill is filed for an account of Ellen's interest in the estate for a discovery of her personal property held by the defendant and to restrain him from expending that property in improvements upon the joint real estate. The parties made a settlement in January, 1884; and in pursuance of it the defendant paid the complainant about $33,000, for his deceased wife's interest in the assets of the estate of her father, except the property held jointly and her interest in Walter's share. There was a settlement of her interest in Walter's estate in July, 1884. In the fall of that year the complainant told the defendant that he would like to have the whole matter settled up, and the latter replied that it was his custom to settle the matters of the estate with the members of the family at the first of the year, that he had always done so. The complainant did not object to waiting until that time.

On the first of January following the defendant was ready to settle, but on account of the complainant's illness the settlement was deferred and it took place on the 5th of March following. The defendant paid the complainant upon that settlement $11,179.09, the amount found due. At that time the defendant stated that he would be ready to settle again upon the first of the next year, and he says the complainant made no objection. On the first of January, 1886, the defendant was ready to settle with the complainant for all moneys received and paid out during the preceding year, and tendered himself ready to do so to the complainant's attorney, who refused to make the settlement. The attorney, indeed, says that the defendant, after the bill had been filed (it was filed December 4, 1885), told him that the settlement which he desired to make upon the first of January would be made only in case this suit should be withdrawn or the matters in controversy in it settled: but he also says that on or about the first of January the defendant called at his office with his book (his account book) in his hand, and then stated to him that he was ready to settle according to his custom at the beginning of the year for the moneys which he had collected and paid out during the year. In October preceding, and before the bill was filed, the defendant stated to the attorney that he would settle on the first of January as he had been accustomed to do ever since he had acted as trustee in the management of the estate.

The case shows no unwillingness on the part of the defendant to account to the complainant. If, as the former testifies, the latter made no objection to his proposition made on March 5, 1885, to settle again upon the first of January succeeding, the filing of the bill was not necessary to get an account.

On the first of January, 1886, the defendant offered to account. The complainant could have got all the information he desired in reference to the matters involved in the transactions of the defendant in the management of the estate by inquiring of the defendant. There is no evidence of any refusal whatever to give him any information for which he asked.

The defendant swears that after the death of his sister, the complainant's wife, he explained to the complainant everything in regard to her personal estate and the securities belonging to it, and that when he handed to the complainant the bonds (held by her in severalty) in his possession belonging to her estate he and the complainant went over the defendant's book, page by page, to see whether the indorsements upon the bonds corresponded with the defendant's book, in which he kept a memorandum of all mortgages and of the time up to which interest was paid, and that the complainant saw all the mortgages which the defendant had belonging to the joint estate or to the complainant's wife. He also says that at one time he showed the complainant his plans of the real property, and his way of keeping books in reference to that property, and gave him such information upon the subject as would enable him in case of the defendant's death or disability to understand the whole matter.

It may here be remarked that the complainant says that in the settlement made in March, 1885, the defendant declined to pay over his, the complainant's, share of the principal of the joint mortgages that he had in his possession, on the ground that there were expenses of the joint real estate to be met, and he had assumed to meet them. The defendant could not reasonably have been expected to pay over any of the principal of those mortgages to the complainant at that time. The mortgages belonged to the defendant, his sister, Mrs. Kaighn, and the estate of the complainant's deceased wife, and the principal had not been collected.

The complainant's attorney says that the defendant said to him that he declined to make a settlement with the complainant as administrator, relative to the personal property (referring to the joint mortgages) of the complainant (as administrator) in his possession; and that he intended to retain it in his possession for the purpose of meeting out of the income thereof the expenses for improvements and repairs upon the real estate, in which the complainant and his child were interested. He says also that the defendant said that he ought to retain that personal property for the purpose stated for his protection, or in justice to himself, or that he ought to be allowed to do so for his protection; but the defendant never in fact refused to account for the money and property in his hand.

The complainant admits that when he solicited the defendant to become his surety upon his bond for $5,000, as administrator, he said to the latter that he considered the taking out of the letters a mere form, as there were no creditors and there was practically nothing for an administrator to do as such, that what there was to do, could be done as well without letters of administration as with them, and that he expected that the affairs of his wife's estate would go on just as they had gone on theretofore; that is, that the defendant would continue to manage both real and personal property as he had done. The defendant testifies that the complainant told him so, on more than one occasion, and that he told him so as lately as the settlement in March, 1885.

Three questions are presented in reference to the account: one is whether the defendant should be required to pay interest upon the balance in his hands due the complainant; another is whether the land bought in under foreclosure proceedings by the defendant, in trust for himself and the others interested in joint mortgages which were foreclosed, and which purchases were necessary to protect the interest of the holders of those mortgages, and which land remains unsold, is to be regarded as personal or real estate in the accounting with the complainant which is of course to be of the personal estate only of his deceased wife; the other question is as to the liability of the deponent to account to the complainant in respect to a mortgage given by one Munn, to the defendant and his brother and sisters, of a vacant city lot sold by them to him, in satisfaction of which mortgage a conveyance of the lot was taken by the defendant in trust for those interested in the mortgage.

As to the first question: the defendant undoubtedly understood from the complainant that the latter was desirous that the family arrangement before referred to should continue until a final settlement should be made; and he appears to have had good reason for such understanding. By that arrangement the defendant was not chargeable with interest upon the balance in his hands at the end of the year. The settlement of March, 1885, was made upon that basis.

On the other hand the defendant was entitled to no commissions or other compensations for his services. He tendered himself ready to settle on the first of January, 1886, in accordance with the arrangement. He therefore should pay no interest up to that date; nor should he pay any interest for the period since then, for he swears that he has always been ready to pay the money to the complainant.

The discovery which was sought by the bill has been made; and the case shows no concealment nor any bad faith upon the part of the defendant. Nor is it shown nor does it appear that the defendant, when the bill was filed, contemplated expenditures out of the joint personal property in his hands for improvements upon the joint real estate, except it may have been such as he would have made unwillingly and because constrained to make them by the municipal authorities.

The Munn property was conveyed to the defendant in March, 1884, after the death of the complainant's wife; and it appears to have been taken in order to save the expense of foreclosure proceedings. The action of the defendant in the matter seems to have been judicious, and it is not impeached. That land must be regarded as personal property; and, therefore, the complainant is entitled to an account in respect thereto, and the defendant to allowance of any taxes, etc., paid by him thereon.

As to any land obtained through foreclosure proceedings or otherwise, in satisfaction of mortgages thereon, before the death of the complainant's wife, it is to be regarded as real estate, for such it was at her death.

There must be an account, but the defendant should not be required to pay the costs of this suit.

(Filed April 9, 1887.)

BILL to set aside assignments by plaintiff's intestate of certain mortgages, notes, and other evidences of debt, on the ground of fraud and undue influence and for an accounting, etc. Decree for complainant.

The case is stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Messrs. Robbins & Hartshorne, for complainant.

Messrs. R. T. Stout & H. H. Wainright, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions: The contention in this case is respecting the estate of Ann Morton, deceased. Ann Morton was the widow of —— Morton; she was his second wife, and sister of his first wife; by his first wife he had three children; by Ann Morton he had none.

The children, who are nephews and nieces of Ann and of whom Ann is the step-mother, claim her property. They say that she made an absolute gift of it to them. Ann died at about the age of seventy-nine years, her husband having died about twelve years before. She had a brother, Joseph J. Allen. In January, 1879, she committed her bonds, notes, and gold and silver, all of the value of about $3,600, to his custody; he kept it but a short time before she executed a power of attorney, dated the 4th day of February, 1879, to Peter C. Morton and John L. Morton, to collect all of her estate. Peter C. then lived in the same house with her and had done so for many years. John L. had lived within about 300 yards of her for a long time; they were two of her nephews and step-children. When this power of attorney was delivered to them they immediately demanded possession, and possession was given to them by Joseph J. Allen, of all the property which she had placed in the custody of Joseph.

A receipt which they signed shows that one of these securities was a bond and mortgage of the said Peter C. for $150, a bond of one Pierce for $275, a note for $20, a note for $344, upon which had been paid $284.30, a note of the said Peter C. Morton for $78.26, another of his notes for $50 and another for $47.68, and a note of John L. Morton, $506.64, together with other evidences of indebtedness. Peter C. and John L. held these papers by virtue of their power of attorney until the 12th day of May of the same year (1879), when one Clark Newman, who had been invited to the house of Ann Morton either by Peter C. or John L., to transact some business for her, came there and indorsed on Peter C. Morton's bond, as follows: "May 12, 1879, record of Peter C. Morton, satisfaction in full for principal and interst on the within bond, in consideration that the usual interest on the amount of the said bond be paid to me when demanded," to which she made her mark.

On the bond given by Pierce to her to secure the payment of $275, she indorsed as follows: "May 12, 1879, for a valuable consideration I do hereby transfer to Peter C. Morton and John L. Morton all my right and interest of, in and to the within bond, and for the equal benefit of the children of their brother, Joseph A. Morton, deceased; they to receive the one third part thereof, reserving the interest that may accrue thereon during my lifetime if I choose to demand it;" and signed it by her mark.

On the note of Joseph J. Allen, which was for $352.86, she made a similar indorsement transferring and assigning it to the said Peter C. Morton but without any reservations of interest to herself whatever.

She made a like indorsement on the note of John L. Morton, expressing satisfaction for the principal thereof, which was $506.64, reserving the interest thereof yearly to Peter C. She assigned another of his notes, reserving the interest which should fall due. She also assigned a note of $200 to Peter C. and John L. for the use of themselves and the children of their brother Joseph. Several other notes were indorsed by her, in a similar manner. Enough has been given to show the true nature of the transaction. The instruments so indorsed were all delivered to Peter C. and John L. Peter C. at once caused his mortgage to be canceled of record.

As I understand the testimony, Ann Morton thus surrendered to Peter C. and John L., her nephews and stepchildren, for their use and the use of the children of one of their brothers, all of her estate, reserving nothing to herself except the interest on the principal due upon the bond and upon three of the notes. She took nothing from them to show any liability upon their part to pay her such interest, should she demand it. The complainant, the administrator of Ann Morton, files his bill, alleging that this transaction of May 12, 1879, by which said instruments were transferred to Peter C. and John L., is fraudulent and void; both upon the ground of undue influence and incapacity.

There is evidence showing that the mind of Ann Morton had failed very greatly, that her memory was very perceptibly impaired, and that recent sickness had greatly prostrated her. These things are so manifest in the case that if it should be concluded that she was not incapable of contracting, the conclusion cannot be avoided that she was most easily subjected to undue influence. In such case, if such influence was exerted, it was clearly fraudulent in the law.

In considering this question of undue influence, we must take into account the relation of the parties and the manner in which they had been living. Ann Morton, being old and at best feeble in mind and body, living in the same house with her nephew and stepson, Peter C., naturally felt a sense of dependence upon him, if not subjection to his will. The testimony shows that he had many business transactions with her; and I think it is a striking fact, a fact which shows either great mental imbecility on her part or great control on the part of Peter C. and John L., that, after having placed all her securities in the hands of her brother, who seemed to be competent and worthy, in less than a month she executes a power of attorney to Peter C. and John L. to collect them and to take charge of them, without ever having herself demanded them of him personally. But what is more significant still is the fact that in about one month after they get possession of all of these papers, as her attorneys, they procure Clark Newman to come and have her transfer them all to them for their own and their nephews' absolute use and control, excepting the interest of a portion only, delivering up to them every voucher and taking no evidence of her reserved rights. She thus makes herself penniless. Who in a reasonable state does thus?

But the defendants say that, although this be all true, although she reserved nothing, although she surrendered all evidences of indebtedness and took no proof of any claim against them, she had a right so to do, and insist that the law will uphold the transaction, until the complainants either establish mental incapacity or undue influence. In other words: upon both branches of the case, it is urged that the burden is upon the complainant. As to mental unsoundness, considered independently, this is so; but whether so or not in this particular case, as to undue inflence, I think the complainant has sustained the charges made.

There is proof that Mrs. Morton had said that she intended to give her estate to the children of her husband by his former wife; but there is no proof that she ever undertook in any manner, except by will, to dispose of her estate, until she made this assignment to Peter C. and John L.: and this disposition was not made until they obtained the absolute possession of all her securities, under the pretense of acting as her attorney.

I conclude that when an aged person of weak mind and of rapidly failing memory makes an unconditional assignment of and transfers, by delivery, all of his or her estate, to those who live with him or her, reserving only the interest on a few small sums of money, and taking no voucher for such reservation, the transaction is void in law, unless it is shown that such person was entirely free from undue influence.

I come to this conclusion because it seems so plainly most irrational to suppose that any person would, without such influence, in some way exerted, strip himself or herself of all means of support or comfort. When in health and strength, Mrs. Morton was not guilty of any such folly. When she had the mind to see what her necessities were or might be she took care of her resources and so provided for her wants; but when age and weakness overcame her, and the time of her greatest need had also come, she lost sight of her former care and judgment, and allowed all to go, by one stroke of the pen. I say in some way her weakness must have been taken advantage of.

But Peter C. not only lived in the house with her, but he and his brother, John L., had been made her attorneys. She had all her estate delivered to them. Thus, besides their being the children of her dead sister, there was this confidential relation established. Their relation to her first gave them great control over her, in her decrepitude. Achieving this success, they procure a power of attorney from her, enabling them to take charge of her affairs. When this has been accomplished, it seemed easy enough to persuade her that she had no further use, in her old age, for what her prudence and frugality had treasured. But when they accepted that power of attorney, they accepted a trust, and the law will hold them to the strictest account. See Bigelow, Fraud, 223, and cases cited.

As to the responsibility of the trustee, and as to where the burden lies, see Jones v. Lloyd, 6 West. Rep. 35.

But upon both branches of the question, aside from that of trust, the complainant seems to be fully sustained by the careful exposition of the law as laid down in Haydock v. Haydock, 6 Stew. Eq. 494; S. C. 7 Stew. Eq. 570, court of errors on appeal.

I will advise a decree, setting aside all of said assignments as void, and that the said Peter C. Morton and John L. Morton account to the administrator de bonis non of Ann Morton, deceased, for all the estate or assets of the said Ann Morton which were assigned and transferred to them May 12, 1879; they will be entitled to credit for all just disbursements on her account; they will be charged with interest upon the various sums transferred. The complainant is entitled to costs.

PREROGATIVE COURT.

Garret CONOVER, Appt.,
v.
John L. CONOVER et al., Exrs., Respts.

A father made a will, whereby he devised his property to his several children, giving a certain farm to his son Garret. After the making of the will, Garret misbehaved himself, and soon thereafter the testator made a codicil to the will, whereby "for certain reasons" he revoked the gift of the farm to Garret and instead thereof gave him an annuity of one hundred dollars. Both the will and codicil were duly executed. Thereafter testator altered the word "one" in the amount of the annuity in the codicil to "two," and made a memorandum that he wished Garret to have "two hundred instead of one, as per codicil." Soon after this testator died, and Garret filed a caveat against the probate of the codicil, on the ground that his father was induced to make it through undue influence. The will and codicil were both admitted to probate, the latter in the condition in which it was before the alteration. Held, on the evidence, that the codicil, as well as the will, was properly admitted to probate.

APPEAL from a decree of the Monmouth Orphans' Court, admitting a will and codicil to probate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. L. Lawrence and M. W. Meagher, for appellant.

Messrs. E. W. Arrowsmith and A. C. Hartshorne, for respondents:

The influence acquired over a testator by kind offices unconnected with any fraud or contrivance, can never, alone, be a good ground of setting aside a will; such influence is lawful and proper.

Lowe v. Williamson, 1 Green, Ch. 82; Den, d. Turnbull, v. Gibbons, 2 Zab. 117; Re Gleespin's Will, 11 C. E. Green, 523.

A will contained alterations and erasures affecting the amount and objects of the testator's bounty, the existence of which at the time of the execution the attesting witnesses could not depose to; held, there being an absence of all direct evidence as to the alterations and erasures, that the presumption of law was that such alterations and erasures were made after the execution of the will, and the probate of the will was granted in its original form.

Cooper v. Bockett, 4 Moore, P. C. C. 419; 10 Jur. 931.

Where a testatrix told the witnesses to her will, at the time of attestation, that she had made alterations in her will but did not allow them to see what the alterations were, held, that in the absence of any means to determine what alterations were made before execution, the court could not give effect to any of them.

1 Johns. & Hem. Eng. Ch. Rep. 115.

A testatrix duly executed a draft of a will, in which at the time were several marginal notes and alterations in the handwriting of the solicitor. About four years after a codicil was executed in which no reference was made to the contents of the will. These papers remained in the custody of the testatrix until her death. It was then found that a marginal note disposing of the residue of the personalty and several bequests had been struck through with a pen, and other alterations had been made in the handwriting of the testatrix; held, that as no affirmative evidence was produced to satisfy the court that these last mentioned obliterations and alterations were made before execution, whether the date of the execution was taken to be that of the will or the codicil, the presumption in law was that they were made subsequently and that they could not therefore be included in the probate.

Rowley v. Merlin, 6 Jur. N. S. 1165.

Upon the death of A, a will was found in which a legacy to B was erased, but so as to be legible. One of the attesting witnesses stated that the erasure was made before the execution of the will; the other witness had no recollection on the subject, and evidence was given tending to show that the erasure was made after the execution. The court, upon the balance of the evidence, being of the opinion that the erasure was made after the execution, granted probate without the erasure.

Re Hardy, 30 L. J. N. S. Probate, 142.

In granting probate of a will an alteration will not be admitted to probate either in the ordinary way or the fac simile unless attested in the manner required by the Wills Act; and the court will decline to entertain any argument drawn from the intention of the testator as revealed by the context.

Re Gaussen, 16 Week. Rep. 212.

A testatrix after the execution of her will erased certain parts, substituting in their places other words. Probate was granted of the will with these parts erased in blank, the original words not being discernible on the face of the paper and there being no evidence to show what they were.

Re James, 1 Swab. & Trist. Prob. 238.

A testator some time after the execution of his will ordered the names of two executors to be erased and other names to be substituted in their places. This alteration was completely effected but not in the presence of two witnesses; held, that in the probate the names erased must be restored.

Re Parr, 6 Jur. N. S. 56; S. C. 29 L. J. N. S. Prob. 70.

A testator after executing his will erased the name and description of the executor and substituted those of another person. The alterations not having been duly attested the court ordered the words erased to be restored in the engrossment of the will.

Re Harris, 29 Law Jour. N. S. Prob. 79; S. C. 1 Swab. & Trist. Prob. 536.

W made a will, which was written on the first and third pages of several sheets of note paper. At the bottom of one of these pages were the words and mark: "I leave the whole of my property to the following religious societies, viz.: X to be divided in equal shares among them." On the top of the opposite page was a similar mark to that following the "viz.:" and the names of four religious societies. There being no evidence that the names of the societies were written before the execution of the will, the court, considering them to be interlineations, excluded them from probate.

Re White, 30 Law Jour. N. S. Prob. 55; 6 Jur. N. S. 808.

A testator executed a will and codicil. At some time after the execution of the will, but before that of the codicil, he with a pencil struck through several paragraphs of his will and made his initials on the margin; he also placed a query opposite other paragraphs. The codicil confirmed in so far as it did not alter the will; held, that the alterations so made were only deliberative and not final and not included in the confirmation of the codicil, and therefore to be omitted from the probate.

Re Hall, L. R. 2 Prob. & Div. 256; 40 Law Jour. N. S. 37; 25 Law Times, N. S. 284; 19 W. R. 897.

And the same principle applies to partial alterations, so that where a testator strikes out the name of a devisee and at the same time interlines that of another, or substitutes a larger or smaller interest or share for that which he had previously given, if the interlineation is inoperative for want of an attestation, the obliteration will also fail of effect.

1 Jarm. Wills, 295.

Glasses have been used for discovering what the words obliterated originally were; but parol evidence is inadmissible except in those cases where the obliteration was made for the purpose merely of altering the amount of the gift and not of revoking it, in which case, there being no intention to revoke except for the purpose of substituting a gift of a different amount, if the latter cannot take place by reason of the substituted words not being properly attested, the former gift will now (as under the Statute of Frauds) remain good, and evidence must be admitted to show what the original words were. The same rule, it is presumed, applies to an erasure of the name of the legatee as it appears to do to an erasure of the name of an executor.

1 Jarm. Wills, 302.

An intention to revoke, however strongly declared, will not prevail unless actually carried out. A testator having an only son devised certain real estate to his "son J. W. S.;" subsequently he erased the son's name from the will, leaving the word "son" uncanceled; held, that the devise was not revoked.

Clark v. Smith, 34 Barb. 140.

Alterations and interlineations in a will made by the testator with the intention of making it operative as to after acquired lands, but which alteration did not take effect for want of a proper attestation, do not destroy the original devise, not being made animo revocandi.

Jackson v. Holloway, 7 Johns. 394.

There may be a partial revocation by obliteration; but if it be accompanied by an inoperative attempt to give the property over to another (not duly executed) the revocation is ineffective.

McPherson v. Clark, 3 Bradf. Sur. 92.

A testator cannot by obliterations partially revoke a will, duly executed.

Quinn v. Quinn, 1 Thomp. & C. 437; Schouler, Exrs. & Admrs. § 84.

Alterations, erasures and obliterations found in a will should be treated according to circumstances. If they precede the formal execution, they stand as the final expression of the testator's wishes; but if made afterwards, the instrument in its altered shape must have been duly attested or else the alteration will fail and probate be granted as of a valid testament, according to the original attested expression.

Jackson v. Holloway, 7 Johns. 394; Wheeler v. Bent, 7 Pick. 61; Bigelow v. Gillott, 123 Mass. 102.

Runyon, Ordinary, delivered the following opinion:

Peter G. Conover, late of the County of Monmouth, deceased, died May 4, 1886, aged eighty-nine years. On the 22d of June, 1881, about four years before his death, he made his will, by which after directing payment of his debts and funeral expenses, he gave to his son John L. Conover his homestead farm of about 87 acres, subject to the payment of $4,000 (which he charged upon the farm) for the benefit of his estate and to be distributed as directed in the will. To each of his sons, Lafayette and Stacy, he gave $3,000; to each of his grandchildren, John L., Peter G., Jane and William Conover, he gave $700. To his daughter, Emma Hyers, he gave two sums of $8,000 and $1,000, the latter to compensate her for her care of him. And he directed that those sums should be invested for her for life, with remainder to her children or their descendants, with remainder over in case of her death without issue. To his granddaughter Caroline Dennis he gave $1,000 for life, with remainder to her children, and with remainder over in case she should die without issue. To his greatgrandson Holmes Dennis he gave $1,000 to be invested and to be paid to him with its accumulations of interest, upon his arriving at majority; and he provided that in case of the legatee's death before that time, the legacy and the interest thereon should go into his, the testator's, estate. To his son Garret, the appellant, the testator gave a farm of about forty-three acres. He provided that his desk and clock which his father left him, and some cupboards fitted to his house and belonging therein, should remain with the house. He gave the residue of his estate to his executors for their compensation; with provision that if any of them should die after the date of the will, his or their share or shares of the residue should go to the estate of the decedent or decedents, whether he or they should have done anything towards the execution of the will or the administration of his estate or not. He then gave to the children of his daughter Eleanor, and Alfred L. Conover, a certain promissory note of $2,600, with all interest thereon which he had paid for their father, and he appointed his sons John, Lafayette and Stacy, executors. The will was executed in the presence of Chilion Robbins and Acton C. Hartshorne.

On the 24th of June, 1885, about four years afterwards, and about ten months before his death, the testator made a codicil to the will by which "for certain reasons" as he declared, he revoked the gift of the farm to his son Garret, and instead of it gave him for life an annuity of $100, clear of taxes, which annuity was to begin three months after his, the testator's, death, and was to be payable quarterly; and he gave $100 to each of Garret's children. He directed that the farm given by the will to Garret should become part of the residue of the estate. The codicil was executed in the presence of Mr. Hartshorne and Charles Robbins. Afterwards, but at what particular time does not appear, the testator (he kept the will and codicil in his own possession) undertook to increase the annuity for Garret in the codicil to $200. He attempted to do this by changing the word "one" to "two," and by leaving with the codicil a paper (in his own handwriting and signed by him) as follows:

"$200. It is my wish that Garret should have two hundred dollars instead of one, as per codicil."

Both the will and codicil were executed with due formalities, and there is no reason to question the testamentary capacity of the testator at the time of making either instrument. Indeed no objection is made to the will upon any ground. Nor is any made to the execution of the codicil; and it is conceded that at the time of making thereof the testator was possessed of the requisite capacity. But the caveator objects to the latter instrument upon the ground of fraud, alleging that it was the result of undue influence on the part of the testator's sons Lafayette and Stacy, exerted by them to the prejudice of their brother Garret, the caveator.

The charge is based upon the fact that Garret was arrested on the 18th of April, 1885, and committed to the county jail of Monmouth County, upon a charge made by Lafayette that he had (according to Mrs. Hyers' testimony) made threats of personal injury to her. He remained in jail for three days and then was sent to the State Lunatic Asylum at Trenton, by virtue of regular proceedings to that end, as an insane pauper patient. He remained there one month, until the 21st of May, when he was released at the instance of Lafayette. From that time he received an allowance from the testator of $100 a year, paid in equal quarter yearly payments.

The codicil was, as before stated, made June 24, 1885, about a month after Garret left the asylum. By it, as already appears, the testator gives to him an annuity of $100 for life, and gives $100 to each of his children in lieu of the farm given to him by the will. Garret's wife and children lived at the time of his arrest in the City of New York, and he was in this State at his father's homestead where his father (whose wife was dead) lived with his daughter Mrs. Hyers and her husband, who had resided there for many years. Garret says he had been there all the spring (of 1885) when he was arrested (which was as before stated, April 18), and had been doing work upon the farm. Before his arrest he had become intoxicated, and while in that condition had in anger pushed a servant girl who was employed at the homestead against the wall, and she threatened to take proceedings to arrest him for that assault, but was dissuaded therefrom by the testator. It was said that her father had made threats that he would whip Garret for his violence to her.

On account of Garret's conduct while he was so intoxicated, Lafayette and Stacy, who happened to come to the homestead (neither of them lived there) to see their father, consulted with the latter as to what it was best to do with Garret. He told them to do whatever they thought best. They then caused his arrest as before stated, and took proceedings for his confinement in the asylum for the insane. The certificate which was made in these latter proceedings was made by Drs. Forman and Cook, two physicians of Monmouth County. It appears to have been drawn by the former. It states that they had examined into and were acquainted with the state of health and mental condition of Garret, and that he was in their opinion insane and a fit subject to be sent to the State Lunatic Asylum. There can be no doubt that the proceedings for his arrest and those taken for his confinement in the lunatic asylum were taken in good faith, and were deemed necessary by Lafayette and Stacy, in view of his condition resulting from excessive indulgence in intoxicating drink. And when he had been restored to his reason they released him from confinement.

Mr. Hyers testifies that the day before Lafayette went to the asylum to release Garret, Lafayette and Stacy were in conversation with the testator upon the subject of the proposed release of Garret, and they asked the testator what they should do with Garret when he should have come out, and the testator said he did not want him there (at the homestead); that he would rather pay $100 than to have him there—that he would rather give him $100 than to have him come back again. Lafayette says that on that occasion the testator told him to tell Garret that he would give him $100 a year, and he says he told Garret so.

In this connection it may be stated that the codicil itself is evidence that the testator had not been misled by being fraudulently induced to believe that Garret was insane while the contrary was the fact. The cause of the change in the provision for Garret is not stated to be his insanity, but the testator says that "for certain reasons" he makes the change. It appears, too, that the testator said on more than one occasion that Garret had not been placed in the asylum with his consent; so that there is no ground for the claim that the testator was under a false impression caused by the artful misconduct of Lafayette and Stacy towards Garret, as to the mental condition of the latter. He seems to have known all about it. The alteration in the codicil and the making of the paper before referred to, accompanying the will and codicil, are evidence that after he made the codicil his mind returned to the provision for Garret made thereby, and that while he intended to increase the amount of the annuity, he was not disposed to change the character of the provision.

The caveator's counsel insist that the threat said to have been made by Lafayette, that he would "fix" Garret, is evidence of animosity on the part of the former towards the latter; and they also insist that an expression to which Mrs. Hyers testifies, as having been made by Lafayette, that Garret was "fishing for the place but he, Lafayette, would be damned if he would get it," is evidence of an intention on the part of Lafayette to take advantage of Garret in the disposition of the testator's estate. Lafayette swears that he made neither of the expressions. But if he made them, it appears that the first had reference to Garret's conduct when he was intoxicated, and which resulted in his arrest, and the other was made in regard to the homestead property and not the farm given to the caveator by the will.

Mrs. Hyers testifies to another expression to which the caveator's counsel attach some importance. It is a proposition said to have been made by Lafayette to Mrs. Hyers, that she and her husband should tell the testator that they were going to leave the homestead in order thus to constrain him to do something. What it was that he was to be constrained to do does not appear, but she says that nothing was said about keeping Garret away from the homestead, and she also says she does not know what Lafayette meant by the proposition. It is manifest that the evidence on the subject of that proposition is of no value or significance whatever.

The whole case shows that the testator had full testamentary capacity; that after the making of the will in 1881 the conduct of Garret was such as to induce the testator in the exercise of his own judgment to change the provision which he made for him in the will (the gift of a farm, of which his improvidence might soon deprive him) to a life annuity which would be secure to him, and a legacy to his children of $100 apiece.

The orphans' court admitted the will and codicil to probate, the latter in the condition in which it was before the alteration.

The decree should be affirmed.

No costs of the appeal will be awarded to either side against the other.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Jeanette S. HELLER, Admrx.,
v.
William S. GROVES et al.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by a married woman, her husband not joining therein, held, on the facts, that the mortgage is without vitality, being without consideration, and executed and delivered only to protect the property therein described from a reckless and dissipated husband.

(Filed April 2, 1887.)

BILL to foreclose a mortgage made by a married woman. Bill dismissed.

The case is stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. John H. Backes, for complainant.

Messrs. W. D. Holt and James Buchanan, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

This bill is filed by the administratrix of Mrs. Smith, to foreclose a mortgage which, it is said, was executed and delivered to Mrs. Smith by Mary E. Groves, her daughter, to secure $1,350, so much money advanced by Mr. Smith, the husband of the one, and the father of the other. The mortgagor was a married woman at the time of the execution of the mortgage, and her husband not joining therein, an imperfection is manifest, which it is thought this court is capable of overcoming by declaring the alleged loan to be a lien on her separate estate, acting upon the supposition that the wife had the power of appointment, and did intend by her act so to appoint. The following authorities are relied upon as sustaining this view: Harrison v. Stewart, 3 C. E. Green, 451; Wilson v. Brown, 2 Beas. 277; Leaycraft v. Hedden, 3 Green, Ch. 512; Homœopathic Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Marshall, 5 Stew. Eq. 103; Cutler v. Tuttle, 4 C. E. Green, 549; Hulme v. Tenant, 1 Bro. C. C. 16; Armstrong v. Ross, 5 C. E. Green, 116; Pentz v. Simonson, 2 Beas. 234; Pierson v. Lum, 10 C. E. Green, 390; Murray v. Barlee, 3 Myl. & K. 209; Methodist Church v. Jaques, 3 Johns. Ch. 77; N. A. Coal Co. v. Dyett, 7 Paige, 14.

Taking it for granted that the complainant has the correct view of these cases (which I do not pause to discuss), I will inquire what facts or statements have been introduced, by way of evidence, to establish whether or not any foundation is laid for this equitable doctrine to rest upon.

In 1879, Mrs. Groves being desirous of buying a lot of land, her father, Mr. Smith, advanced to her $300 for that purpose. There is no satisfactory evidence of what passed between the parties (the father and his daughter), except the payment of the money. There is no evidence that, at that time, it was regarded as a loan, or as a gift, by either. It does not appear that any note or memorandum was given or required. Mrs. Groves purchased a lot, and in order to build a house thereon, in 1870, borrowed $1,000 of Mrs. F. and gave to her a mortgage on the lot.

While this mortgage was in full force, and no part of the principal paid, Mrs. Groves, in December, 1871, executed a bond and the mortgage now in suit to her mother, Mrs. Smith, and delivered them to her. It was a year and perhaps longer after this that Mrs. Groves applied to her father to pay off the mortgage given to Mrs. F., which he did, the $1,000 and some interest then being due. He paid the money directly to Mrs. F. and had the mortgage canceled of record, taking nothing but the canceled mortgage as proof of what he did.

The allegation now is in the bill, that Mrs. Smith paid and advanced not only the $300, but also the principal and interest of the mortgage, being $1,050; and that, to secure the same, Mrs. Groves gave her a bond and the mortgage now in suit. This allegation, so contradictory to all the testimony, the complainant desires to remove, by amending his bill, so that the allegation shall be that the moneys were advanced by Mr. Smith, and that he ordered and directed the securities to be taken in the name of Mrs. Smith and caused them to be delivered to her, making her a gift of them.

Proceeding, then, with this more favorable and consistent allegation, many difficulties seem to be in the way of placing the case upon the foundation prepared by the counsel for complainant. When the mortgage was executed and delivered to Mrs. Smith (if it was so delivered in December, 1871, as is alleged) not one dollar was given therefor. There is no evidence that Mr. Smith was present or had anyone present to represent him, or had the slightest knowledge of the transaction. There is no evidence that he had at any time requested the execution of such bond and mortgage, nor that he knew anything about them until a long time afterwards. It is by no means satisfactorily established that his attention was called to them when he paid off and canceled the bond and mortgage held by Mrs. F. It cannot be safely said that he had any knowledge of them until 1878, when, it is said, they were in his possession, kept by him in a tin box under lock and key, and such box deposited in his trunk.

The attention is also arrested by the fact that it does not appear that Mrs. Smith was any party to the transaction, except to be the recipient of the bond and mortgage; or that she was in anywise consulted respecting it, or had any knowledge of it until the bond and mortgage were delivered to her.

But if this mortgage was executed without any knowledge upon the part of Mr. or Mrs. Smith, and without any pecuniary consideration, how did it come to be executed? The reason therefor is plain. Both of the witnesses called by the complainant concur in saying that their brother-in-law, Mr. Groves, became dissipated, neglected work, and abused their sister, and that she executed this mortgage to protect the property from him. They say that she was fearful that he would prevail upon her to execute a mortgage upon the premises for his convenience or accommodation.

How then, these things being so, can this mortgage have life? Or how can the amount of money therein named be declared a lien upon the land by way of appointment? Mrs. Smith gave nothing for it herself. There is nothing to show that Mr. Smith accepted it as security and made a gift thereof to Mrs. Smith. As has been already intimated, there is no thread of evidence suggesting that there might have been an understanding between Mr. Smith and his daughter, that he having already advanced the $300, she should execute this mortgage to secure that amount and also the $1,000, and that he would some time thereafter advance the $1,000. I am led to conclude that this mortgage is without vitality in the hands of the complainant; believing as I do, from the fullest declaration of the witnesses, that it was executed and delivered originally to protect the property therein described from a reckless and dissipated husband, and being unable to discover any proof that it was ever delivered or assigned for any other purpose, either to Mr. or Mrs. Smith.

I ought to observe that, if Mrs. Smith ever held this mortgage as a valid lien on the lot in question or as evidence of a just claim against her daughter, by the consent of Mr. Smith, then, it appearing that Mr. Smith had the undisputed possession of it before the death of Mrs. Smith, he may have come by it in a perfectly legitimate way, and for a good consideration; and all will agree that, he having the possession, the presumption (if there is any presumption in favor of any party) is that he was the lawful owner and holder. And again; Mr. Smith surviving his wife, and still having the possession thereof for several years, it would not be straining the rule (that the husband takes as next of kin) to hold that he supposed he was so entitled, having the possession without the formalities of administration.

I think the bill ought to be dismissed, with costs, and will so advise.

PENNSYLVANIA.

SUPREME COURT.

APPEAL OF Caroline SMITH.

1. In the absence of proof of fraud or concealment a widow cannot avoid an antenuptial settlement.
2. Although fraud or concealment may sometimes be inferred from the disproportion of the wife's provision to the husband's means, yet such a presumption does not arise under circumstances in which the disproportion might well have been intended by the parties.
3. A subsequent increase in the value of the husband's property does not affect the validity of a settlement.
4. It is not essential to the validity of a settlement that it should be recorded and delivered to the trustee named therein.
5. A widower fifty-two years of age, with six children and worth about $175,000, married a woman forty-three years old, who had no property. In an antenuptial settlement, she released, in consideration of real estate producing $1,200 a year, all her interest in his estate. The deed of settlement remained in the husband's possession and was never recorded. He died worth about $400,000. In addition to the real estate settled he bequeathed to her the interest of $15,000 for life. The residue of his estate he gave to his children. Held, that the settlement was valid and binding upon the wife.

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 431, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey and Sterrett, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia County, confirming an adjudication. Affirmed.

The facts, as they appeared at the audit of the account of Alfred Smith and Horace F. Smith, executors of Stephen Smith, deceased, before ASHMAN, J., were stated in the adjudication, which was as follows:

Stephen Smith died October 9, 1884, leaving a will dated November 9, 1878, and a codicil dated May 11, 1881, which were afterwards duly proved, and by which he gave to his executors $15,000, in trust to pay the income to his wife Caroline Smith during her life or widowhood; the principal thereafter to fall into the residuary estate. He gave the residue of his estate as follows (to his children) * * * .

He left surviving, his widow (by a second marriage), Caroline Smith, and six children, all by his first marriage, viz.: Alfred, Alonzo, Angelia, Stephen, Ellwood, and Horace F. Smith; all being of full age.

The widow elected to take against the will. Her right to do so was contested, upon the ground that in consideration of a certain interest conveyed to her by an antenuptial settlement, she had released all further claim to the estate of her husband. The contract was dated September 26, 1867, about one month before her marriage to the testator. The testator, by this agreement, granted to a trustee a warehouse property on Front Street, near Market Street, in trust to permit the said Caroline, after testator's death, to receive the rents during her life; and the said Caroline after releasing her thirds, covenanted that the testator should have the right to convey all the rest of his estate without her becoming a party to the deed or deeds of conveyance. The deed was not recorded until after the testator's death, and it was found among his papers by his legal representatives.

The question does not seem to be attended with difficulty. In the interest of the widow it must be admitted that the parties to an antenuptial settlement stand in a relation which compels the exercise of the largest good faith, and excludes from their dealings the thought of any material concealment by either. Kline v. Kline, 57 Pa. 120.

This doctrine has been so sedulously adhered to that a provision made by the prospective husband, which was manifestly disproportioned to the value of his estate, has been held to raise a presumption that he has practiced such concealment. Bierer's App. 92 Pa. 265; Kline's Est. 64 Pa. 122.

The principle was invoked by the widow of Stephen Smith. She showed that the testator's real estate was valued at $56,500 or thereabouts, and that the inventory of his personal estate footed up $358,493.10, with a net fund for distribution of $334,543.83. The property set apart for her use was assessed for taxation in the sum of $12,500, and has now a rental value of $1,200 per annum, out of which $231.25 must be deducted for taxes. She also showed that this property is in bad order, and that when the testator last repaired it he declared that he did so only to keep it in tenantable condition during his own life. He did not record the deed of settlement, nor deliver it to the trustee, but kept it among his own papers. These circumstances, it was claimed, were sufficiently indicative of bad faith to cast upon his legal representatives the burden of showing the contrary.

In answer to this [the solemn admission of the widow, that the testator had apprised her of the value of his estate, which appeared in the deed, may be used in two ways; it either throws upon her the burden of showing that she had been deceived; or if the onus is with the accountants, it is affirmative proof in their hands that she was not deceived.] The language of her covenant is:

"The said Caroline Reimer, after full consideration, and with full knowledge of all the other estate of the said Stephen Smith, in consideration of said intended marriage, and of the provisions of this deed, and for other good and valuable consideration her thereunto moving, doth," etc.

[The law presumes that she understood the force of these expressions when she used them over her signature.] But the case does not rest upon her admissions. When the contract was executed, the present widow was forty-three years of age, without property, and earning her livelihood, as an assistant in her brother's photograph establishment. The testator was fifty-two years old, with a family of six children. His estate was then worth, as shown by his books, $129,396.16, personalty and $50,000 in realty, and the property which he assigned to his wife yields now, at a time of low rentals, nearly $1,000 a year net.

[It is wholly outside the question, that the estate has enormously enhanced in value since the marriage contract], because the possibility both of its increase and diminution was a problem which was mutually waived by the parties. The only flaw in the testator's case is his failure to record the deed. [He certainly did not intend to destroy it, because it was found as carefully preserved as his own deeds.] [He did not convey the property, although the deed of settlement empowered him to convey it, without his wife's joinder, but subject to the trust. Hence, the widow has suffered no injury from his omission.] But the testator did not stand upon the legal provision which he had made for his wife; he supplemented it by a testamentary gift of the income of $15,000 for her life.

Grouping these circumstances together, the auditing judge feels bound to decree that [the widow's right of election is gone.] If authority were needed to show that the consideration was adequate, and that it was not affected by the after acquisition of property by the husband, he would cite Ludwig's App. 101 Pa. 535, and Rahe v. Bank, 96 Pa. 128. * * *

And now, December 28, 1885, the account, subject to the payment of clerk's costs, is confirmed nisi.

To this adjudication the widow filed exceptions, inter alia, to the findings inclosed in brackets above; but the court dismissed them and confirmed the adjudication absolutely.

The assignment of error specified, inter alia, these findings.

The antenuptial contract was signed by the husband and wife and the trustee on the 26th day of September, 1867, and the marriage did not take place until nearly a month afterwards. There was no express evidence of a delivery of the contract, and it is submitted that from the circumstances of the case delivery should not be presumed. The trustee was a party to the contract, and his acceptance of the trust was nothing more than an execution of the contract, for until the marriage took place the contract was executory.

But if it is to be considered that the contract was delivered, it is submitted that the fact that the husband recognized the wife's rights, by her joining in a deed of conveyance, raises the presumption that at the time of the conveyance there had been a revocation of the contract, or that he did not consider it in force, and that the burden is on his legal representatives to overcome the presumption.

The fact that the husband, by his will, made a bequest to his wife should have but little weight; for although it may appear that he considered the contract in force, at the time he made the will, if by any act it had been revoked, he could not by this means revive it.

Marriage articles which may affect the title to land should be recorded.

Foster v. Whitehill, 2 Yeates, 259.

The contract not being recorded, it was possible for the husband to defeat the wife in the provision made for her. He could have mortgaged the property or even sold it; and in the case of sale she would have been entitled only to her thirds after his death.

Wilson v. McCullough, 23 Pa. 440.

If the provision for the wife be disproportionate to the means of the husband, it raises the presumption of designed concealment, and throws on him and his representatives the burden of proof.

Kline's Est. 64 Pa. 122.

Messrs. H. Clay Haines, Bowers, Gormley & Snare and Crawford & Dallas, for appellees:

It is the marriage, and not the fortune which supports and upholds an antenuptial settlement; marriage being the highest consideration.

Nairn v. Prowse, 6 Ves. 752; Ford v. Stuart, 15 Beav. 499; Peachy, Marriage Settlements, 56; Magniac v. Thompson, 7 Pet. 393, 394 (32 U. S. bk. 8 L. ed. 725).

Delivery may be either actual, by doing something and saying nothing, or else verbal, by saying something and doing nothing, or by both.

1 Shep. Touch. 578.

Dayton v. Newman, 19 Pa. 199.

If one execute a deed with a view to its being delivered, that is, if he does all that is necessary to perfect it, with the intention of having it delivered to the grantee and it afterwards comes into his hands, a jury may infer the assent of the grantor and the fact of delivery.

Arrison v. Harmstead, 2 Pa. 193.

Where an instrument is formally sealed and delivered, and there is nothing to qualify the delivery but the keeping of the deed in the hands of the executing party, nothing to show that he did not intend it to operate immediately, that is a valid and effectual deed, and delivery to the party who is to take by it, or any other person for his use, is not essential.

Pa. Co. v. Dovey, 64 Pa. 267.

That the settlement was not recorded does not invalidate it. In some States, statutory provisions for recording marriage settlements exist, some expressly to protect creditors, some general; but even there the contract, although unrecorded, is good between the parties.

Stewart, Mar. & Div. § 36 and notes; Tyler, Coverture, § 828.

In this State there is no statutory requirement for recording articles of marriage settlement, except that so far as they relate to interest in land, they fall under the general Recording Acts, and if not recorded are good, except as against bona fide purchasers for value without notice, and this is the whole effect of the cases of Foster v. Whitehall, 2 Yeates, 259, and Wilson v. McCullough, 23 Pa. 440.

Any provision which an adult before marriage agrees to accept is sufficient. If of competent age she may bargain away her rights under a marriage contract, as her husband could have done.

Bishop, Mar. Wom. § 422; Schouler, Husb. & W. § 360; on Domestic Relations, § 183.

The whole effect of the appellant's contention would be to pass a large part of the decedent's estate from his children through the childless wife to strangers to his blood.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

We see no reason why the appellant should not be held to her antenuptial contract. It is true she has repented of her bargain. This, however, is not sufficient in the absence of proof of fraud or concealment practiced upon her in the procurement of said contract. While her husband was a much richer man at the time of his death than when the contract was made, yet this fact does not enter into the question of its validity. Aside from this, he left her by his will the income of $15,000 for her life, which was over and above what he was bound to do by the contract.

We cannot say that the provision made for her was so disproportioned to his means as to create a presumption of fraud and concealment. She was a second wife, past middle age, and her husband had a large family of children living. She was not the mother of his children, nor had she aided him in the accumulation of his fortune.

Situated as the appellant was at that time, she probably thought that a provision of about $1,200 a year after her husband's death was reasonable. At any rate she agreed to it; and having enjoyed the benefits of the contract she cannot now repudiate it for no better reason than that she would like to have more. She nowhere alleges that she was deceived; on the contrary, she declared over her hand and seal in the contract itself that she entered into it "after full consideration, and with full knowledge of all the other estate of the said Stephen Smith."

The deed was not recorded and was found in Stephen Smith's possession after his death. From this it was argued that there was no delivery. We are unable to see the force of this. He was the proper custodian of the paper, as he was the party alone interested in its preservation. It would have been an act of folly to give it to his wife; it was not recorded and her interests would have been promoted by its destruction. It was not essential to deliver it to the trustee; the latter had no duties to perform during Stephen Smith's life. Nor was recording essential to its validity. The appellant has no case.

The decree is affirmed and the appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellant.

H. M. GROVE, Plff. in Err.,
v.
George McALEVY et al.

1. In an action of trespass for entering premises of plaintiff and destroying herbage, etc., therein growing, held, that a division fence established by owners of adjoining lands, and acquiesced in by them and their successors for twenty-one years, is conclusive upon them and those holding under them.
2. Held, further, that plaintiff could not recover unless he was in actual possession of the premises at the time of the alleged trespass.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 225, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Crawford County, to review a judgment on a verdict for defendants in an action of trespass on lands. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear from the charge of the court to the jury given below.

The plaintiff presented the following points:

1. If the jury find from the evidence that the boundary line between the lands of the plaintiff and defendants was fixed and established in the year 1851 by William Williams and John B. Hawthorn, and the division fence between said parties' lands was built upon the line so fixed and established, and was acquiesced in by the said Williams and Hawthorn, and their respective successors in title, for upwards of twenty-one years, the said line cannot now be altered, and their verdict should be for the plaintiff.

2. If the jury believe that at the time of the purchase by Hawthorn from Williams the vendor and vendee went to the ground and marked upon it the north line of the land bought by Hawthorn from Williams, the line so marked fixes the northern limit of the purchase by Hawthorn and all claiming under him.

3. If the jury should find that at the time Hawthorn purchased by articles of agreement from William Williams, or shortly thereafter, and more than twenty-one years before the committing of the trespass or entry by the defendants, they, Williams and Hawthorn, consented to a boundary line between them, and the same had been acquiesced in for upwards of twenty-one years, their verdict should be for the plaintiff.

4. If when Hawthorn bought from Williams, Williams was the owner of other land south of the piece he was conveying to Hawthorn, and he conveyed by courses and distances, and in pursuance thereof the parties ran the lines, and agreed upon the line between them and erected a fence thereon, agreeing that it should be the division fence or line between them, such acts on the part of Williams and Hawthorn were conclusive upon them, and those holding under them, and the verdict should be for the plaintiff.

The defendants presented no points.

The court, CHURCH, P. J., charged the jury as follows:

This is an action of trespass brought by H. M. Grove, against George and Thomas McAlevy, to recover damages for an alleged entering upon the freehold of the plaintiff, and the destruction of certain herbage, timber, fruit trees and shrubs growing thereon.

[It seems that the defendants were in possession of these premises; that is to say, they had the actual foot possession of the premises at the time of the trespass alleged to have been committed.]

An action of trespass sounds, it being a possessory action, rather of an action to recover the foot possession. A party plaintiff could not recover anything, unless he was in actual possession of the premises at the time of the trespass alleged to be committed.

In this case the plaintiff was in possession of his strawberry patch and some other of his property. The defendants have pleaded that it is their own tenement, their own free tenement, that they entered upon. That plea, having been pleaded, raises the issue of title upon the strip of property upon which a trespass has been committed. It raises the question of whether the strip of land five or six rods wide and some rods long resides in and belongs to the plaintiff or the defendants; and that is the first question you have to determine, because if you determine it against the plaintiff, you have nothing further to say, and no damage is committed. If you find that the property is the legal, lawful property of the plaintiff, he has the title thereto, then you determine the question of damages; how much the plaintiff has been damnified. But you will first direct your attention to the question as to whether the property belongs to the plantiff or defendants.

[The defendants allege that this property once belonged to Mr. Shubal Williams, who deeded it prior to 1860.] He owned both pieces of property, on the north and on the south, the plaintiff, Grove, on the north, and the defendants on the south; and he sold the piece on the south to John B. Hawthorn, and thence by sundry conveyances the title became vested in A. D. Smith, about 1873, and from Smith to McAlevy. He owned the property on the north that Grove bought.

And they allege that, no matter where the real line may be, Shubal Williams, owning the whole property, and he selling a number of acres to Hawthorn, and he to Smith, under whom McAlevy claims, that he surveyed off a certain piece to Hawthorn, and that being the case that is the line that must govern these pieces.

[I cannot do better, although somewhat out of order, to state succinctly the claim of the defendants, than by reading the defendants' points of law.]

Defendants' first point read and affirmed.
Second point read and affirmed.
Third point read and affirmed.
Fourth point read and affirmed.

[So you will perceive that from the defendants' standpoint their statement of law is correct] provided you believe the evidence as to establishing and marking out the lines upon the ground and building fences.

[But all these points are hypothetically stated, that is, if you believe so and so, and that it is the line claimed to by the defendants. This is all true.]

[To arrive at the facts in this case you have to determine from the evidence whether the line claimed to by Grove is the line run by Williams and Hawthorn. If it is they are entitled to recover.]

That was argued very fully on Saturday, and I have nothing to say upon the probabilities or improbabilities of witnesses being correct.

[It is alleged on the part of the plaintiff that the sons of Shubal Williams are talking about a different fence, and that the fence that Hawthorn and Williams run is not the one the plaintiff claims to now. It is an old fence on which the defendants, Smith or McAlevy, put their fence afterwards. There is some evidence, it may be slight, to be sure, that the fence put on the ground four or five rods north is upon the remains or ruins of the old fence. I say slight, but it is sufficient for you to consider, and as such you will consider it.]

Some other testimony, which is altogether for you, is the testimony of Mr. Lippincott, who appeared on the ground two or three weeks ago, and surveyed this ground. [He took the deed from Williams to Hawthorn; according to the description in that deed he began and made a survey. You heard him describe what he did, and what he found in pursuance of that survey. When he found the courses and distances in this deed, he found marked corners and lines just exactly where these deeds put them.] The deeds were made in 1860, and the agreement in 1851. The witness says the place where the defendants claim to now, namely: on the north, comes, so far as courses and distances are concerned, up to these deeds; and that on the line claimed to by the plaintiff, he found no mark or any line there at all. He found a fence partly rail and partly brush.

It is for you to determine under the conflicting evidence, and under all the evidence, whether the line Hawthorn bought to, and subsequently Smith, and subsequently McAlevy, these defendants, bought, was the line that Mr. Lippincott surveyed, was the line they bought to, and are entitled to maintain and hold in this suit. And as a part of that consideration, you will consider whether the fence put there by McAlevy some time ago, last August or October, is, as the defendants claim, upon the line marked by Williams and Hawthorn. I say nothing about the weight of the evidence; you will consider all the evidence in the case bearing upon that.

It is alleged that these witnesses upon the part of the plaintiff, however truthful they may be about Williams and Hawthorn putting and designating a line, are mistaken about the fence of the plaintiff's being upon that line. But they say that the fence put there by the defendants, was put there on the ruins of the very fence Williams and Hawthorn laid out. The discoveries of Mr. Lippincott, when he surveyed the grounds by courses and distances of that deed, the marks on the ground, the corners and lines, are evidence—you have a right to consider as to whether the fence upon the north is the true line fence, or whether that upon the south is the true line fence.

If you find that the title is in the defendants, then they have committed no trespass, they have done that which they had a right to do, put their fence there, cut down timber and plow up the strawberry patch.

If you find the property is the property of the plaintiff, then you determine the question of damages; and there is a variety of opinions as to the value of his strawberry patch. It consisted of an old bed of plants, which of themselves were not worth very much, and the value consisted mostly in the runners, susceptible of being transplanted. One witness puts the damages at $100 for that and at $200 for the next year's crop. We say to you that the plaintiff cannot recover for the next year's crop.

If you find for the plaintiff, you find what that piece of strawberry patch was worth, not what it was worth to the plaintiff, but what it was worth, lying there, in the market. Then there was some wood and some rails taken away, variously estimated at from $15 to $18.

The question of damages is altogether for you. We simply state to you that when one of these witnesses calls damages for next year's crop, it is not an element to be considered by you. It is just what those strawberry plants were worth, the same as if they were so many oak, pine, or hemlock trees on the ground, provided you find for the plaintiff at all.

If you find for the defendants you have nothing to say as to the amount of damages. If you find for the plaintiff under the evidence, and under the rules we have given you, you find what the plaintiff has reasonably suffered.

The jury returned a verdict for defendants.

The assignments of error specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets; the action of the court in not answering all the plaintiff's points affirmatively without qualification, and in not affirming without qualification plaintiff's points as plaintiff's points; and the whole charge of the court, as being erroneous and misleading, and tending to prejudice the cause of plaintiff in the minds of the jury.

Messrs. Haskins & McClintock and Thomas Roddy, for plaintiff in error:

The charge of the court was prejudicial.

In the second paragraph of the charge the court says: "It seems the defendants were in possession," etc.; when in fact the plaintiff was in possession as is admitted by all parties.

The court also says in the charge: "It is alleged on the part of the plaintiff that the sons of Shubal Williams are talking about a different fence," etc. There was no such allegation or contention by plaintiff, but by the defendants.

Again, the court says: "I cannot do better * * * to state succinctly the claim of the defendants, than by reading the defendants' points of law." The court then immediately follows this by reading and affirming plaintiff's points and then says:

"So you will perceive that from defendants' standpoint their statement of law is correct."

The defendants presented no points.

Messrs. W. R. Bole and J. W. Smith, for defendants in error:

It is true the stenographer's report of the charge makes His Honor call the plaintiff's points, defendants' points. That is as likely to be the stenographer's mistake as the court's. It is probable if such a lapsus linguæ had occurred, the counsel would have corrected it at the time. But, if we concede that the court by inadvertence spoke as the stenographer's notes show, the mistake was too palpable and patent to mislead the jury or injure the plaintiff. The plaintiff's points had been presented and read to the court by counsel; and, the defendants having no points, the jury could not be misled by the court's calling them defendants' points.

Per Curiam:

We have carefully considered all the specifications of error, and find nothing in any of them which will justify a reversal of this judgment. The points submitted were correctly affirmed, and the case was submitted in a correct charge under the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

v.
Ellen LOWE et al.

1. The natural flow of water from a higher to a lower lot can not, as a general rule, give a cause of action to one injured thereby.

2. Plaintiff and defendant owned adjacent lots. Plaintiff's house was close to the line; defendant's thirty-two feet from it. The intervening space was sandy, and sloped from defendant's house to plaintiff's. Plaintiff's cellar was always dry until defendant changed the spouting which had formerly discharged into the street the water from defendant's house, and turned the spouts upon the space between the houses. The water then percolated through the sand and plaintiff's cellar became damp and the house was damaged. Held, that plaintiff had no right of action against defendant for the damage thus caused.

(Argued Feb.——, Decided February 28, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 298, E. D. Error to the Common Pleas of Lycoming County, to review a judgment of compulsory nonsuit in an action of trespass on the case. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before CUMMIN, P. J., were stated in his opinion, overruling a motion to take off the nonsuit, which was as follows:

This was an action to recover damages from the defendants for injuries done to plaintiff's real estate, by reason of the defendants having caused the surplus water from their land to flow on the land of the plaintiff.

When plaintiff closed her case the court directed a nonsuit to be entered, with leave to file a motion to take it off.

The parties to this suit own adjoining lots of land on the west side of Market Street, between the P. & E. R. R. and Fourth Street, in the City of Williamsport. The plaintiff showed this state of facts:

That the land naturally descended from the railroad to Fourth Street; that her lot had a frontage of twenty-six feet, which was nearly all taken up with her dwelling house; that defendants owned the next lot above her, which was fifty-two feet in width; that defendants' house was on the upper part of their lot, leaving an open space on defendants' lot of about thirty-two feet between the houses of the plaintiff and defendants; that the ground about there is of a sandy character and naturally descends towards plaintiff's property; that previous to 1882 plaintiff's cellar had always been dry; that during that year the defendants changed the spouting on their house, which theretofore cast the rain water on the street, so that this water was thereafter cast upon this open space between the houses; that sometime afterwards water was found in plaintiff's cellar after heavy rains, or in the spring when the snow and ice which had accumulated on this open space would melt; that in 1884, at the request of the plaintiff, the defendants changed their spouting so that the water from their roofs was discharged into the back part of their lot; that afterwards the water continued to come into plaintiff's cellar; that the water came into plaintiff's cellar along the bottom of the foundation walls of her house, or about one foot above the bottom of the walls; that plaintiff had, at considerable expense, endeavored in many ways to prevent the water from coming into her cellar, but found it impossible to do so; that plaintiff's dwelling house was damaged, etc.

The theory of plaintiff's counsel was that shortly after the water was permitted to flow from the spouts on this open space it soaked into the ground and worked underground channels into the plaintiff's cellar, and that when the spouts were turned in another direction the rain fall and the melted snow and ice on the open space found its way into these underground channels and thence into the plaintiff's cellar.

On the trial I was of opinion that the evidence did not disclose any unlawful act done by the defendants to the injury of the plaintiff; and after a more careful examination of the evidence in this case and the law on this subject, I find no reason to change my mind.

The assignment of error specified the action of the court in overruling the motion to take off the nonsuit.

Messrs. H. T. Ames and T. H. Hammond, for plaintiff in error:

A motion for nonsuit is equivalent to a demurrer to evidence.

Act of 1874, § 1, P. L. p. 6; Purd. Dig. p. 2054, pl. 12.

A demurrer admits not only the facts stated in evidence, but also every conclusion which the jury might reasonably and fairly infer therefrom.

McKowen v. McDonald, 43 Pa. 441.

The doctrine of dominant and servient tenements, as applied to agricultural lands, extends to city lots. Where several owners of house lots on which houses have been erected, divide them into separate estates, each parcel must take care of the surface water which gathers upon it, without its flowing from the one to the other.

Bentz v. Armstrong, 8 Watts & S. 40.

An adjoining lot owner has no right to turn upon the adjoining lot the water which falls upon his lot in rain, or which arises from a spring. Each lot owner must so regulate and grade his own lot that the water that falls or accumulates upon it shall not run upon the lot of his neighbor.

Bentz v. Armstrong, 8 Watts & S. 40; Kauffman v. Griesemer, 26 Pa. 407.

The defendants had no right to add to the amount which naturally fell on their lot by turning their roof spouts from the street on to their lot and thus increasing the quantity of water.

Kauffman v. Griesemer, supra; Martin v. Riddle, 26 Pa. 415.

A defendant who collects the water from his own land and turns it upon the lands of the plaintiff through an artificial channel made by the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for damages thereby caused.

Miller v. Laubach, 47 Pa. 154; Hays v. Hinkleman, 68 Pa. 324.

It makes no difference in the application of this principle, whether a man digs a ditch and thus throws on to his neighbor's lot water which he has not previously received; or whether one turns cave troughs so as to discharge on his neighbor's lot water which otherwise would not flow there.

The plaintiff is not precluded from recovering because the water accumulated and stood next to plaintiff's house in the depression and soaked or percolated through the soil into the cellar. The gist of the plaintiff's right is the nonfeasance of the defendants. The defendants have no right to permit the accumulation of the water; and if they do, they become responsible for all the consequences of their unlawful act.

In Cooper v. Barber, 3 Taunt. 99, it was held that where A had immemorially had, for watering his land, a channel through his own field, in a porous field, through the banks of which channel, when filled, the water percolated, and thence passed through the contiguous soil of B, below the surface without producing visible injury, and B built a new house on his land below the level of his soil in the current of the percolating water, A could not justify filling his channel with water if the percolating water thereby injured the house of B.

In Curtis v. Eastern R. R. Co. 98 Mass. 428, the railroad company in constructing its road bed had uncovered certain springs of water. To drain the water from these springs, it carried the water under its track, and dug a ditch into the banks, from which the water percolated on to the land of the plaintiff, for which injury he brought suit; and it was held that he could recover, because the defendant had no right to accumulate the water at a point where it would not naturally have gone.

The principle is settled by common-law authorities that if one places water spouts near the plaintiff's land, so that afterwards the water runs thereon, the defendant is liable for the damages caused thereby.

Messrs. H. C. McCormick and S. T. McCormick, for defendants in error:

Where there is no water course by grant or prescription, and no stipulation between conterminous proprietors of land concerning the mode in which respective parcels shall be kept and improved, no right to regulate or control the surface drainage water can be asserted by the owner of one lot over that of his neighbor. The owner of land may occupy it in such manner or for such purpose as he sees fit, either by changing the surface, or by the erection of buildings or other structures thereon; and this right is not restricted or modified by the fact that his own land is so situated in reference to that of adjoining owners that the alterations in the mode of its improvement or occupation, in any portion of it, will cause water which may accumulate thereon by rains or snows falling on its surface or flowing on it from the surface of adjacent lots, either to stand in unusual quantities on other adjacent lands, or pass into and over the same in greater quantities or in other directions than they are accustomed to flow.

Washb. Easm. ed. 1885, p. 311, 489, 503.

In Vanderwiele v. Taylor, 65 N. Y. 341, the parties owned adjoining lots. Defendant's land descended towards plaintiff's so that the surface water flowed from the former to the latter. Plaintiff built upon his land, the wall of the building being upon the line between the lots; this dammed up the surface water, which soaked through the wall into the cellar of the building. Defendant had done nothing on his lot to interfere with the natural flow of the water. There was a sewer in the street adjoining the lots. In the action to recover for the damages caused by the water it was held that the defendant was not bound to drain his lot or connect it with a sewer, and that plaintiff could not recover.

No legal right of any kind can be claimed jure naturæ in the flow of surface water, so that neither its retention, diversion nor repulsion is an actionable injury, even though damage ensue.

Bowlsby v. Speer, 31 N. J. Law, 351.

Where two fields adjoin, but one is lower than the other, the lower must necessarily be subject to the natural flow of water from the upper one. The inconvenience arises from its position and is usually compensated by other circumstances.

Martin v. Riddle, 26 Pa. 415.

No action can be maintained for changing the course or obstructing the flow of mere surface water by erections on adjoining land. It makes no difference in the application of this rule that land is naturally wet and swampy. The conterminous proprietor may change the situation or surface of his land by raising or filling it to a higher grade, by the construction of dikes and erection of structures, and by other improvements which cause water to accumulate from natural causes on adjacent lands and prevent it from passing off from the surface. Such consequences are the necessary result of the lawful appropriation of land, whatever may be its nature; and although they may cause detriment and loss to others, it is damnum absque injuria and forms no ground of action.

Dickinson v. Worcester, 7 Allen, 19; Parks v. Newburyport, 10 Gray, 28; Flagg v. Worcester, 13 Gray, 601.

A municipal corporation is not liable in damages for raising the grade of a street and obstructing the flow of surface water from adjacent higher land.

Hoyt v. City of Hudson, 27 Wis. 656.

An injury caused to a subterranean supply of water by the lawful acts of the owner of the land, resulting in damage to his neighbor, is damnum absque injuria.

Lybes' App. 106 Pa. 626; Wheatly v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528; Haldeman v. Bruckhart, 45 Pa. 514.

Per Curiam:

The evidence of the plaintiff shows that she has no legal cause of action against the defendants. The natural flow of water, from a higher on to a lower lot, cannot as a general rule give a cause of action to one injured thereby. There is nothing proved in this case to take it out of the general rule. There was no error in directing a nonsuit on the unquestioned evidence of the plaintiff.

LUCAS COAL CO., Limited, Plff. in Err.,
v.
HUNT & CONNELL, Limited.

In an action of assumpsit on a book account an affidavit of defense which alleges that the plaintiff had by agreement under seal accepted the promise of a third person, in payment of the debt, must set forth the contract in full.

(Argued Feb. —, Decided March 7, 1887.)

JULY TERM, 1886, No. 81, E. D. Error to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

The plaintiff below, Hunt & Connell, Limited, brought this action on a book account for goods sold and delivered to the defendant below, the Lucas Coal Co., Limited. The copy of the book account filed was not signed by the plaintiff's attorney. A formal narr., containing the common counts in assumpsit, was filed with the copy. On this narr. was noted: "For copy of account see statement hereto attached."

The defendant filed the following affidavit of defense:

"The defendant has a just and full defense to the plaintiffs' claim in this case, the nature and character of which is as follows: The Union Coal Company, Limited, 'assumed' and agreed to pay certain debts of the defendant, among which was the claim of the plaintiffs in this case. This agreement was made in consideration of a lease from the defendant to said Union Coal Company, Limited, of the Lucas Colliery and property appurtenant thereto.

"In October, 1884 (the contract does not recite the day of the month), the plaintiff and other creditors of the defendant whose claims were assumed as aforesaid, signed, executed and delivered a contract under seal to said Union Company wherein and whereby the plaintiff agreed to accept payment of the claim which is the subject matter of this suit of the said Union Coal Company, Limited. And the said contract recited as the consideration thereof the agreement of said Union Coal Company, Limited, to pay said indebtedness; and the said plaintiff then agreed to collect the claim demanded in this suit of the said Union Coal Company, Limited, and to accept the agreement of the said Union Coal Company, Limited, in the place and in lieu of the contract and indebtedness of the defendant to the plaintiff; all of which was then consented to, accepted and orally agreed upon by the defendant, by the plaintiff and by said Union Coal Company, Limited, as your deponent verily believes.

"And your deponent is informed and believes that by said agreement a novation of contract was effected and the defendant was released and discharged from the payment of said indebtedness.

"All of which they and your deponent expect to be able to prove on the trial of this case.

"And your deponent is informed and believes that the copy filed in this case is not properly certified by counsel."

The court, HAND, P. J., saying that the contract alleged was not set forth fully and no reason given why it was not, entered judgment for the plaintiffs for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense; and this was assigned as error.

Messrs. S. B. Price and James W. Oakford, for plaintiff in error:

In a suit upon a book account, the copy filed should bear a certificate, signed by plaintiff's counsel upon its face or indorsed in his handwriting, that it is a copy.

The agreement between the parties to this suit was and is alleged in the affidavit to have been an oral contract. The Lucas Company did not rely upon the written agreements mentioned in the affidavit, between the Union Company and the Lucas Company, nor the lease. They were matters of inducement leading to the oral contract between the three parties; which effected the novation and released the Lucas Company from the claim demanded in this suit.

If, in an affidavit of defense, the defendant does rely upon a written agreement and sets forth the legal effect thereof, that ought to be sufficient.

The reason why judgment was allowed in Marsh v. Marshall, 53 Pa. 396, was that the affidavit set forth the contract defectively; in Birkey v. Whitaker, 4 W. N. C. 137, because the contract was neither set forth nor a copy attached.

In a special count upon a written contract, if the legal effect of the agreement is given, it is sufficient.

1 Chitty, Pl. 306, 14th Am. ed.

If A owes B, and C agrees with A that he will pay B, and B agrees with C that he will accept his promise in lieu of A's indebtedness, and the three parties consent to this arrangement, a novation is thus effected. Novation is the substitution of a new obligation for an old one. The old debt is extinguished—it is an accord executed.

In an affidavit of defense the facts should not be set forth in any equivocal or evasive manner, but with reasonable precision, so that the plaintiff may be accurately advised of the true nature of the defense, if any exists."

Noble v. Kreuzkamp, 1 Cent. Rep. 872.

The affidavit must be construed most favorably for the plaintiff, as it is altogether probable that the defendant will in all cases state the nature and character of the defense as strongly as the facts will justify.

The defendant must state his facts so as to be liable to an indictment for perjury if his statements are untrue.

Parol agreements intended to vary written instruments must be set out in the affidavit of defense with much particularity; and none of the allegations required to make them effective must be omitted. There should be some explanation or reason given for a departure from the usual course of business.

Biddle v. Wilhelm, 40 Legal Int. 382.

An affidavit which attempts to set up a parol contract different from that disclosed by the writing, amounted to a contradiction of the same, and was inadmissible without also averring fraud or mistake.

Hains v. Rapp, 2 W. N. C. 595; Hill v. Gaw, 4 Pa. 493.

The very purpose of authorizing judgment to be given for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense is to save the necessity of a trial which can only result unfavorably to the defendant.

Black v. Halstead, 39 Pa. 71.

The affidavit must be a specific statement of facts, not inferences, and the court is to judge of the legal effect of the facts stated.

Mitchell, Motions and Rules, 66, Endlich, § 347.

Filing a copy of the book account is sufficient certification. The filing of an affidavit of defense to the merits is a waiver of mere formal objections; Laird v. Campbell, 8 W. N. C. 134; even if the objections were otherwise pertinent.

Per Curiam:

The alleged written contract sustains so important a relation to the defense of the defendant below that we think the learned judge committed no error in holding that it should have been fully set forth in the affidavit of defense.

Judgment affirmed.

Thomas W. McANDREW and Wife, In Right of Said Wife.

1. In a feigned issue to try the ownership of the promissory note of a third person, claimed to have been delivered by a decedent as a gift to the holder, it is for the jury to determine whether facts exist showing that the holder took advantage of the gift under circumstances of dependence, feebleness, sickness or possible shame, on the part of the donor, such as amount to undue influence and deprive the transaction of voluntariness and freedom on the part of the donor and of perfect candor between the parties.
2. Evidence of want of undue influence and of the delivery of the note held sufficient to submit to the jury.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 54, E. D.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiffs in a feigned issue, to try the ownership of a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts, as they appeared at the trial before

HAND, P. J., were stated in his charge to the jury, which was as follows:

This trial is called a feigned issue. It is a trial to determine the ownership of a note, given by John Handley to James Morahan, dated the 22d day of September, 1882, for $1,726.68, on which there is a balance unpaid of about $1,054.95.

Ordinarily this note would belong to the estate of James Morahan, and should pass to the custody of his administrator. But it is alleged by these plaintiffs that it belongs to Rebecca McAndrew, the wife of Thomas McAndrew, by reason of a gift on the part of James Morahan, while he was living, called a gift inter vivos; that is, a gift between living persons.

This, gentlemen of the jury, is the sole question for you to determine: Was this note a gift absolute to Rebecca McAndrew?

It is alleged that about the 8th of January, 1884, James Morahan gave the note to her, under circumstances as detailed by Mrs. Fannie Gross; that this was a gift, as testified to by her, is corroborated by the testimony of P. C. Clark. This transaction occurred a little over a month before the death of Morahan; he died about the 18th of February, 1884.

It is alleged by the defendant that it was not a gift in law, or if it was, that it was made under such circumstances of undue influence, or duress, as to constitute it an inequitable transaction; such a transaction as equity would not allow to be consummated, but will set aside as being unconscionable.

Now, under this simple, sole issue, you will give your close consideration to all of the testimony in the case, and determine it as the evidence shall warrant you. You will render no verdict in this case for any amount of money. The question of compensation for the keeping and board of James Morahan is not before us. It is only: To whom does this note belong? If it belongs to Rebecca McAndrew, your verdict should be simply for the plaintiff; if it does not belong to Rebecca McAndrew, your verdict should be simply for the defendant.

If your verdict should be for the defendant, it does not prevent the plaintiff, T. W. McAndrew, from obtaining his proper compensation upon his bill presented to the administrator.

Now, to the question: Does this note belong to Rebecca McAndrew? The law on this subject you must take from the court; the determination of the fact is for you, under the rules of law.

In Pennsylvania there is no doubt that a person may give a note, or a chose in action, to another person. After the donor is dead, clear and satisfactory proof of the gift (and of the delivery in pursuance of it) is requisite.

Now, what is the evidence in this case? The evidence mainly turns upon the testimony of Fannie Gross, so far as the plaintiffs' allegations are concerned, as they claim, corroborated by P. C. Clark. We will read that evidence; she testified to about the same on cross examination, repeating it. The question was asked her: "I wish you would go on and state what was said." That was at the time that McAndrew, his wife and Morahan were present. Mrs. Gross answered: "Well, my mother told him she would rather have him go; that she didn't want to keep him; there were a great many of the boarders told her they would not stay if she kept him. So they were having a talk about it that day, and he says: 'Well, here,' he says, 'I will give you this paper to pay you for your trouble, and take good care of me while I am sick.' He said, 'I give it to you.'"

Q. "Just repeat again what he said." A. "He says: 'You take this and take care of it, it is yours;' and he says: 'Take good care of me while I am sick.' She told him she would rather not take him; she would rather he would go; she would rather not keep him at all."

P. C. Clark, who was sworn, testified: "He told me (that is Morahan told him) Mrs. McAndrew had objections to keeping him in her house, and that he would have to leave, and he gave her compensation for the necessary trouble."

We read this testimony because it is the main testimony, but not to withdraw any other facts from your consideration which throw any light upon this transaction.

[Now, did Mr. Morahan intend to give to Mrs. McAndrew this note absolutely? And did he deliver it to her as a gift?] If he did, then the plaintiffs can recover. If he did not intend it as a gift, but only as a security in her hands for the board and keeping that was due to her and her husband, out of which her husband could obtain his compensation, then it was not a gift, but to secure the proper and legal compensation for the keeping of Morahan.

[There is some evidence in the case, and its effect is for you, that this note was in the possession of Morahan at the time of his death; that it went into the possession of Mrs. Morahan, and that she delivered it, after his death, to McAndrew, who claimed that he was the executor of Morahan, and should receive it. This evidence, if you believe it, is somewhat corroborated by the evidence of Miss Gannon, that McAndrew said, in the presence of his wife, that this note belonged to the estate of Morahan, and that her mother should receive her share of it in the settlement of the estate, after McAndrew had settled up the estate, he stating at the time that there was a will, and that he was the executor of it.]

There is also evidence that McAndrew did not consider the note as compensation for the keeping of Morahan, by his presenting a bill for his keeping to the administrator, and receiving part pay of the bill from the administrator. This part is not in dispute—the effect of this evidence, on the question of a gift or not, is for you, all to be taken in connection with the evidence on the part of the plaintiffs.

You will understand that in order to consummate the gift, there must be an intention to pass it, to give it to the donee; and there must be actual delivery of it to the donee.

Now, if you believe the evidence that the note was subsequent to that in the possession of Morahan, it would show that it was not in the possession of Mrs. McAndrew. We speak of this because it is a circumstance testified to in the case. And the evidence must be clear and satisfactory that a chose in action was not only intended to be given, but was actually given, and the possession passed over to the donee.

Another part of this investigation is, Was this transaction, under all the circumstances, a voluntary gift made without undue influence? If it was not, then the plaintiffs cannot recover.

It is not that Morahan was of unsound mind, memory or understanding, but was the note obtained under such circumstances as to constitute undue influence? Or such circumstances as would make it wrong for the plaintiffs to keep the note?

It is in evidence that at the time of this transaction Morahan was more or less of feeble body; that he was sick with a loathsome and unrighteous disease; that he had boarded some time with McAndrew and his wife; that he had no home to go to; that McAndrew and wife were about to deny him board and keeping at their house, because of his condition; and that under these circumstances he did that which he would not, and ought not to have done, if left free, and with his full judgment in play.

Now, where facts exist showing that a person takes advantage of a gift under circumstances of dependence, feebleness, sickness, and possibly shame, on the part of the donor, such as to amount to undue influence, and deprive the transaction of voluntariness and freedom on the part of the donor, and of perfect candor between both parties, equity prevents the donee from securing any benefit from the transaction. * * *

[In order to apply this principle of equity in this case, do you find from the evidence that such circumstances exist? Now, these circumstances and these facts are for you to find; that is, it is for you to determine whether the evidence proves them. If you find that they do exist, then the plaintiffs cannot recover. It will be inequitable for the plaintiff to recover if she obtained this gift under undue influence.]

In other words, when a gift is set up after the death of the giver, the evidence must be clear and satisfactory.

The plaintiffs asked the court to charge, inter alia:

"That if the jury believe the testimony of Fannie Gross, the giving of the note by Morahan to Mrs. McAndrew was an executed gift."

Ans. We leave that question of fact for you. We cannot decide that. It is for you to determine, under all the evidence, whether this was an executed gift. If you find from the evidence that it was an executed gift, then it was good and your verdict should be for the plaintiffs. But whether it was an executed gift or not is the real question in the case.

As we look at this case it is a question of fact for the jury, to be determined under all the light that is thrown upon the case from the evidence before you. The evidence has been very ably argued before you on both sides, and brought to your attention specifically; it is for you to weigh it carefully and determine what this transaction was. If it was not a gift to Mrs. McAndrew, or if it was under such circumstances that equity would not enforce it on the principles we have laid down, then the verdict should be for the defendant.

The verdict and judgment were for the plaintiffs.

The assignments of error specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets, the answer of the court to the plaintiffs' second point, the admission of the testimony of Fannie Gross and the submission of the question of delivery.

Messrs. W. G. Ward, George S. Horn and Herman Osthaus, pro. per., for plaintiff in error:

The evidence shows that the parties were talking about Morahan either going from McAndrew's or continuing with them, and of pay or compensation for the same. The board and care spoken of was the property of the husband. The wife's labor, etc., belonged to the husband. The compensation or pay for the board and care that was to be afforded to Morahan would belong to the husband.

The evidence tended toward proving a contract with T. W. McAndrew, but in no manner toward establishing a benefaction to Mrs. McAndrew.

There was not sufficient evidence in the case to warrant submitting to the jury the question whether Mr. Morahan intended to give to Mrs. McAndrew the note absolutely, and whether he delivered it to her as a gift.

The doctrine that a scintilla of evidence of a disputed fact must be submitted to the jury is exploded,

The improvidence of the transaction under all the circumstances furnishes a probable test of undue influence or fraud.

Harvey v. Mount, 8 Beav. 439.

That one was anxious to part with his property without receiving an equivalent, and was not in any way biased or influenced by the person with whom the transaction was made, may relieve the latter from the charge of having used actual fraud and artifice, but it shows the incapacity of the former in the strongest colors, and heightens the presumption of that species of fraud which consists in taking advantage of imbecility, ignorance, dependency or necessity.

Doughty v. Doughty, 3 Halst. Ch. 227; Torrey v. Buck, 1 Green, Ch. 367.

Fraud which is dolus malus may be actual, arising from facts and circumstances of imposition, or may be apparent from the intrinsic nature and subject of the bargain itself, or may be presumed from the circumstances and condition of the parties contracting.

Earl of Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. Sr. 155–156.

As to what amounts to undue influence is a question for the judge to decide, upon the circumstances of each particular case and such circumstances as the nonintervention of a disinterested person, or professional adviser on the behalf of the donor, especially if the donor is, from age or sickness or weakness of disposition, likely to be imposed upon.

Griffiths v. Robins, 3 Madd. 191; Dent v. Bennett, 4 Mylne & Cr. 278; Harvey v. Mount, 8 Beav. 439; Greenfield's Est. 14 Pa. 505–507; Miskey's App. 107 Pa. 611; Darlington's App. 86 Pa. 512.

The conscience of a judge, as chancellor, must be satisfied; and what goes to the jury is to determine the credibility of the witnesses, and to weigh and decide upon the force and effect of conflicting testimony. If the evidence is too vague, uncertain, or doubtful to establish the equity set up, even if believed, it is the duty of the judge to withdraw it from the jury, either by nonsuit or a binding direction in his charge, as the case may be.

Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. 442.

The verdict of a jury in an equity case is always upon a feigned issue—as it is in this case, and is not binding upon the court; when the court is dissatisfied with the verdict, it may disregard it and decide the case contrary to the verdict, when, in the opinion of the court, the case should be so decided; and that, too, without sending the case to another jury.

Mr. John F. Connolly, for defendants in error.

Per Curiam:

The evidence of the alleged gift of the note, and of the delivery thereof, was amply sufficient to submit to the jury. This question, as well as those relating to feebleness of mind of the donor, and undue influence on him, were sent to the jury in a clear and correct charge. We see no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

REDSTONE COKE CO., Limited, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Isaac G. ROBY.

A mining boss, under the Act of April 28, 1877, is a fellow servant with the miners; and if he was selected with reasonable care, his employers are not liable in damages to miners for injuries resulting from an explosion of fire damp caused by his negligence.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 223, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Fayette County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of trespass on the case for personal injuries. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The assignments of error were as follows:

"1. The court erred in refusing defendant's first point, which point is as follows: Under all the evidence in this case, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and the verdict must be for the defendant.

"2. The court erred in refusing defendant's eighth point, which point is as follows: If the jury believe from the testimony that there were no explosive gases or fire damp known in defendant's mines, prior to the day of the explosion, which caused plaintiff's injuries, the defendant was not compelled to have every working place in said mine carefully examined every morning with a safety lamp by a competent person, before any workmen were allowed to enter.

"3. The court erred in not charging the jury fully on the law applicable to the facts of the case.

"4. The court erred in not directing a verdict for the defendant after affirming defendant's fourth point, which point is as follows: That notice to the mining boss of gas in the mine was no notice to the Company; and if the jury believe that the explosion occurred and the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of said mining boss, the defendant company would not be responsible, and the plaintiff cannot recover; and defendant's seventh point, which point is as follows: That under the Act of Assembly, it was the duty of the mining boss to keep a careful watch over the ventilating apparatus, and to see that the mine was properly ventilated, and his neglect or failure to do so would not render the defendant company liable."

Messrs. Boyle & Mestrezat, for plaintiff in error:

There was no testimony tending to establish negligence on the part of the defendant below. It is error to submit to a jury a question of fact of which there is no evidence or of which there is no sufficient evidence to support a verdict.

Raby v. Cell, 85 Pa. 82; Egbert v. Payne, 99 Pa. 244; Stouffer v. Latshaw, 2 Watts, 165.

The defendant company was not required to have this mine examined every morning before the workmen entered. This is required only in mines generating fire damp.

Act of April 18, 1877, § 4, P. L. 58.

The mining boss is employed to keep a careful watch over the ventilating apparatus, the air ways, etc., to measure the air current at least once a week, at the inlet and outlet, and at or near the face of the heading and report the same to the inspector of the district, once in every month, etc.

Act of April 18, 1877, P. L. 58.

Mine owners or operators are not presumed to have sufficient practical knowledge to manage the inside workings; and hence the law requires them to employ a competent person for that purpose. If the person thus employed is not competent, it is the duty of the miner to so notify the superintendent or mine owner. If, however, due care is used in his selection—and that is presumed until the contrary is shown, Mansfield Coal etc. Co. v. McEnery, 91 Pa. 191—the mine owner is not responsible for his mistakes or negligence.

A mining boss under the Act of 1877 is a fellow servant with the miners and laborers, and for his negligence the employer is not responsible.

Reese v. Biddle, 2 Cent. Rep. 799, 112 Pa. 72; Waddell v. Simoson, 3 Cent. Rep. 176, 112 Pa. 567; Del. & Hud. Canal Co. v. Carroll, 89 Pa. 381.

The court below affirmed defendant's fourth point, that if the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of the mining boss he could not recover, and his seventh point, that it was the duty of the mining boss to see that the mine was properly ventilated. This should have taken the case from the jury.

Duncan v. Madara, 16 W. N. C. 93.

The plaintiff was entitled to a clear and distinct instruction on the rule of law applicable to his case; and it was error in the court either to omit to give it, or to do it in so imperfect a manner that the jury might be misled or left uninformed on the law.

Slaymaker v. St. John, 5 Watts, 32; Garrett v. Jackson, 20 Pa. 336.

The answer to the points put by counsel of parties is not a sufficient statement of the law. Litigants have a right to expect the court, who is learned in the law, to state the law applicable to the facts of the case in his general charge. In no other way can the law be placed so clearly before the jury. In no other way can it be faithfully administered.

Cauffman v. Long, 82 Pa. 80.

Mr. R. H. Lindsey, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff below was injured by an explosion of gas in the mine where he was working, and brought this suit against the mine owners to recover compensation for the injuries thus received.

Under the instructions of the court the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. It seems difficult to understand how they reached this result in view of the answer of the court to defendant's points, most of which were affirmed without qualification. The first point, however, was refused. It was "That under all the evidence in this case the plaintiff is not entitled to recover."

It was alleged on the part of the plaintiff that the defendant did not furnish proper ventilation for the mine; and if we are to measure its responsibility by the results we would have little difficulty in arriving at a conclusion.

It has been held in a number of recent cases that the mine owners are not responsible for the negligence of their mining boss. Reese v. Biddle, 2 Cent. Rep. 799, 112 Pa. 72; Waddell v. Simoson, 3 Cent. Rep. 176, 112 Pa. 567.

Reasonable care must be exercised in selecting a competent person for such position; but when such care has been exercised the cases are clear that the company employing him is not liable for his negligence. This results necessarily from the Act of April 28, 1877, P. L. 58, which imposes upon the company the duty of providing a mining boss.

This Act was passed, as its title shows, to protect the health and safety of the persons employed in the bituminous coal mines, and is a wise and just measure. The one great danger of such mining operations has always been the accumulation of foul air and gases; and it was to avoid this and secure proper ventilation that the fifth section of the Act requires the mine owner, nolens volens "to employ a competent and practical inside overseer to be called a mining boss," etc.

The section then proceeds to define his duties, the principal of which is to see that the mine is kept properly ventilated. The mining boss is therefore a creature of the Legislature, selected by the mine owner in obedience to the command of the law, and in the interest and for the protection of the miners themselves. It has therefore been properly held that where the mine owners have exercised reasonable care in the selection of a competent mining boss, they are not liable for injuries resulting from his negligence. His coemployees take the risk of his negligence, precisely as in other cases. If he is incompetent or careless, they can at once discover it and notify the superintendent; while the owners, with every wish to protect the miners, have no such opportunities of information.

It is very plain, as was held in Waddell v. Simoson, supra, that the operator of a coal mine fulfills the measure of his duty to his employees if he commits his work to careful and skillful bosses and superintendents, who conduct the same to the best of their skill and ability. More than this he cannot do; and with such duty performed, whatever of risk or danger remains must rest upon the miners themselves. Their work is always hazardous with the best appliances and the highest degree of care. Their own safety requires that in measuring responsibility for accidents care should be taken to determine it justly, with due regard to the respective rights and duties of the parties, employers and employed.

If the explosion by which the plaintiff was injured was the result of negligence, it was the negligence of the mining boss. The ventilation of the mine was his special duty, made so by the express language of the Act of Assembly. At the time of his injury the plaintiff was driving a flat heading from the slope, and had driven it about 350 feet. It was alleged that there was no way of getting air to the place where he was working, except what might be produced from the burning of his torch, or the passage of a mule wagon. The explosion was caused by the open lamp of the plaintiff coming in contact with the "black damp" that had accumulated in the mine. It was alleged that no examination of the mine was regularly made with a safety lamp, and that no proper measurements were made of the air currents. If we regard these allegations as established by the verdict, it only proves the mining boss to have been negligent; of which fact the miners themselves had ample means of knowledge, while the owners had none.

The first specification of error is sustained. This renders a discussion of the other unnecessary.

Judgment reversed.

COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania.

1. On a motion for a reargument the

2. An ex parte affidavit, made after the judgment is affirmed, will not be considered.

(Filed March 14, 1887.)

MOTION for reargument of a writ of error to the Oyer and Terminer of Juniata County, to review a conviction of murder in the first degree. Refused.

The original opinion affirming the judgment below, is reported in 5 Central Reporter, p. 887.

On a motion for reargument (Messrs. B. F. Junkin and George Jacobs appearing for the motion), the affidavit of Dwight Mead, made since the judgment was affirmed, was presented.

On the trial Mead testified, in substance, that he met the defendant in Harrisburg, at 9 o'clock A. M. on the day of his wife's death, and the defendant then told him that his wife was dead, and that he, the defendant, had received a telegram to that effect. As a fact, the defendant could not have received any communication about it at that time in the day.

The affidavit presented on the reargument was to the effect that the affiant believed that he was mistaken as to the time of day when he met the defendant and conversed with him as stated in his testimony; that he was now convinced that it could not have been earlier than 11 or 12 o'clock.

The motion for a reargument was disposed of as follows, February 21, 1887:

Per Curiam: A majority of the justices being opposed to a reargument of the case, it is refused.

On March 14, 1887, the following opinion was filed:

Per Curiam:

It is proper to say that our action in refusing the motion for a reargument of this case was based solely upon what appears in the record of the court below, and not upon anything that has occurred since the trial in that court.

The ex parte affidavit of Dwight Mead, made since the judgment was affirmed, to the effect that, in his testimony on the trial, he was mistaken as to the time he met the prisoner in Harrisburg on the morning of his wife's death, etc., was not considered, for the reason that it is not a part of the record that was before us for review.

Error to the Common Pleas of Fayette County, to review a judgment on a verdict directed for the defendant in an action of assumpsit. Reversed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before INGHRAM, J., are stated in the opinion.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in giving binding instructions to the jury to find for the defendant, and in not instructing the jury to find for the plaintiff.

Messrs. John Collins and Edward Campbell, for plaintiff in error:

The delivery of a deed is of itself sufficient to form a consideration for a promise to pay the consideration money.

An action for damages may be maintained against a vendor of real estate for the breach of a parol sale; but even then only nominal damages can be recovered, unless money has been paid, or expenses incurred.

Thompson v. Sheplar, 72 Pa. 165.

But the case at bar is not an action to recover damages for a breach of the parol agreement.

John Richey had a right to a clear and indisputable title. That such is the law in Pennsylvania is settled by numerous decisions.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

We cannot understand why, in this case, the court below gave binding instructions to the jury to find for the defendant. The evidence, had it been submitted, warranted, as we think, a verdict for the plaintiff. By this we mean that, had there been such a submission and a verdict for the plaintiff, the evidence would have justified the court in refusing a new trial.

By articles of agreement dated March 15, 1878, Freed, the plaintiff, agreed to sell to Jacob J. Slonecker twenty acres of land in Bullskin Township, Fayette County, in consideration of which Slonecker agreed to pay Freed $2,100 in cash, and to convey to John and Jacob Richey a house and lot which he claimed to own in the Village of Pennsville.

The evidence on part of the plaintiff further shows that, in consideration of the conveyance as above stated, John Richey agreed to pay to the plaintiff $1,100, to be secured by his note at one year. This deed, according to Slonecker's testimony, was duly executed and delivered as directed by the said John Richey, so that nothing remained to be done to fully complete the contract between the parties, but to make the payment of the $1,100, the purchase money of the house and lot, payable to Freed. This, then, is the plaintiff's case, and we are at a loss to know why it should not have been submitted to the jury.

We cannot agree with the counsel for the defendant that the contract was within the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries, for the entire transaction, except that part of it which related to the payment of the purchase money of the said house and lot, was reduced to writing. As to this, we held in Tripp v. Bishop, 56 Pa. 424, and more recently in the case of Baum v. Tonkin, 1 Cent. Rep. 638, that the statute does not require an agreement for purchase money to be in writing.

As to the disposition of this purchase money; that it was to be paid to Freed can certainly not operate to defeat the plaintiff's action, for the execution and delivery of the deed were consideration sufficient to support the defendant's assumption to pay that money to the plaintiff. It is said, however, that Slonecker's title was good for nothing, hence, the consideration for the promise failed. But this was met by the counter allegation that Richey agreed to take what title Slonecker had, and to run the risk of its validity. Moreover, it was said that that was a matter with which Freed had nothing to do; that at all events he was to have his purchase money, and that Richey was to look to Slonecker for any damages resulting from a defect of title.

Upon these matters we refrain from comment; they can only be determined by a jury, and we are not disposed by our opinion to anticipate or forestall the action of that body.

The judgment is reversed, and a new venire ordered.

APPEAL OF David FREY, Re Estate of Sarah Frey, Deceased.

The power of the orphans' court to set aside a sale of real estate, made in pursuance of its own order, rests within the sound discretion of the court; and its exercise, as a general rule, will not be reviewed unless the record shows palpable and gross abuse.

(Decided February 28, 1887.)

APPEAL from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Lehigh County, dismissing exceptions and confirming an administrator's sale of land for the payment of debts. Affirmed.

From the record and the depositions the following facts appeared:

Sarah Frey died October 25, 1884, leaving to survive her David Frey, her husband, H. W. Hunsicker, James F. Hunsicker, F. P. Hunsicker, Owen Hunsicker and Mary, intermarried with George J. Koch, children begotten with a former husband, and Oscar J. Frey, a child begotten with David Frey. She died seised of a small tract of land. The inventory of her personalty amounted to $21.50. Her debts were two mortgages to Tilghman Mertz, each of $1,000 aggregating with interest about $2,200, the funeral expenses, administration expenses and other debts amounting to about $500. On January 30, 1885, letters of administration were issued to David Frey, who assumed the office of administrator, filed his bond and entered upon his duties.

April 18, 1885, an order for the sale of the real estate was issued to him. In pursuance of it, he advertised the property for sale on August 1, 1885.

About the time of the sale it was rumored in the neighborhood that besides the liens of the two mortgages in favor of Tilghman Mertz each of $1,000, there was also a lien of $700 in favor of the heirs of Owen Hunsicker, a former husband of the deceased, and it was alleged that in consequence of this report persons who had intended to bid on the property were deterred from so doing. Israel Sensinger was one of this number.

The Hunsickers, by George J. Koch, a brother-in-law and their agent, bid $2,600. More could not be obtained, and after a long trial to obtain more, and after much consultation and, as was alleged, upon the promise of the Hunsicker heirs that they would pay all the debts of Sarah Frey, funeral expenses included, David Frey, the administrator, consented to strike down the property to them, and made his return accordingly.

The Hunsicker heirs, however, refused to pay or to give their promise in writing to pay the debts of the deceased. Thereupon exceptions setting up inadequacy of price and the failure of the Hunsicker heirs to comply with their alleged agreement were filed, a rule to take depositions was entered, depositions were taken and a bond, signed and sealed by Elias Frey and Reuben Semmel, to bid $3,000 at a resale of the property, was offered to be filed.

Upon the question of the value of the property the testimony was conflicting, two of the witnesses testifying that $2,600, the price for which it was sold, was a full, fair and adequate price for the same, while the others fix the value at about $3,000.

After the sale and before exceptions were filed thereto, the purchaser, in pursuance of an agreement with the administrator, the appellant, expended money and made improvements upon the property.

The court below, ALBRIGHT, P. J., dismissed the exceptions and confirmed the sale, and this was assigned as error.

Messrs. Edwin H. Stine and E. S. Schwartz, for appellant:

Until the sale is confirmed, the heirs may seek for purchasers who will give more, and may ask the court to open the biddings and offer the property at auction again, and the court may order a resale. Hamilton's Est. 51 Pa. 58.

Brown's App. 68 Pa. 53.

The orphans' court may set aside a sale of real estate for mere inadequacy of price; but the inadequacy must be a material one, existing at the time of sale, and the application must be promptly made.

Breese's Est. 2 Kulp, 62.

A sale by a master in chancery will be set aside if a higher price be offered; until confirmation the bid is merely deemed an offer to purchase, subject to the approval of the court.

Baptist Church v. Bailee, 29 Pittsb. Legal J. 20.

Gross inadequacy of price, if accompanied by other matter of equity is ground for setting aside a sale.

Twells v. Conrad, 2 W. N. C. 30. See also Whitaker v. Birkey, 2 W. N. C. 476.

In Haslage's Appeal, 37 Pa. 440, the supreme court has said that "An appeal taken hereafter on such grounds will not be entertained without a special allocatur."

That, however, was a case purely of inadequacy of price. Besides, the supreme court has since entertained the matter brought up in Hamilton's Estate, 51 Pa. 58, and Brown's Appeal, 68 Pa. 53, and probably other matters, on almost the same grounds.

The Act of June 16, 1836, § 1, gives this court authority to review "all and all manner of pleas, complaints and causes which shall be brought or removed here from any other court by virtue of any process issued by this court or any judge thereof, and to correct all and all manner of error" in their proceedings.

Mr. John Rupp, for George Koch, appellee:

This appeal was entered without a special allocatur, and therefore should be quashed.

Haslage's App. 37 Pa. 440.

The power of the orphans' court to set aside a sale of real estate, made in pursuance of its own order, rests within the sound discretion of the court, and its exercise as a general rule will not be reviewed unless the record shows palpable and gross abuse.

Per Curiam:

This case shows no such abuse of the equitable powers of the court as to call for a reversal. No such palpable error is shown as to induce us to overrule the exercise of the sound discretion of the court.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellant.

SCHOOL DISTRICT OF ARCHBALD BOROUGH.

1. Where one board of school directors, duly elected and qualified, is acting as such and performing the duties of the office, another de facto board cannot exist.
2. Contracts made with a pretended de facto board do not bind the school district.

(Argued Feb.—, Decided March 7, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 76, E. D. Error to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

Proceedings involving the rights of this school board were before this court in Gilroy's App. 100 Pa. 5; Gilroy v. Commonwealth, 105 Pa. 484, and Gilroy v. Jones, Simpson & Co., No. 197, July Term, 1882, not reported.

The facts, as they appeared at the trial before HAND, P. J., were stated in his charge to the jury, which was as follows:

Under the view that is pressed upon the court, by the counsel for the defendant, the court feels that the responsibility of this case is with them. We would be very glad to relieve ourselves of it, but it is one of those duties which is incumbent upon the court; and we will have to dispose of the case, therefore, in a formal charge, and direct a verdict for the defendant.

In order that our views may be understood (and so if any wrong is done to the plaintiff he may have that corrected) we will briefly state our views of the case.

The action of this case is founded upon a claim, that the board of school directors of the Borough of Archbald, called the Gilroy Board, was a de facto board; and as such their acts were binding, so far as regards this plaintiff, to such an extent as to hold the District responsible for his services as a school teacher in that district.

The case involves a decision on the part of this court, under the undisputed evidence of the case, of the question as to whether, as between the Miller Board and the Gilroy Board, the Gilroy Board was a de facto board. The evidence in this case, so far as it affects it, down to June, 1881, is the same as was adduced in the case of the quo warranto, and we therefore reach, under the evidence, the conclusion the same as we did there, that in June, 1881, the board called the Miller Board was the de jure board, the only lawful board in existence. This board, under the undisputed evidence in the case, organized in June, 1881, and, as an organization, was lawful. This organization in the successive years, down and through the year 1883 and '4 under the evidence in this case, was a de jure board, the individual officers changing from time to time, either by the expiration of their term or by resignation, but not to such an extent as to destroy the character of the board as an organization as a lawful board.

It is possible, that, upon a technical examination, one or more members of the board, individually, might not be found qualified to hold the office, but, as a board, and as an organization, its de jure character remained intact down to and throughout the year 1883.

If we are right in this view, the only other question of law and fact is, Did this board from 1881, down to 1883, act in its organized capacity, as a board of school directors for the Borough of Archbald? Under the undisputed evidence in this case, we feel compelled to reach the conclusion that it did. The character of the evidence is such that it does not rest upon the credibility of witnesses; but it is of the same character as that testimony which was adduced in the quo warranto case, upon which we decided the same fact; hence, it follows that the question of a rival board, beginning in 1881, unlawfully, and continuing down to the year 1883, being a de facto board does not arise in the case; and consequently, inasmuch as the plaintiff holds his office and founds his claim upon the acts of this Board, he cannot recover.

We are asked to charge you upon several points. We will read them and answer them in order to preserve the rights of the parties.

[The court first answers the defendant's points, and then the plaintiff's which were, inter alia, these:]

6. "If the men who employed the plaintiff were de facto officers, and the jury believe the evidence of the employment contract and services of White for the time he was employed, their verdict should be for the plaintiff for $675, with interest from the first day of June, 1884."

Ans. Under the facts in this case we answer this in the negative.

7. "The Act of 1883, upon which the order of court for the election in 1883 was made, is unconstitutional; and those holding under ward elections for 1883–4, to wit: the 'Miller Board', were not legal directors."

Ans. It is not necessary for us to decide, in this case, whether the Act of 1883 is constitutional or not. We therefore decline to charge as requested.

8. "The voters of the School District of the Borough of Archbald, could not legally vote by wards for school directors in 1883. The provisions of the Acts of Assembly relating to the election of school directors by wards were not complied with in the proceedings purporting to establish ward elections for school directors in that Borough."

Ans. It is not necessary for us to decide this question in this case; and therefore we decline to affirm this point.

Under this view of the court, you will render a verdict for the defendant.

Verdict and judgment accordingly.

The assignments of error specified the answers to the points quoted, the direction to find for the defendant, and the ruling that the organization of the Miller Board in 1882 was legal, and they were the de jure board.

Messrs. S. B. Price and James W. Oakford, for plaintiff in error:

An officer de facto seems to be a person who is such by color of election, although ineligible or although the office was not vacant.

M'Gargell v. Hazelton Coal Co. 4 Watts & S. 424.

Lord Ellenborough defines an officer de facto as one who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, and yet is not a good officer in point of law.

When a person holds an office by color of right he is an officer de facto.

Dill. Mun. Corp. 676, § 716; 243, § 114.

As a general rule it may be stated that not only when the corporate power resides in a select body as a city council, but where it has been delegated to a committee or to agents, then in the absence of special provisions otherwise, a minority of the select body, or of the committee or agents, are powerless to bind the majority or do any valid act.

Dill. Mun. Corp. 247, § 221.

The doctrine of the court below in this case appears to be that when there is a contest over municipal officers the public must deal with the de jure officers or their contracts are void.

If this is the law, then whenever there is a contest over municipal office the business of the corporation must stop until a decision is reached.

As to the attempt to enjoin the Gilroy Board, see Gilroy's App. 100 Pa. 5.

The Act of February 16, 1883, purports to be general. But is it not special and within the prohibition of article 3, section 7 of the Constitution? It provided for a change in the number and mode of election of school directors in a certain class of boroughs, that is, those that had been divided into wards.

The Act of 1874 provided for the division of boroughs into wards; the Supplement of 1876 provided that the court decreeing the division might upon certain conditions increase the number of councilmen and school directors so that each ward should have an equal number. The Act of 1883 provides that from and after such division into wards or when any such division has heretofore been made each ward shall elect not less than one nor more than three school directors.

Probably the only borough upon which this Act became operative at once was the Borough of Archbald, for it had been divided into wards. In all other cases it was necessary to obtain a division under the provisions of the Act of 1874, before a change in the number of and mode of voting for school directors could be made. All our recent decisions are to the effect that if local results either are or may be produced by a piece of legislation it offends against this provision of the Constitution (art. 3, § 7) and is void.

Keyser v. McKissan, 2 Rawle, 139; Thompson v. Ewing, 1 Brewst. 67; Neale v. Overseers, 5 Watts, 538.

The claim of the plaintiff is based upon a contract with persons who were acting as school directors and who were apparently authorized by election to make agreements for the municipality. He carried out his agreement in good faith: the District had the benefit of his services, and he insists upon his right to recover the amount due upon his contract.

Messrs. W. G. Ward, George S. Horn, and Alexander Farnham, for defendant in error:

The rule is that where there is evidence which alone would justify an inference of the disputed fact, it must go to the jury, no matter how strong or persuasive may be the countervailing proof. A court may set aside a verdict as against the weight of the evidence, but that is the most they can do to assist the party. But in a case in which a court ought to say that there is no evidence sufficient to authorize the inference, then the verdict would be without evidence, not contrary to the weight of it. Whenever this is so they have the right, and it is their duty, to withhold it from the jury.

But where the weight on one side is of such a character as not to incline the beam at all—what the civilians term a mere adminiculum; good to help something else—nothing but a conjecture—then it is as much a question for the court as if this scintilla was absent.

Howard Exp. Co. v. Wile, 64 Pa. 205; Webster v. Laudenslager, 84 Pa. 452.

When the evidence is not in conflict upon the question of fact in dispute, the plaintiff's points may assume the facts to be in accordance with the evidence.

Wannamaker v. Burke, 2 Cent. Rep. 323, 111 Pa. 430; Hoag v. Lake Shore etc. R. R. Co. 85 Pa. 298.

When a fact essential to the maintenance of a cause is not established by proof, the judge may order a nonsuit, or direct a verdict for defendant; and when the requisite facts are agreed upon or admitted, he may instruct a finding for plaintiff.

Lehigh Valley R. R. Co. v. McKean, 90 Pa. 127.

In the case now before the court the evidence on part of the plaintiff wholly failed to establish any of the essential facts requisite to maintain the action.

All the evidence on part of the plaintiff fails to show that the Gilroy Board was a de jure board of school directors of the District; but it does show that there were two boards acting as and each claiming to be a de jure board of school directors for the District. Certainly they both were not de jure boards.

If both boards were usurpers, each acting under its own illegal and belligerent claim, neither of them was such a de facto board as had power to bind the District by contract with third parties. If the one could, then the other could: and if these two could, any indefinite number of usurping boards could do so, which would be such an intolerable and unjust condition as to be ruinous to the District, and which no court should uphold.

Genesee v. McDonald, 98 Pa. 448.

A person cannot be a de facto officer unless there be an office to be filled; nor when the office exists with an incumbent exercising the franchises and discharging the duties incident to the office. It matters not whether such incumbent be a de facto or a de jure officer.

Commonwealth v. Harding, 87 Pa. 353; Genesee v. McDonald, 98 Pa. 449.

The constitutionality of the Act of 1883 could not affect the case.

The mode prescribed by the statute for the employment of teachers for the public schools must be strictly complied with.

Dennison School Dist. v. Padden, 89 Pa. 395.

The mode prescribed by the statute is that no teacher shall be appointed, except by the affirmative votes of the whole number of the directors or controllers of the District; and in each case the names of the members voting, both in the affirmative and the negative shall be so entered in the minutes of the board by the secretary; and immediately after the annual appointment of teachers in each district, the secretary of the board shall send a written list of the names, and the schools to which they have been respectively appointed, to the proper county superintendent, with a notice of the day upon which the ensuing term of school in the district will commence, and the termination thereof as directed by the board.

Purd. Dig. p. 289, pl. 37.

The directors shall have the appointment of all the teachers of common schools in the district, fix the amount of their salaries, dismiss them, etc.

Purd. Dig. p. 290, pl. 51.

The plaintiff was not employed by the Miller Board; he held it at arm's length and refused to recognize its authority or legality.

In Kerr v. Trego, 47 Pa. 296, Chief Justice Lowrie says: "On the division of a body that ought to be a unit the test of which represents the legitimate social succession is, Which of them has maintained the regular forms of organization according to the laws and usages of the body, or, in the absence of these, according to the laws, customs and usages of similar bodies in like cases, or in analogy to them. This is the uniform rule in such cases. * * * In all cases where part of the public body remains, and is to be completed by the reception of new members, it remains as an organized nucleus, and in its organized form it receives the new members and then proceeds to the election of new officers, if any are then to be elected. The old nucleus is not dissolved by the incoming elements, but these are added to it, and then the whole body proceeds to the exercise of all its functions."

Per Curiam:

There was no error in the court holding the "Miller Board" to be the duly elected and qualified board of directors. It was acting as such and performing the duties of the office. Any other de facto board could not bind the School District. It follows that the plaintiff cannot compel the District to fulfill a contract made with the pretended board. When the plaintiff made a contract with it, he ran the risk of its being declared to be invalid.

Judgment affirmed.

APPEAL OF H. Virginia BAKER et al., Re Gustavus C. Wheeler's Estate.

1. Where a testator, having a power of appointment under his father's will and having in his possession some property subject to the power, makes this will: "I leave and bequeath all my property (as stated in my father's will) to my wife," etc., nothing passes thereby except property to which the power applies.
2. Parol testimony is not admissible to show that the testator had other property to which the will applied.

JULY Term, 1886, No. 101, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Chester County, dismissing exceptions to an auditor's report and directing distribution. Reversed.

Before the auditor, H. T. Fairlamb, Esq., appointed to make distribution of the balance shown by the account of William Kennedy, administrator c. t. a. of the will of Gustavus C. Wheeler, deceased, the following facts appeared:

The decedent died April 10, 1884; his will duly probated was as follows:

"Witness, all persons, I, Gus. C. Wheeler, this day second day of October, 1869, if I should be killed or otherwise lose my life, I leave and bequeath all my property (as stated in my father's will) to my wife Mary S. Wheeler.

Gus. C. Wheeler."

He left a widow, Mary S. Wheeler, but no children. His next of kin were his two sisters, H. Virginia Baker and Elizabeth Wheeler, the appellants.

The administrator c. t. a. filed his account, showing a balance in his hands of $2,995.30, which sum included, as ascertained by the auditor, the sum of $90, which was derived from the estate of the decedent's father, in Virginia, by a will giving property to trustees for the son for life with power of appointment by him. This sum was all of the estate of the decedent's father that there was to pass by Gustavus' appointment; and the auditor concluded inasmuch as it was so small, compared with the moneys of the decedent in his own right, that he could not have intended his will to pass only the estate over which he had a power of appointment, but that it also passed his own estate, and accordingly the auditor awarded the whole fund to the widow.

The appellants contended that the will above written was merely an execution of the power of appointment, and did not pass the residue of his estate, derived from his uncle and mother, and filed exceptions to the auditor's report. The court dismissed the exceptions and confirmed the report.

Messrs. John J. Gheen, Thomas W. Pierce and Abner Pyle, for appellants:

The parenthetic clause is part of the will, and limits the property bequeathed.

Turbett v. Turbett, 3 Yeates, 187.

The general rule is that parol evidence is admissible only to explain latent ambiguities, so as to apply the provisions of a will to the subject or person intended, when the description is defective, uncertain, or too general to be understood specifically.

Best v. Hammond, 55 Pa. 409; Wusthoff v. Dracourt, 3 Watts, 240; Wigram, Wills, pp. 118, 132, 205.

When the language of a will is plain, the intention is to be gathered from the language.

Bartholomew's App. 75 Pa. 169.

Where the language of a will is clear and unambiguous a doubt, suggested by extrinsic evidence of the testator's intention at the time he wrote the will, cannot be permitted to affect the construction of the will.

Sponsler's App. 107 Pa. 95.

He used precisely the language necessary to execute the power, and no more, making it clear that he intended nothing more. A general power is, in regard to the estates which may be created by force of it, tantamount to a limitation in fee, not merely because it enables the donee to limit a fee, but because it enables him to give the fee to whom he pleases.

NOTE.—Evidence is admissible which, in its nature and effect, merely explained what the testator has written; but no evidence can be admissible which, in its nature or effect, is applicable to the purpose of showing merely what he intended to have written. Funk v. Davis (Ind.) 1 West. Rep. 302; Judy v. Gilbert, 77 Ind. 96; Sherwood v. Sherwood, 45 Wis. 357.

In Cleveland v. Spilman, 25 Ind. 95, the devise being of "my land, being the south half of the northeast quarter," etc., evidence was admitted to show that the land owned by the testator was in the northeast instead of the east quarter as written, and that that was the land intended, on the ground that the word "land" conveyed the land owned by the testator, and the attempt to specifically describe it did not make nugatory the general description.

In Funk v. Davis, supra, the devise was of the "northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 27." Evidence was not admitted to prove that the testator was not the owner of the land described lying in the northwest quarter of the section, but that the land owned and intended to be devised was the same description lying in the northeast quarter of the section mentioned.

Where there are two claimants for the same legacy, and it is not given to either by the correct name, evidence dehors the will may be considered in determining to which it belongs. Washington and Lee University's App. 2 Cent. Rep. 331.

A devise was of "all that my farm and plantation near Cropwell conveyed to me by the heirs of my deceased wife, and where my son Thomas now resides, containing about eighty-five acres more or less." The testator owned two parcels of land near Cropwell, the one containing 72.62 acres, which had been conveyed to him by the heirs of his deceased wife, the other containing 14.73 acres, which had been conveyed to him by another party. These two parcels adjoined each other and had been rented and cultivated together for many years. Thomas resided on the first named parcel, but cultivated and used both. Held, that only those premises which had been conveyed to the testator by the heirs of his deceased wife, passed by the devise, reviewing the authorities English and American.

Hancock's App. 3 Cent. Rep. 527, 112 Pa. 532.

Mr. Alfred P. Reid, for appellees:

All the facts and circumstances respecting persons or property to which the will relates, are undoubtedly legitimate, and often necessary, evidence to enable the court to understand the meaning and application of the testator's words.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 289; 1 Jarm. Wills, 5th Am. ed. 733.

All the surrounding circumstances of a testator (his family, the amount and character of his property) may and ought to be taken into consideration in giving a construction to the provisions of his will.

Postlethwaite's App. 68 Pa. 480; Marshall's App. 2 Pa. 388; Earp's Will, 1 Pars. 453.

It is for the purpose of enabling the court to discover the intention by putting themselves in the place of the party to see how the terms of the instrument affect the property or subject matter.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 287.

Whether a general devise will operate as an appointment may be ascertained from the fact that the instrument cannot have any operation, except upon the ground that the donee intended to execute his power; as where it is a power to dispose of real estate and he has none of his own. Parol evidence that the testator had no other real estate than that covered by the power is held legitimate; and upon such proof a general devise is held to be an execution of the power.

Bingham's App. 64 Pa. 349; 2 Jarm. Wills, 5th Am. ed. 272.

Parol evidence is admissible to explain latent ambiguities in a will, or to apply its provisions to the subject or party intended, when the description is defective, uncertain, or too general to be understood.

Best v. Hammond, 55 Pa. 412; Brownfield v. Brownfield, 20 Pa. 55; Newell's App. 24 Pa. 197.

Such evidence is not received to produce a construction against the direct and natural meaning of the words, but to assist the court in determining what really was the meaning of the ambiguous and indefinite expressions, which are capable of different interpretations.

Note to Baugh v. Read, 1 Ves. 265.

This will is ambiguous on its face. The use of the words, "all my property," indicates an intention to dispose of all he had. Do the words following, "as stated in my father's will," overthrow that intention, and make it simply an exercise of the power of appointment? If so, it must be because the parenthetical clause qualifies the words "all my property," and reduces the meaning of this general comprehensive expression to "all the property mentioned in my father's will." The fact that this clause is in parenthesis shows that something else was in the mind of the writer than a modification of the immediately preceding words. Grammatically the parenthetical clause does not qualify the words "all my property."

Words in general are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense. Punctuation is to be regarded in the construction of wills.

Hawk. Wills, p. 7.

In Morrall v. Sutton, 1 Phillips, Ch. 533, effect was given to a parenthesis in construing a will. The phrase in parenthesis was referred to another part of the principal sentence for its subject.

In construing a will, it is not necessary for the court to consider the words exactly in the order in which they are placed, if a different arrangement will better answer the apparent intent of the testator.

Ferry's App. 102 Pa. 207.

Thus, by transferring this parenthetical sentence, the apparent intent of the testator is carried out: "I give and bequeath (as stated in my father's will) all my property to my wife Mary S. Wheeler."

The son had no property in the trust fund created by his father's will. The subject of a power is the property of the donor, not of the donee.

Bingham's App. 64 Pa. 345.

It passes as the property of the donor. The appointee takes directly from the donor. The donee is simply the hand that directs it.

Commonwealth v. Williams, 13 Pa. 29; Commonwealth v. Duffield, 12 Pa. 277.

Prior to the Act of June 4, 1879, "The Supplement to the Wills Act," a bequest of all his property would not have been an execution of a power of appointment.

2 Jarm. Wills, 679.

When a will is executed the natural and reasonable presumption is that the testator does not intend to die intestate as to any of his property.

Miller's App. 5 Cent. Rep. 237; Stehman v. Stehman, 1 Watts, 466; Raudenbach's App. 87 Pa. 51; Hofius v. Hofius, 92 Pa. 305; Roland v. Miller, 100 Pa. 50; Ferry's App. 102 Pa. 207; Little's App. 81 Pa. 190; Appeal of Board of Missions, 91 Pa. 507; Axford's Est. 2 W. N. C. 663.

The presumption therefore is that when Gus. C. Wheeler wrote this will, he intended to dispose of all his property.

An express and positive bequest cannot be controlled by subsequent ambiguous words. The gift of "all my property" is positive. The parenthetical clause is ambiguous. When comprehensive words are used, an enumeration of particulars will not restrict the meaning of the larger words.

Wood's Est. 9 W. N. C. 171.

When the omission or insertion of words has left unexpressed or wrongly expressed, what, from the whole tenor of the will, was the intention of the testator, the court will permit the will to be read as if the words had been inserted or omitted.

McKechan v. Wilson, 53 Pa. 74; Zerbe v. Zerbe, 84 Pa. 147.

Since the Act of June 4, 1879, "The Supplement to the Wills Act," a bequest of all his property will carry that of which he had the power of appointment, even though the will was made prior thereto.

Aubert's App. 1 Cent. Rep. 104.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

The cardinal rule for the construction of wills is that the intent of the testator must be gathered from the will itself. Other than this rule there is probably no one that is supported by so great a multitude of authorities. Moreover, it is said in Reck's Appeal, 78 Pa. 432, by Mr. Justice Sharswood, that all mere technical rules of construction must give way to the plainly expressed intention of the testator, if that intention be lawful. Again; where there is no ambiguity in the terms of the will, a doubt suggested by extraneous circumstances cannot be permitted to affect its construction. Sponsler's App. 107 Pa. 95.

With these rules thus stated for our guide, we turn to the examination of the will before us, which reads in this manner: "Witness, all persons, I, Gus. C. Wheeler, this day second day of October, 1869, if I should be killed or otherwise lose my life, I leave and bequeath all my property (as stated in my father's will) to my wife, Mary S. Wheeler. Gus. C. Wheeler."

Now, confining ourselves, as the authorities require us to do, strictly to the language here set forth, and we cannot perceive the slightest ambiguity. The testator had a "property" in his father's will; a life estate, with the power to dispose of the corpus by appointment. That he referred to this property and intended to dispose of it no one pretends to question, and this would seem to fully cover the testator's design. How, then, are we to get beyond it?

The court below seemed to think that as he had a much larger estate than he thus devised it must be assumed that of it he did not intend to die intestate. But how do we know this? Or how do we know that he had any other estate than that devised? Certainly, we can derive no such knowledge from the will; hence, it must arise from some extraneous proof or circumstance which we are not at liberty to consider. And why is it to be supposed that he did not intend to die intestate as to the balance of his property, if any such he had? Had the devise been to a stranger no one would have entertained the idea that he intended aught but what he wrote—the execution of the power found in his father's will. But because the devise was to his wife, the court determined to read the will without the limitation. But it will be seen at a glance that such a conclusion could have been arrived at only through a total disregard of the above stated rules of construction. It has made a new, and, perhaps, better will for Gus. C. Wheeler, than he made for himself; nevertheless, as it is one that he did not make, we cannot adopt it.

The decree is reversed, at the costs of the appellees, and a redistribution ordered.

George M. BISHOP, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Township of SCHUYLKILL.

1. While a township is required to construct and maintain its public roads in such a manner as to make them safe for usual and ordinary travel, yet it is not chargeable with damages resulting from extraordinary accidents which may happen on them, and which reasonable skill and care would not be required to guard against.
2. The running away of a horse is not a contingency against which the township is bound to provide.
3. Where a public road ends in a steep declivity on another road, long discontinued, without any barrier at the top of the slope, and a horse, driven along the former one, runs away, through no fault of the township, plunges down the declivity and is killed, it is not error for the court to allow the jury to determine whether there was any duty imposed upon the township in its relations to the traveling public, to erect such a barrier.

(Argued Feb.—, Decided March 7, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 58, E. D. Error to the Common Pleas of Chester County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of trespass on the case. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before FUTHEY, P. J., are stated in his charge to the jury, which was as follows:

This action is brought by George M. Bishop against the Township of Schuylkill, to recover damages for the death of a horse, occasioned, as he alleges, through the negligence of the supervisors.

It appears from the evidence that there was formerly a public road running east and west along the brow of a hill overlooking the Schuylkill River, near the Borough of Phœnixville, and that another public road, known as the Dayton Street Road, leading from the borough, entered that old road at a point designated on the draft to which you have been referred during the trial.

In 1864 and 1868 the public road along the brow of the hill was vacated. The portion of the road east of where the Dayton Street Road entered, was vacated in 1864, and closed in 1865, and that portion west of where Dayton Street entered was vacated in 1868; so that eventually, by these two vacations, the whole of the road was vacated.

The effect of this vacation was that Dayton Street, which had formerly entered that public road, thus leading the travel in both directions, terminated on the south side of the vacated road; and from that time to the present there has been no travel along that portion of the continuation of Dayton Street, beyond the gate of the cemetery, there being no farm houses to reach, and no occasion to drive that way.

When the road along the brow of the hill was vacated, no portion of the Dayton Street Road was disturbed, it being left just as it had been originally laid out, and as it had been traveled for a number of years.

It is, perhaps, proper to remark that the court would not have laid out the Dayton Street Road in the condition in which it was left by the vacation of the road along the brow of the hill. Public roads are laid out between public points, and usually from road to road; but they may be laid out to points that are not public roads, such as a mill, a church, a graveyard, a schoolhouse, a railroad station, or, perhaps, the foot of a mountain.' While then I have said that the court would not have laid out the Dayton Street Road as it was left by the vacation of the road along the brow of the hill, it does not follow that any portion of the Dayton Street Road was in law vacated, by the vacation of the road along the brow of the hill. The road remained there as a public road, and, although it was not needed for public travel and would not seem for twenty years to have been traveled beyond the gate of the cemetery, it still remained a legal, public highway.

The plaintiff claims that on the day when this accident happened, he sent his son with a horse and sleigh, containing an overbox, to the Catholic cemetery; that owing to a deep fall of snow, which had drifted to some extent, the sleigh was upset; that while his son was attempting to right the sleigh, the horse started; that his son was unable to stop the horse, on account of the depth of the snow; that he fell and let go the reins; that the horse proceeded on out the Dayton Street Road, past the cemetery gate, until it got to the end of the road, and that when it reached the brow of the hill it plunged down the precipice and was killed.

The plaintiff contends that the Township was negligent in not having closed the end of the road where the accident occurred, and that his horse was killed in consequence of this negligence on the part of the supervisors.

It is the duty of the supervisors to keep the highways in a reasonable degree of repair. It is impossible to guard against the occurrence of all accidents upon public roads; but it is the duty of the supervisors, having regard to the safety of the traveling public, to adopt such precautions as will provide against the occurrence of accidents that might be avoided in the ordinary use of the public roads. It is also their duty to keep the roads in such condition that not only may gentle and quiet horses be driven over them, but that even skittish and fractious horses may be driven with comparative safety.

The evidence in this case shows that the runaway did not happen through any fault on the part of the supervisors of Schuylkill Township. A recent fall of snow was upon the ground. There was no duty incumbent upon the Borough of Phœnixville, within whose limits the horse started, to remove the snow from where it had fallen.

It appears that the sleigh upset in consequence of the drifting of the snow; that the horse then started, the driver subsequently losing control of the animal, and then kept on until it plunged over the brow of the hill.

[If the starting of the horse, in the first place, had been occasioned through any fault of the supervisors, then the Township would be liable for negligence, provided the cause of the starting of the horse was proximate, or not too remote; but I instruct you that under the testimony the Township of Schuylkill was clearly not responsible for the starting of the horse, nor its subsequently getting beyond the control of the driver, and finally meeting with the accident. It is not the duty of a township to provide against accidents which may happen to runaway teams.]

The supreme court has said on this subject: "It is true that ordinary provision is not to be made against contingencies so rare as runaway horses. Roads and bridges are constructed for the purpose of ordinary travel; and if they fulfill such purpose, they are sufficient; and those who have them in care are not chargeable with the results of extraordinary accidents which may happen upon them.

This doctrine is, of course, subject to the principles I have stated: that public roads should be maintained in such condition that even skittish and fractious horses may be driven upon them with comparative safety.

[Under ordinary circumstances, a township nót being required to make provision against runaway horses, I have instructed you that the Township of Schuylkill was not responsible for the running away of the plaintiff's horse; and therefore the principles applicable to the circumstances of this case, the negligence of the Township not having been primarily the cause of the horse running away, are those relating to the performance of the ordinary duties devolving upon township supervisors in respect to the public roads.]

The question for your consideration is whether the accident was caused through any negligence on the part of the Township of Schuylkill. [It has been argued that a barrier at the end of the road might have prevented the accident; and yet the Township might not be responsible for the absence of such a precaution. It frequently occurs that stumps, rocks and ditches are on the side of roads; in which event it might be said that if they had not existed at the time of an accident, in all probability it never would have happened; and yet the Township might not be held liable for negligence in not removing such obstructions. If then it is a fact in the case that this accident would never have happened if a fence had been placed across the end of the road, at the brow of the hill, it does not follow that the Township was guilty of negligence in not erecting such a barrier at that point.]

The question is simply whether there was any duty imposed upon the Township, in its relations to the traveling public, to erect a fence at that point of the road where the accident occurred.

It appears that from the evidence that the road in question has not been traveled for twenty years; and yet it still remained a public road. The Township seems to have entirely lost sight of the fact that such a public road existed, there having been no occasion for its use by the public, at least beyond the cemetery gate.

The question of whether the Township was guilty of negligence in not placing a fence across the road, is not a question of law for the court, but one of fact for your determination.

You have heard all the testimony that has been given in the case in respect to the condition of this road, and the character and ending of the Dayton Street Road. There is some dispute as to whether or not the cemetery fence was extended the entire length down to where Dayton Street enters this road; but it is clear that the road ran across the end of Dayton Street; that it was an ordinary public road; that it was sufficiently wide for public travel, and that it was vacated; while it may be presumed that the road was level until it reached the declivity.

The plaintiff's horse, after reaching the end of the road, would seem to have passed diagonally to the right, some forty feet, before it plunged over the cliff. The question therefore arises as to whether it was the duty of the supervisors to have placed a fence or guard at the end of the road, so as to prevent accidents occurring from runaway horses.

[I have instructed you that the Township is not responsible for the running away of this horse, nor for the driver losing control of the animal; that the Township was not bound to provide against such a contingency; that the Township is only responsible for an accident occurring through the neglect of its supervisors, in not providing against contingencies that might be reasonably foreseen.]

If the accident happened through the negligence of the supervisors, in the proper performance of their duties, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover in this action. If they were not thus negligent, then the accident would not have occurred through any fault on their part, and the Township could not be held responsible.

In other words, if the Township had caused the running away of the horse, or been the means of the driver losing control of the horse, then the Township would be liable for whatever accident happened to the horse thereafter, provided it was not too remote in its consequences; but the Township, not having caused the running away of the horse, nor caused the driver to lose control of the animal, was not bound to provide against the running away of the horse, unless the accident which followed was occasioned through the negligence of the supervisors in not providing against a contingency which might have reasonably and properly been presumed would arise under such circumstances.

I do not attribute any importance to the fact that there existed an intervening space of land belonging to private parties. The contingencies townships are to provide against are those that may be reasonably apprehended will arise by those in authority. There may be a precipice along side of a road, or a precipice a short distance from the road, and the township may be required to afford equal protection against accidents occurring by means of one as well as the other source of danger; but from all the evidence in the case it is your duty to determine whether the supervisors were negligent in not guarding against such an accident occurring at the point where the plaintiff's horse was killed.

[If the plaintiff's horse had been under the control of the driver would this accident have happened? The horse was not under the control of the driver, and therefore the Township was not responsible for any accident that happened to the runaway horse. The supervisors were not required to provide against accidents that might happen to runaway horses, but simply against such contingencies as should be foreseen in the proper performance of their duties.]

In cases where accidents happen, even through negligence on the part of the supervisors, the township cannot be held liable, if there had been any contributory negligence on the part of the party seeking to recover damages.

The evidence in this case, however, does not show that the accident occurred through any neligence of the plaintiff, or his son who was driving the horse, at the time of the accident, and therefore the principle of contributory negligence, which sometimes becomes an element for consideration, does not enter into the solution of the questions I have submitted for your determination.

The plaintiff asked the court to charge inter alia:

1. "The use of the road leading from Dayton Street to the point of the accident in Schuylkill Township by the public as a highway for more than twenty-one years, made it a public road, just as effectually as though it had been originally laid out and opened by the proper authorities; and the failure of the supervisors to properly guard it at the point where the accident happened is negligence per se, and the Township is liable for any damage resulting from such negligence."

Ans. This point consists of two parts: first, I am requested to instruct you that the Dayton Street Road is a public road, which is a question for your determination, and second, that if it is a public road, the failure of the supervisors to place a fence across the end of it, was negligence in itself. I cannot affirm the point in the language in which it is written. I cannot instruct you, as a matter of law, that the failure of the supervisors to place a fence across the end of Dayton Street was negligence in itself, as it is a question of fact I have referred to your consideration. (Adding at the end of the answers to the defendant's point.) The counsel for the plaintiff, has used this language, viz.: "The use of the road leading from DaytonStreet to the point of the accident in Schuylkill Township by the public, as a highway for more than twenty-one years, made it a public road just as effectually as though it had been originally laid out and opened by the proper authorities." There is no doubt but that such is the law on the subject, and therefore that portion of the point is affirmed. That is to say, the use of a road for the length of time Dayton Street appears to have been used by the public as a highway, makes it a public road; and therefore I have referred to Dayton Street as an existing public road from the Borough of Phœnixville to the point where the Dayton Street road would end, on the south side of the vacated road along the brow of the hill. The testimony in the case warrants the court in saying that the Dayton Street Road was an existing road, at the time of the accident to the point that has been designated on the drafts offered in evidence.

3. "If the jury believe that a fence across the end of the road at the top of the precipice would have prevented the accident, and that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the driver of the horse, then the Township is liable for failing to maintain the fence, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

Ans. I cannot affirm this point in the language in which it is written. It may be that a fence across the end of the road would have prevented the accident; but it does not follow that because there was no fence there, the Township was therefore guilty of negligence. I have submitted that question of fact to you, and therefore the point, as written, is disaffirmed.

The defendant submitted, inter alia, the following points:

3. "The upset and run away began within the limits of the Borough of Phœnixville, as the plaintiff himself alleges; and there being no new intervening defect to the line of the terminus of the road, the Township of Schuylkill was in no manner responsible therefor, or for the consequences thereof."

Ans. I have instructed you that there is no evidence to show that the Township had anything to do with the causing of the horse running away from the driver, or the driver losing control of the animal, and that therefore the Township would not be responsible for any consequences resulting from the horse running away from his driver, unless the Township was guilty of negligence at the point where the accident occurred.

The Township may or may not be responsible for the consequences of the accident, that question depending upon whether or not the supervisors were guilty of negligence at the point where the accident occurred, and whether their negligence caused the accident. The Township, however, is not responsible for the consequences of the accident by reason of anything that happened when the driver lost control of the horse.

6. "If the jury shall find that the horse ran over a bank upon private ground, thirty feet beyond the south line of the roads as vacated, then, whether the horse was driven beyond the line of the public road or ran away from no cause of the Township's, the plaintiff cannot recover in this case."

Ans. This point is affirmed. I have referred to your determination the question as to whether the Township was guilty of negligence, and if so, whether that negligence was the cause of the accident.

7. "The evidence being uncontradicted that the public had no call, actual or by implied invitation, to drive beyond the gate of the cemetery, over 200 feet from any alleged dangerous point such dangerous point being at least the width of the vacated road beyond the end of the public road, there can be no recovery in this case."

Ans. This point I have answered in the instructions I have given the jury.

The assignments of error specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets and the answers to the points given above.

Mr.* H. H. Gilkyson, for plaintiff in error: The plaintiff was entitled to have the question, whether under all the evidence the Township was guilty of negligence in not placing a fence or barrier across this road, submitted to the jury. It was not a question of law for the court, but one of fact for the jury. The jury have a right, not only to find the facts, but also the inferences fairly deducible from those proved.

Myers v. Hart, 10 Watts, 104; Collins v. Barnes, 83 Pa. 15.

The presumption of a fact in law which carries a case to a jury necessarily leaves them in possession of the case. True, the evidence to rebut the presumption may be very strong; yet it is a matter for the jury and not for the court.

Pa. R. R. Co. v. Weiss, 87 Pa. 448.

The question whether borough officers are negligent in permitting a precipice to remain unfenced, and whether a plaintiff's loss resulted from that neglect, is for the jury.

Borough of Pittston v. Hart, 7 W. N. C. 165.

Public roads must be kept in such repair that even skittish animals may be employed without risk or danger on them, by reason of the condition of the roads.

Lower Macungie Township v. Merkhoffer, 71 Pa. 276.

A road may be perfectly safe under some circumstances, and very unsafe under others. A way, ten feet in width, in the open country may be as secure as one of ten times that width, but along the brow of a precipice such a way would be very insecure. Perhaps, indeed, a steady sure footed team, handled by a cool and skillful driver, may pass over it as securely as over the former; but drivers of only ordinary nerve, with fractious teams, are unsafe upon it: and it is just for this reason that such a road should be protected with guards, which under ordinary circumstances would not be essential.

Hey v. Philadelphia, 81 Pa. 44.

If a public road through a township is so dangerous by reason of its proximity to a precipice that common prudence requires extra precaution in order to secure safety to travelers, the township is bound to use such precautions, and the omission to do so is negligence.

Scott Township v. Montgomery, 95 Pa. 444.

If a township fails to maintain a road in a proper and safe condition, whereby the plaintiff, without negligence on his part, is damaged, the question of the negligence of the township was proper for the jury.

Lower Windsor v. Gemmill, 16 W. N. C. 265.

Although without the frightening of the horse there would have been no accident, the horse is naturally a timid animal, and is so liable to fright that those having charge of the public highways ought to make reasonable provision for a matter so common and so likely to happen at any time.

Pittston v. Hart, 7 W. N. C. 165.

Where a barrier is necessary for the proper security of travelers and the road was unsafe to all travelers without it, and the presence of such a barrier would have prevented the injury, the township is liable.

Alger v. City of Lowell, 3 Allen, 402; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 391; Whart. Neg. § 968; Newlin Township v. Davis, 77 Pa. 317; Hey v. Philadelphia, 81 Pa. 44; Scranton v. Dean, 2 W. N. C. 467.

To submit to the jury the question whether "the use of the road by the public as a highway for more than twenty-one years made it a public road,"—a question clearly of law,—was error. The error in this instruction was not cured by anything subsequently said by the court, by way of correction; for an instruction which may have misled the jury, although subsequently qualified, is ground for reversal.

O'Hara v. Richardson, 46 Pa. 385; Shimer v. Jones, 47 Pa. 268.

Messrs. R. T. Cornwell and B. F. Fisher, for defendant in error:

The authorities are only to provide safeguards against foreseen dangers to the ordinary traveling public, and not to animals running at large upon the public highway, or those which have broken loose from their drivers.

McCormick v. Township of Washington, 2 Cent. Rep. 584, 112 Pa. 185.

In the present case the public had no occasion to go beyond the cemetery gate, 250 feet from the semblance of danger. Ordinary provision is not to be made against contingencies so rare as runaway horses. Roads and bridges are constructed for the purpose of ordinary travel, and if they fulfil such purpose they are sufficient; and those who have them in care are not chargeable with the results of extraordinary accidents which may happen upon them.

Hey v. Philadelphia, 81 Pa. 44.

When a horse, while being driven with due care upon a highway which a town is bound to keep in repair, becomes, by reason of fright, disease or viciousness, actually uncontrollable so that his driver cannot stop him or direct his course or exercise or. regain control over his movements, and in this condition comes upon a defect in the highway, by which an injury is occasioned, the town is not liable for the injury, unless it appears that it would have occurred if the horse had not been so uncontrollable.

Titus v. Northbridge, 97 Mass. 258.

For the plaintiff to recover, the defect must have been the sole cause of the accident which resulted in the injury; if the plaintiff's horse became uncontrollable, and was so when the accident occurred, the plaintiff could not recover; but if there was only a momentary loss of control, and the control would have been instantly regained if the plaintiff's carriage had not come in contact with the place where the way was defective, then the plaintiff could recover. In order to render the town or city liable, the defect of the way must be the sole cause of the injury.

Babson v. Rockport, 101 Mass. 93; Rowell v. City of Lowell, 7 Gray, 100; Stickney v. Salem, 3 Allen, 374.

If a horse gets loose and runs upon the highway, the town is not liable.

Richards v. Enfield, 13 Gray, 344; Davis v. Dudley, 4 Allen, 557.

Per Curiam:

We discover no error in this record. While a township is required to construct and maintain its public roads in such a manner as to make them safe for usual and ordinary travel, yet it is not chargeable with damages resulting from extraordinary accidents which may happen on them, and which reasonable skill and care would not be required to guard against.

The case was submitted to the jury in a clear and correct charge. McCormick v. Township of Washington, 2 Cent. Rep. 584, 112 Pa. 185.

Judgment affirmed.

(Argued Feb. Decided March 7, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 304, E. D.

Appeal from a decree of the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, in favor of the plaintiff in a bill in equity. Affirmed.

The bill alleged that the plaintiff, Nancy Perry, had owned property, real and personal, before her marriage to F. H. Perry; that after the marriage she allowed him to manage it and receive the income; that shortly before his death the defendants, his children by a former marriage, induced him to assign to them all his property, and that the property so assigned included some of that of the plaintiff.

The bill prayed that the defendants might be compelled to account for and turn over to the plaintiff all her money transferred to them by F. H. Perry, and also one third of all property transferred to them in fraud of the plaintiff's rights, as wife of F. H. Perry; and that the defendants might be enjoined from assigning, selling, incumbering, etc., any property transferred to them by F. H. Perry.

J. S. Short and J. B. Carpenter, debtors in a mortgage and note respectively, which the bill alleged so to have been assigned by F. H. Perry, were made defendants in the bill; and as to them the bill prayed an injunction to restrain them from paying any money on account of the mortgage and note.

A preliminary injunction was granted according to the prayers of the bill.

The defendants' answer admitted the marriage of F. H. Perry with the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff before the marriage was possessed of a separate estate, but denied that F. H. Perry managed her property or received the income thereof in any such manner as to render the estate of F. H. Perry liable to the plaintiff.

The answer also admitted the transfer of personal property by F. H. Perry to his children shortly before his death, but denied that there was any fraud connected therewith.

The cause was referred to Henry A. Knapp, Esq., as master, and his findings were as follows:

1. Mrs. Nancy Wall, now Mrs. Nancy Perry, plaintiff in this case, and F. H. Perry, were married upon August 30, 1874. Both had previously been married, Mrs. Wall being the widow of Otis Wall, who died in 1859, without leaving children. The defendants, C. F. Perry and Emeline Stannard, wife of R. H. Stannard, are children of F. H. Perry by a former marriage.

2. F. H. Perry died intestate, upon April 14, 1885, having previously devested himself of all, or very nearly all, his property in the following manner: some time in February or March preceding, he transferred to his son, C. F. Perry, a note for $106, which he held against J. B. Carpenter, which is particularly mentioned in the seventh paragraph of plaintiff's bill; upon March 30, 1885, he transferred to his daughter, Emeline Stannard, a note for $239, which he held against her husband, R. H. Stannard.

Upon April 8, 1885, he assigned a mortgage which he held against J. S. Short, also mentioned in the sixth paragraph of plaintiff's bill, upon which about the sum of $2,000 was at that time unpaid, to his said son, C. F. Perry; and on the same day, by deed, which mentions the consideration of $900, he conveyed to his son, C. F. Perry, a house and lot in Factoryville, Pa., which he had previously purchased from the plaintiff.

These conveyances were made without valuable consideration, moving to said F. H. Perry from his said children; and although they were made while in apprehension of death, or by way of preparation for death, they do not appear to have been conditioned upon his death, but were absolute, and vested all the title of the assignor immediately in the assignees.

It does not appear to be clearly established just what the physical condition of F. H. Perry was when he made these conveyances. He had been in ill health for some few months previously; aud about the time he made the conveyances he became impressed with the idea that life was short, and he took the action that he did in order to arrange his matters to his satisfaction, having in view the devesting of any distributive share which his widow might have in the articles of personal property mentioned, in case she survived him. He lived with the plaintiff up to within about two weeks prior to his death, when he was removed to the house of his daughter, Emeline Stannard, and her husband, R. H. Stannard, a few miles away. This removal was not effected through any fraudulent purpose on the part of the defendants to induce him to convey his property as he did, but in order to afford him more adequate attention than he could receive, or was receiving, at his former home, as he needed the attention of a man.

3. There was no actual fraud on the part of the defendants in obtaining the conveyances mentioned.

Upon this state of facts the question of law is raised whether as to the personal property so voluntarily conveyed the plaintiff can claim any distributive share therein under the intestate laws.

Under the authority of Pringle v. Pringle, 59 Pa. 281, and Estate of John Dickerson, 43 Legal Int. 76, the master is of the opinion that she cannot. In the former case, Judge Sharswood uses these words: "In our law, no such gift, otherwise valid, can be impeached as a fraud on a man's wife or children. They have no legal right to any part of his goods; and therefore no fraud can be predicated of any act of the husband or parent to deprive them of the succession."

It is argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the gifts, being made in apprehension of death, are in their nature testamentary, and that the conditions of the Act of 1833 regulating the making of wills, must be applied to them. It is further argued that the distinction between a donatio mortis causa and a gift inter vivos, is that the former is made in apprehension of death, while the latter is not: and the gifts here established are consequently of the former class, and will not be sustained, because they convey all of the estate of the decedent. Headley v. Kirby, 18 Pa. 326, is relied upon as an authority for this position. While the point is not free from doubt, the master is of opinion that this case is ruled by Pringle v. Pringle, supra.

A donatio mortis causa is that form of gift inter vivos which is expressly made conditional upon the death of the donor. It has been judicially declared to be a "gift inter vivos, subject to conditions." 2 Kent, Com. 13th ed. 448, note y, and cases there cited; Marshall v. Berry, 13 Allen, 43-46.

In Headley v. Kirby, supra, it is distinctly recognized that such gifts form exceptions to our Statute of Wills; and the court in that case declined to sustain the gifts, more from the uncertainty which surrounded it and the lack of adequate proof of what the gift really was than from any solicitude for any class or classes of persons who might be entitled to succeed to the estate of the decedent. Here there appears no such uncertainty. An assignment of the mortgage was executed, acknowledged, delivered, and recorded, and the notes were passed to the donees. So far as the real estate is concerned, it is not questioned that at least the dower interest of Mrs. Perry still remains therein; and that point is not in controversy here; but as to the personal property, it is believed that the power of F. H. Perry over it was absolute, and that the gifts mentioned are properly classified as gifts inter vivos, upon which no fraud can be predicated. Upon this branch of the case the following is found as matter of law:

1. The gifts made by F. H. Perry to his children, mentioned in the second finding of fact, were valid, so far as they conveyed personal property belonging to the donor and not held in trust for his wife; and in the subject matter of such gifts the plaintiff is entitled to no distributive share as widow of the donor.

In proceeding to consider the other branch of this case, the question whether the personal property conveyed by F. H. Perry to his children, as above detailed, was his own property or that of the plaintiff, the following matters of fact are found by the master.

[4. At the time of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Perry, or soon after, Mr. Perry was the owner in his own right of a claim against the bankrupt estate of Northrup Brothers of Clark's Green, amounting to about the sum of $1,500.

Upon this claim he afterwards realized about the sum of $1,200. Whether during the coverture he was the owner of any other property is too uncertain to become the subject of a finding of fact, but it is believed by the master that he was not.]

5. When Otis Wall died in 1859 he left (by will) to his widow, now the plaintiff, the use of his farm for her life, lying partly in Lackawanna and partly in Wyoming County. For many years past this farm has had a rental value of $500 per annum.

Certain other real estate was devised to her for the term of her life by the same will; and [it is believed that by some arrangement this property had been sold, and that the principal sum realized therefor was in the plaintiff's hands. This sum was about $1,239. She was entitled to the use of this sum during her life; but one Mr. Campbell appears to have been entitled to receive $825 of the same upon her death. It may be stated, therefore, that she was indebted to Mr. Campbell in the sum of $825, not drawing interest. This state of facts is believed to have existed at the time of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Perry, or soon after.

At the same time Mrs. Perry had in her own right at least $900 in money, which was loaned to various parties upon notes—all, it seems, to perfectly good parties, as it was all afterwards paid. She was also the owner of a house and lot in Factoryville, Pa., worth from $1,300 to $1,500.

6. In 1881 the Mr. Campbell mentioned in the last finding of fact being desirous of receiving or having secured to him the principal sum of money aforesaid, it was paid to him by F. H. Perry, and a deed was taken by said F. H. Perry from his wife, Nancy Perry, of her house and lot in Factoryville. This deed is mentioned in the eighth paragraph of plaintiff's bill, wherein it is alleged that the conveyance by plaintiff to F. H. Perry was without consideration. The sixth clause of defendants' answer admits the conveyance, but denies that it was without consideration. It is found as matter of fact that F. H. Perry voluntarily conveyed this property to C. F. Perry by deed dated April 8, 1885, six days before his death.

Upon the hearing no testimony was offered by plaintiff upon the matters alleged in regard to this property, and objection was made to the proof, by defendants, that F. H. Perry had paid $825 to Campbell, as the consideration of the conveyance to said F. H. Perry of this Factoryville lot. The ground of this objection was that the deed from Nancy Perry to F. H. Perry appears to be void in law, because it is the deed of a married woman, not joined by her husband; and the plaintiff does not ask any decree concerning the property. The deed from Mrs. Perry to her husband is not in evidence in this case.

8. The personal property given by Mr. Perry to his children shortly before his death, so far as the same is established by the testimony, may be stated as follows:

Mortgage against J. S. Short, unpaid	$2,043
Note against H. R. Stannard	239
Note against J. B. Carpenter	106
Note against James Frear or Keystone Academy	200
Cash in Scranton Savings Bank & Trust Company	250
Total,	$2,838

9. It is shown that a short time before the death of Mr. Perry an account was presented to him, of items paid out by Mrs. Perry for his use, amounting to about $25, which, after some consideration, was paid to her by J. V. Whitney, Esq., who was acting as legal adviser of Mr. Perry.

It may also be stated as matter of fact that Mr. Perry paid to Mr. Campbell in 1881 $825 to discharge his wife's indebtedness mentioned in the sixth finding of fact.

There is no other testimony showing payments made by F. H. Perry to his wife or for her use, of any of the sums received by him from her private estate. Without entirely crediting all the testimony concerning the scantiness of the living of Mr. and Mrs. Perry during the coverture, it is well established that their living was plain and inexpensive; and the master believes that Mr. Perry did not expend as much as the income of the farm in the support of himself and Mrs. Perry. They lived during the coverture upon the farm, or in the house of Mrs. Perry in Factoryville.

[From all the testimony the Master is of the opinion, and states it as matter of fact, so far as such finding of fact can be predicated upon the evidence, that Mr. Perry received the whole or nearly the whole of the income of Mrs. Perry's estate during the coverture; that he also received the $900 which it was shown was paid during the coverture; that from these moneys he paid Mr. Campbell the $825, and supported himself and Mrs. Perry until the time of his death, and that the difference between the sum he received from the Northrup Brothers' bankrupt estate and the amount he turned over to his children, shortly before his death, represents the amount which he saved out of his receipts from her private estate.]

10. It is not shown that any of the money which Mrs. Perry permitted her husband to receive was intended as a gift to him.

Upon this state of facts what are the rights of these parties?

In Hamill's Appeal, 88 Pa., 363, it is held that where a husband receives the property of his wife, it will be presumed that he holds it in trust for her. Woodward, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "But the objection has been made on the part of the apellees that no proof was made of any terms on which Mr. Hamill held the money, and that without some evidence of a loan, they were not required to show that it was a gift. The essential question is whether Mr. Hamill received the money or not. If he did, it will be presumed that he held it in trust for her. The mere possession of a wife's money is no evidence, since the Act of 1848 was passed, that the title to it has been vested in the husband. Grabill v. Moyer, 45 Pa. 530; Gicker v. Martin, 50 Pa. 141; Bergey's App. 60 Pa. 408. No rights of creditors are involved in this litigation, and it is not to be taken for granted that Mrs. Hamill intended a gift to her husband for the eventual benefit of his children by a former wife."

In the opinion of the Master, F. H. Perry was at the time of his death a trustee for his wife for the amount of her money which came into his hands, less the sum which he had expended for their living or for her use.

What was that amount?

It has been seen that he gave away $2,838 just before he died. Was this his money or that of his wife?

That the money of his wife came to his hands cannot be denied. That he had money of his own until he realized from the Northrup estate is very doubtful; his frequent declarations were that he had lost his all by the Northrup failure.

If he had other property, it does not appear that he used any portion of it in the support of himself and family—as the law would require that he should do before he resorted to the money of his cestui que trust, Nancy Perry, for that purpose.

Mr. Perry shortly before his death seems to have undergone a financial transformation; from a poor man who has lost his all by the Northrup failure, and is dependent upon the income of his wife's estate for his living, he suddenly becomes able to give nearly $3,000 in money or good securities to his children. From all the testimony the master deduces the conclusion of fact that Perry had in his own right nothing but the amount which he realized from the bankrupt estate of Northrup Brothers; and that the amount given to his children above that sum was trust property money which he had received from his wife's estate, and which he held in trust for her.]

What amount did he receive from the Northrup estate? The testimony does not clearly show. The plaintiff claims that he only received $820; while by the defendants' showing $1,450 is the most probable figure at which the testimony points. Adopting the latter as the correct figure, it is evident that he gave to his children upon his death bed $1,388 more than he received from the Northrups. In the opinion of the Master this furnishes one basis for arriving at the sum which the plaintiff should rightfully receive from his estate.

Let us now consider the subject from another standpoint, to wit: his receipts of his wife's money and expenditures for her, so far as they are disclosed by the testimony, and see how the account stands. On behalf of defendants it is argued that a husband is not liable for the income of his wife's separate estate received by him, for the reason that it is presumed that it entered into their yearly expenditures and enabled him to provide more bountifully for the family. While the cases cited support this general position, it cannot be held to apply to this case.

The weight of testimony shows that during the coverture the cost of living of Mr. and Mrs. Perry was not above $250 to $300 per year. Allowing $100 per year for matters not taken into account by the witness, the amount reaches $350 to $400. Adopting the larger sum as the correct one, and calling the net income of the farm $500, the following result is reached:

Ten years' profit of farm, at $100 per year	$1,000.00
Received by Mr. Perry, from Mr. Campbell, interest on $825, for three years	148.62
Received by Mr. Perry, of sums of principal belonging to his wife	900.00
Total	$2,048.62
Less amount paid to Mr. Campbell to discharge indebtedness of wife at the time deed was taken by Mr. Perry of property in Factoryville	$ 825.76

By the above computation it will be seen that Mr. Perry is given credit for the amount which it is claimed that he paid as a consideration of his wife's property in Factoryville. This credit the defendants are entitled to; for, although no decree is sought or recommended concerning the property, and the sufficiency or validity of their deed cannot be passed upon in this proceeding, as the same is not in evidence, yet it must be borne in mind that their title is disputed by Nancy Perry, and that they are out of possession.

While a husband may not be ordinarily accountable for the interest or income of his wife's property, it is inequitable that he should be allowed to accumulate such income and give it to his children by a former wife, upon his death; and this injustice is emphasized by the fact that he has had his entire living from his wife's estate, and leaves his own property intact to his children, freed by his peculiar manner of distributing it from his widow's statutory portion.

The Master is of the opinion that F. H. Perry was a trustee for his wife for at least $1,222.86, at the time of his death, and that the said sum had been invested by said trustee in the notes, mortgage, etc., which he gave to his children. It is the right of the plaintiff to follow these trust funds, they having been conveyed without consideration. The assignments and transfers made by F. H. Perry to his children, just before his death, were in fraud of his wife, and void, in so far as they conveyed this trust fund of $1,222.86, or the securities in which it had been invested by the trustee; and the said transfers, assignments, or conveyances should be decreed to be null and void in so far as they convey the amount named.

It is recommended [that a decree be made, requiring and directing J. S. Short and J. B. Carpenter to pay plaintiff the several amounts due upon the mortgage and note mentioned in the sixth and seventh paragraphs of plaintiff's bill, and authorizing the plaintiff to give proper acquittances and satisfactions to said J. S. Short and J. B. Carpenter for the amounts so paid; and ordering and directing the defendants, C. F. Perry, Emeline Stannard, and R. H. Messrs. James H. Torrey and M. J. Wilson, for appellants:

We rely mainly in this case on the principle, Actore non probante, absolvitur reus. The testimony to support the plaintiff's claim is vague, uncertain and inconclusive.

It is necessary, for the peace of families and the protection of estates, that one standing in the confidential relation of a wife, should prove her right as a creditor with clearness. In such a case, especially where the husband leaves children by a former marriage, she must show by distinct and clear proof that the transaction was a loan from her own separate estate.

We think the master erred in his first conclusion of law; and, by reason of that error, he materially reduced the amount of the decree which was made in favor of the plaintiff below.

He held that Mr. Perry had the legal right on his death bed to give away to his children all of his own estate, for the very purpose of thereby depriving his wife of her claim upon his estate under the intestate laws.

It is not necessary to a gift mortis causa that it should be expressly conditioned on the giver's death. The condition is implied by law.

The answer in this case does not satisfy the legal requirements. It is a mere denial of the allegations of the bill.

It is a rule of equity practice that the defendant shall apprise a plaintiff, by the answer, of the nature of the case he intends to set up, and that he cannot avail himself of any matter of defense not stated in his answer, even though it should appear in his evidence.

The bill and answer are part of the evidence. All affidavits, depositions, etc., previously made, read or used in the case may be used before the master.

Per Curiam:

The court concurred with the master in the finding of facts. While much evidence was given, of a vague and uncertain character, it appears to have been disregarded in the conclusion at which both arrived. The learned judge says: "The uncertain and vague character of the testimony applies more to amounts claimed beyond what the master has found than to the amount he has found."

An examination of the evidence satisfies us that this is correct. It is sufficiently clear to justify awarding the sums specified in the decree.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellants.

v.

Benjamin F. DETTRA.

1. Words spoken of a lawyer, in reference to what he has done in his profession, that he is a "blackmailer," are actionable per se.
2. H. refused in the presence of several witnesses to shake hands with D., saying: "I don't shake hands with blackmailers; a certain person told me he had to pay you hush money in the prosecution against me." D. threatened to sue H.; whereupon H. replied: "The sooner the better: I will show that you are a blackmailer and that you have blackmailed me." Held, that, in an action for slander, upon proof of these facts D. was entitled to recover against H., without proof of special damage.

3. In the absence of malice, compensation is the measure of damages.
4. If the words were uttered with special malice punitive damages may be awarded; and in estimating such damages the defendant's means may be taken into account.
5. Under the Act of March 30, 1875, a change of venue in civil cases, on the ground that the defendant cannot have an impartial trial, is within the discretion of the court below; and a refusal to grant the change will not be reversed unless the discretion has been abused.
6. An action for slander for calling an attorney a blackmailer is not a case where a large number of the inhabitants of the county are interested adversely to the defendant so as to make it obligatory on the court to grant a change of venue, under the Act of 1875, although the words were spoken about a criminal prosecution for alteration of the tax records by the defendant.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 88, E. D. Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of trespass on the case for slander. Affirmed.

After issue joined and before trial the defendant presented a petition for a change of venue, upon the grounds that both the judges of the Common Pleas of Berks County were material witnesses in the case; that the inhabitants thereof were interested in the questions involved, and that a fair trial could not be had by defendant in Berks County. In support of the petition there was filed an abstract of 101 articles in seven English newspapers published in Berks County, from August, 1884, to November, 1885, all reflecting on him.

The application was opposed by the plaintiff, and denied by the court, and the case went to trial on October 18, 1886, ALBRIGHT, P. J., of Lehigh County, presiding.

The facts as they appeared at the trial were stated in the charge of the court which was as follows:

In this action, brought by Benjamin F. Dettra against Daniel Healy, the plaintiff seeks to recover damages which he alleges he has sustained by reason of the defamation of his character by the defendant. In law a man has a right to his good name and reputation: that is, he has an equal right to be protected against false and willful communications, whether written or printed, or by word of mouth made to his prejudice or damage.

The plaintiff alleges that the defendant, without any just cause or excuse, spoke that of him which was false and defamatory, and that he did it unlawfully; and for that he seeks to recover damages. If, under the rules of law which will be stated to you, and the facts as you shall find them from the evidence, the plaintiff has not made out his case, or the defendant has established some sufficient defense, your verdict will be in favor of the defendant; while, [if you find that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, you will return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for damages in such amount as may be deemed by you proper under the circumstances and under the law.]

For slander, that is, defamation by word of mouth, an action must be brought within one year after the utterance of the words. This action was brought on the third of September, 1885; and it is alleged that the slanderous words complained of were spoken on the second of September, 1885, the day before the action was brought. There is no doubt, therefore, that the action was brought in time.

The plaintiff alleges that at the time of the utterance of these alleged slanders, he was a resident of this city, a member of the Bar of Berks County, and a practicing lawyer, and that the defendant said of him, in substance, that he was a blackmailer and had blackmailed him (the defendant).

Not all words that are spoken are actionable. One man may say that of another which is uncomplimentary and rude and disagreeable to be borne, yet it may not be actionable; and in such a case, the plaintiff cannot recover unless he can show special damage, unless he can show that by reason of the utterance of these words he lost something or sustained some injury.

There is, however, another class of words which are actionable, and for the speaking of which without just cause or excuse a plaintiff is entitled to recover damages without showing specially that he had any particular loss. That class of words is called actionable. For instance, to say of a man that he is the greatest rogue in the world would not be actionable, because it does not charge any particular thing which, if proven, would certainly bring inconvenience upon him; but, to say of a man that he is a thief, or that he is a murderer or a fornicator, is actionable, because, if true, the man could be punished under the law.

To say of a practicing lawyer that in the practice of his profession he has been guilty of blackmailing is actionable. To say of him generally that he was a blackmailer would not subject a man to indictment and punishment; but, [inasmuch as it is considered that it injures the man in his business, and inasmuch as it seems to be taken for granted that in order to practice law a man ought to be an honest man, to say of him that he is a blackmailer is unlawful, and, if it is done without just excuse, actionable.]

[And so in this case, if it is proved that the defendant spoke the words charged against him in the declaration, to which I will call your attention particularly, and that he had no just excuse for it, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and he is entitled to a verdict—even although no special damage has been shown.]

It is charged that on the second of September, 1885, in this city, Healy, the defendant, and Dettra, the plaintiff, met; that Dettra then extended his hand to Healy and offered to shake hands with him; that Healy said "I don't shake hands with blackmailers," and "A certain citizen of this Commonwealth told me that he had to pay you $325 hush money in the prosecution against me;" that Dettra then said "I will sue you;" and Healy said "That is what I want, and then I will have the opportunity of showing that you are a blackmailer and that you have blackmailed me."

This is the plaintiff's cause of action; and, in order to succeed, the plaintiff must show that these words in substance were uttered. [It need not be proved that the very words thus laid were uttered; but it must be proved substantially that they were uttered,] that words that have the same substantial meaning were uttered.

Witnesses have been called who were present at the interview when it is said the slander was uttered, and the testimony of the witnesses is for you to recollect. I call your attention to some of the testimony as I have it.

Mr. Dettra, the plaintiff, himself says that he said "How do you do, Mr. Healy?" "Healy then said 'I will not shake hands with blackmailers.' I then said to Healy 'What does this mean? Explain yourself.' Mr. Healy said 'I have nothing to explain.' Said I 'I want an explanation, and I demand it before you leave this room.' Says he 'You know all about it;' he then said, 'Mr. Jacobs told me that he had to pay you the $325 hush money in a certain criminal prosecution which was against me.' I of course then said, 'I will sue you; I will make you prove it.' Says he, 'Sue and be damned, and then I will prove that you are a blackmailer and that you blackmailed me.'"

Mr. Banks says: "I heard Healy say to Dettra that he would not shake hands with a blackmailer or blackmailers. Mr. Dettra wanted to know what he meant, wanted to know whether he called him a blackmailer. Healy informed Dettra that J. H. Jacobs had told him that he had received $300 or $325, I don't remember which, hush money. Dettra said he would sue him. Healy told him he could go on, that he would prove what he had said."

Simon P. O'Reilly says: "Dettra extended his hand to Healy, and Healy said 'No sir; I don't want to have anything to do with blackmailers.' Healy says 'I don't want to have anything to do with such as you.' Dettra said, 'I want you to take that back right away; you are a damned liar.' Dettra continued and said: 'Gentlemen, I call you here to witness that this man called me a blackmailer.' Healy said 'I didn't say that; I said I didn't want to have anything to do with blackmailers.' Then Mr. Healy said, 'You got a part of that $300;' and I think there was some odd dollars. Dettra said, 'Who told you that?' Healy said, 'Jacobs told me.' Dettra said, 'Well, I will go right away and see Jacobs, and if Jacobs said that, he is a liar, and I will have you arrested before you leave town.' Healy said, 'The sooner, the better.'"

[Mr. Weaver says that he heard some loud talking, looked up, and heard Dettra say something to Healy; then Healy said he had received hush money, the amount being $325, and said he could prove it; he said Jacobs told him so.]

Then Mr. Healy himself testified to what was said on this occasion.

Now, gentlemen, consider what has been testified on this point; and [if the plaintiff has not proved, by witnesses whom you believe, that the words in substance, having the same meaning as those laid in the declaration, which I read to you, were uttered, you will find in favor of the defendant; while if they have been proved, you will proceed and make further inquiry respecting certain other points arising in the case.]

[In the trial of an action of slander, the meaning of the words is for the jury.]

[The jury are to take it that words have the same signification that is usually attached to them. The way in which the world, the people generally, understand words, you are to understand them.] I believe I have said to you that to say of a lawyer in reference to what he has done in his profession that he is a blackmailer is actionable. If I have not said so, I say so now [and I say to you that if the plaintiff has made out words as laid in his narr. in substance, he is entitled to recover.] He is entitled to recover some damages.

Where a party is sued for a slander, he may prove that what he said was true; and if he convinces a jury of that fact, the plaintiff takes nothing, but loses his case, and the verdict is in favor of the defendant. Here, however, as the case is before you, the defendant does not justify. He does not say: "I said so, and it is true"; but he pleads "not guilty." He does not attempt to say that what he is said to have uttered of Dettra is true. In fact, as counsel have said repeatedly in your hearing here, they do not believe the charge that Mr. Dettra was a blackmailer, or that he received any part of the money which it is alleged Healy had to pay wrongfully.

[The defendant's postion in the first place is that the evidence will not warrant you in finding that the words as stated in the declaration are proved. That point we rule against the defendant, and say to you that from the evidence it may be found, if satisfactory to you, that the words are proved]; and we refer to you the question whether or not the same are proved.

[I will state here that in an action of slander where the words are actionable, and the truth of them is not proved or attempted to be proved, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. He is entitled to something.] The damages may be, in the first place, compensatory; that is, make the plaintiff whole for what he has suffered. Where there are circumstances of aggravation or express malice, the jury can, in addition to that, give punitive damages; that is, an additional and further sum as a punishment to the defendant, such further and additional damages by way of punishment as a jury may deem just.

If you find in favor of the plaintiff, the next inquiry would be as to the amount of the damages. [It has been argued that inasmuch as the plaintiff did not show that he had any special loss, that he lost any particular client, you can, if you find no express malice, find in favor of the plaintiff for only nominal damages: 6¼ cents, or some other small sum. The court instructs you that that is not so; that if these words were uttered, even although the plaintiff has shown no special particular damages, you may award him more than nominal damages.]

[You should take into consideration every consequence which the words would have a natural tendency to produce, but not merely problematical or eventual damages, which may possibly happen or possibly may not.]

[You are to take into consideration fairly in this case the plaintiff's rank in his profession of the law, the manner in which the alleged slander was uttered, the extent of the circulation and publicity that was given to the words —and by this, I mean the publicity that was given by the defendant when he uttered it, as to who was by, how many were by, whether he afterwards spoke words of the same effect not in themselves actionable]; and then, whether or not the attack by the uttering of the words was provoked or unprovoked.

[So that you are not bound to give nominal damages only, but you may consider the slander, if it is proved, and all the attending circumstances, and then give such damages as will compensate the plaintiff for the defamation.]

[If you find in favor of the plaintiff, and if you should find that there was special malice in the defendant, that is, that he had a special ill will against the plaintiff, a bad intent or a wicked motive, then, in addition to the damages of which I have just now spoken, you may give a further sum as a punishment upon him, within just bounds, bearing in mind all the circumstances, including his estate.]

You remember that the plaintiff showed what the defendant is worth in dollars. The defendant said that he was worth $50,000 or $60,000. It does not necessarily follow that if a rich man utters a slander, he should be compelled to pay more than a poor man; but, if the jury reach the question of inflicting damages as a punishment, then the degree of his estate may be considered; because a smaller, moderate sum inflicted upon a poor man would be grievous to be borne by him, and hard to pay, while that same small or moderate sum inflicted upon a man of large estate would be considered a trifle or almost nothing. In that way, in a certain contingency, you can consider the amount of the defendant's estate, and in no other.

The defendant takes the ground, in the first place, that he had reasonable cause to suspect that Dettra was guilty of what he is alleged to have been charged with by the slanderous words. And here I may briefly refer to the origin of this difficulty.

The plaintiff, after proving as he alleges, the slanderous words, in order to give the jury to understand to what the words referred, and what he complains of, showed that there was a certain prosecution. It is alleged here that about May, 1883, Mr. Healy, who was the owner of real estate and a tax payer in this county, went into the office of the commissioners and changed certain figures in an assessment of his property; and that nearly two years afterwards there was an information made before an alderman of this city, and he was arrested, bound over to appear at court to be tried on that charge of falsifying and altering the record. Then Mr. Healy, it seems, brought about what is called a settlement of that case, and paid certain money to certain individuals, in the first place, to one or several gentlemen who it seems acted as his attorneys. It is claimed by the plaintiff that the defendant, by the alleged slanderous words, intended to charge that he had been blackmailed, that money had been extorted from him to settle this prosecution, and that Mr. Dettra, the plaintiff, got a portion of it. It appears that at the time that this prosecution was brought, and for some time before and some time afterwards, Mr. Dettra was acting as counsel to the county commissioners.

I do not remember any evidence in this case from which you would find that Mr. Dettra had anything to do with the settling of the case. In fact, I do not remember any evidence from which you could find that he had anything to do with starting the prosecution. It is said that when Mr. Healy asked him to change the figures, or to have them changed back again he said that he could not do that; and it is also said that when the county detective, who, it is said here, made an information at Healy's own request, came to Dettra and said that Healy wanted to be arrested, Dettra said that he had changed the record, and that he might proceed and arrest him.

I understand the defendant's position to be that Dettra had nothing to do, as it turns out now, with starting the prosecution, or settling it; and that is the position they take before you for the purpose of doing justice, as they concede, and very properly, to Mr. Dettra, and also as a reason why you should not act with severity if you find in favor of the plaintiff. But they do say that the circumstances surrounding the defendant at the time the settlement of the criminal case was made, and the saying of what he did say against Dettra, gave him grounds for suspicion that Dettra was involved in it.

[When a man is charged with having slandered another, the law is that although he cannot prove that what he said was true, yet if he can convince a jury that he had good grounds to supect that what he said was true, the damages against him shall not be so heavy as they otherwise would be].

[The verdict must be against him, if he said what he had no right to say;] but you can very well see that a man who had good grounds to believe that what he said was true ought not to be punished as severely as one who, either knowing that what he says is false says it, or who recklessly says it whether he has any reason to believe it is true or not.

Now in the trial of this case, in the examination of the witnesses, and in the argument before you, a great deal of prominence has been given to the changing of this record in the commissioners' office, as to how this prosecution was started and how it was settled. That has nothing at all to do with the case, except so far as it may explain the words that are said to have been uttered, and so far as it may explain the motives of Mr. Healy; for there is no allegation here that Mr. Dettra received any portion of the money that was paid on the settlement; and there is no allegation by the defendant now that Dettra was guilty of what he charged against him. What the defendant does say, and says in extenuation of damages, if you find against him, is that he had good ground to believe that what he said was so; and if you find that that is the fact, you ought to give him the benefit of it in estimating the damages.

[The law provides that if any one shall alter, deface or falsify any minute, document, book, or any proceeding whatever of or belonging to any public office within this Commonwealth, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished in the criminal courts].

This matter of settling the charge against Healy has been spoken of in such a way as perhaps to give you a wrong impression about it; and to correct that, I will briefly refer to a certain phase of it. Kershner, the county detective, made the information against Healy, and it is said, and I believe by Healy himself or by his counsel, that he (Healy) wished him to do it, in order, I believe, that he might have the complaint made by his friends and not by his enemies. It is said that he was afraid somebody else would arrest him, and that after this matter was adjusted in some way, and money paid, Kershner went and withdrew the charge on the justice's docket, and the costs were paid.

It has been said also that the county commissioners did not want to prosecute, and that therefore nobody should have prosecuted, and consequently that Healy was wrongfully dealt with.

If a man defaces or alters a public record, or commits a crime of that class, anybody may prosecute, and until a man has been tried and punished or acquitted within the time limited by law, he may be prosecuted once, twice or a dozen times, provided the prosecutions are taken up by the prosecutor and he is never tried. The county commissioners had not the control to say (if a record in their office was corrupted and altered) that there should be no prosecution and that if they did not prosecute, the man is to go unpunished. The county detective cannot say that successfully, nor the district attorney, nor any man living. It is the class of criminal cases that the prosecutor can settle, but his settling it does not free the defendant.

If an assault and battery is committed, or cheating by false pretenses, so that nobody is particularly injured but the person beaten or cheated, there the law says there may be a settlement; because the prosecutor has a remedy by civil action for damages. But that is not the case in larceny, murder, forging or falsifying records which affects not anyone individual or body of men, but the people generally. So far as that may throw any light upon the motives of the actors in this prosecution, you can consider it; and outside of that, it has nothing to do with the case. There was a criminal prosecution which, if it had not been ended, would have come into the court, and the defendant in that prosecution (Healy) would have been tried, and either convicted and punished, or acquitted. That criminal prosecution was settled although the parties had no power to settle it. And, as all agree, what Healy said of Dettra was said in regard to the settlement of that criminal prosecution.

Now Healy says that he had reason to believe that Dettra was involved in what he alleged was the unrighteous extorting from him of a sum of money. [If he has convinced you that he had good ground to believe that, although it turned out afterwards that he was mistaken, then you will receive that in mitigation of damages]; you will receive that as the reason why damages against him should not be so severe. If he has not made out that defense, of course you will give it no weight, and find damages the same as if that defense had not been set up.

Healy testifies, and I believe other witnesses, that it was said that he had been blackmailed, and that this prosecution was stirred up against him for the purpose of blackmailing. It is proper, of course, to receive that; [and if that and the other testimony bearing on the point convinces you that he had reason to believe that Dettra had something to do with it, you may treat it in the manner I have just now pointed out. But if not, you cannot give it such effect]; because if Healy was blackmailed and if he had reason to believe that certain people had blackmailed him but had no reason to believe that Dettra had anything to do with it, then he would not have been warranted in making the charge that Dettra had blackmailed him.

Healy says that when he paid the $325 Jacobs said: "This money is not all for me; this has to be divided into seven or eight shares;" and that the two Rothermels have some of it to get—these are members of the bar, one of them district attorney; and to the other Healy had given a fee to represent him in that prosecution —and that the two Kershners had some of the money to get, and that Bland and Dettra had some to get, and then, I believe, it is said that certain others were mentioned also. Healy says that Jacobs said to him that thus the money was to be divided. Mr. Jacobs denies it totally, says there was nothing of the kind said; but that what Healy paid there, he paid him and John Rothermel, the other lawyer whom Healy had employed.

Now, which of these two men remembers correctly what was said? Which of them do you believe, if they remember correctly what was said? If Healy's testimony is taken and Jacobs' is rejected, then you may well say that Healy had reason to believe that Dettra had shared in the division of the money, because he had been told so by a man whom he had employed as his attorney. But if Mr. Jacobs' statement is believed to be true and Healy's untrue, then, so far as that is concerned, he had no reason to believe that Dettra had received part of the money paid.

Healy testifies that at Bissinger's saloon one of the county commissioners had said that if he (Healy) would give Dettra $20 or $25, Dettra would settle the case; and that Dettra had told him (Keller) so. If that is true, Healy had reason to believe that Dettra was implicated in the matter; and therefore he would have an excuse to have the damages reduced. But Colonel Keller says that is not true, that no word of the kind was said that he mentioned nothing to Healy about Dettra's wanting to settle the case, or that it would take $20 or $25.

Which of these two men remembers what was said there? And if they remember equally, which of the two will you believe? This is material upon the question of damages. If what Healy says is true and what Keller says is untrue, then Healy had reason to believe that Dettra was a partner in the transaction of extorting, of sharing in the money; but if Colonel Keller is believed, and Mr. Healy is not believed, then that ground of defense falls.

Now is there anything else in the case as it was developed before you by which Healy can convince you that he had reason to believe that Dettra had shared in the money paid? I believe they all agree in saying that Dettra was never at Jacobs' office, or at any of the places where they met to settle the case, nor was he at the 'squire's when the prosecution was brought or settled.

If on the points to which I have specially directed your attention, you find that Healy is not borne out, but that Jacobs' and Colonel Keller's statements are believed, and if you cannot find any other evidence to lead you to believe that Healy had cause to think that Dettra was involved in getting money from him and shared in it, and [if you find that the words alleged were spoken of the plaintiff regarding his profession as a lawyer and something he had done in it, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover]; and if he has convinced you that on the defendant's part there was any express malice, you can find punitive damages. On the other hand, if you believe Mr. Healy, you can give him the benefit of his belief in the way I have indicated.

[As a further defense, the defendant says that at the time he uttered these words he was not responsible; that he had been sick in body and in mind, and that his mind was affected in such a way that on the second of September, 1885, when he is alleged to have uttered these words, he was not responsible; that he was unable to control his utterance by the exercise of his will, in other words that his mind was so much affected that he could not by the exercise of his will power control his own words. If that is proved, then you would have the position of a man who was either insane, or for all practical purposes so far as it relates to these questions the same as insane, and ought not to be held responsible for his acts. If that is true, your verdict would still have to be in favor of the plaintiff; because my opinion is, as a matter of law, that that would not turn the plaintiff out of court; but the plaintiff would be entitled to only nominal damages, six cents or some other small sum.]

But, before that defense can avail the defendant, he must prove to you that he was of unsound mind or had no control of his utterances; that he could not help what he spoke. If it does not amount to that, it is no defense; although if there was weakness to a less degree than that, it might be received in mitigation of damages.

Certain persons, the defendant, members of his family, certain physicians and others, have testified to this condition of Mr. Healy. He had been sick years ago, afflicted in body and mind; and it is alleged that he is not a well man now, and that he has certain physical and mental troubles under which he labors. All this evidence you will consider, and you will consider how he was in September, 1885.

When we come to consider the state of health, whether of body or mind, of an individual, at a certain day, we can, of course, consider how it was before and afterwards, but only in order to throw some light upon his condition at the point of time in question. Here the question is how Mr. Healy was at the time of the alleged uttering of the slanderous words. If he was irresponsible, could not help what he said, could not control his words, you will give it the effect I have already indicated, and find only nominal damages for the plaintiff, some small sum. [But if the defendant has not satisfied you of that fact—that his condition was such that he is not to be held responsible, then of course, he would not be benefited by that point which he has made in this case.]

Because a man may be irritable, or inclined to get angry, or excitable, will not excuse him when he is sought to be charged with the consequences of his slander. Actions for slander lie not only where the slanderers are cool and deliberate; but the consequences are visited upon men generally, provided they are in their right mind and have control of their utterances. It will not do for a man to say: "Simply because I am excitable, irritable, and get angry soon, and then talk too much, if I slander another, he shall recover nothing, or shall recover only a small sum;" but that immunity only is given to men who have lost their reason, who cannot control their utterances, and who are to be held irresponsible by reason of mental deficiency. You will consider all that the witnesses said on this point, how Mr. Healy was, referring to his mental condition years ago, and how he is now; and from all this, if you can, you shall say how he was at the time the alleged slander was uttered. If he was irresponsible, you will give him the benefit of it; [if he has not convinced you of that fact, you will treat the case the same as if that particular defense had not been made.]

I believe that after I have answered the points of the parties, all the instructions have been given to you which are required. You will understand that wherever the court announces a rule of law, it is your duty to receive that as the law; because, if the court should be wrong in stating the law, it could be corrected in a higher court. What the court says is reduced to writing, and may be reduced to print and reviewed in the supreme court. While if the jury should disregard it, and make a law of their own, there would be no record as to what rules they had laid down and acted upon, and the party injured by your mistake, if you made a mistake, would have no redress. When the court speaks of matters of fact, and indicates to you how you should regard them, that instruction is not binding; because all questions of fact are for the jury, and they have entire control of them.

I will now answer the points submitted on the part of the defendant. * * *

2. "If the jury believe that, from information derived from any other person or persons, or from any circumstances which connected the plaintiff with the prosecution instituted against Healy, Healy believed that the plaintiff had received a portion of the money that Healy had paid to settle that prosecution—such belief would disprove the allegation of malice in the utterance of the words claimed by the plaintiff to have been uttered by defendant on September 2, 1885; and as the plaintiff has proved no special damage suffered by him in consequence of the utterance of such words, he is not entitled to a verdict for more than nominal damages."

Ans. Negatived. I cannot affirm that in such event nominal damages—that is a trivial sum such as 6¼ cents only can be given.

3. "If the jury believe that Healy, the defendant, at the time of the utterance of the words charged as slanderous in this case, was, and had been, for some time prior thereto, laboring under great excitement of mind, in consequence of the annoyance and disgrace of the charge preferred against him, of altering the assessment of his property, and the prosecution against him for such act; that he was in a condition bordering upon mental aberration, and was thereby unable, by reason of physical and nervous disability, to control the operations of his mind, he was thereby rendered irresponsible, and the verdict of the jury should be for the defendant."

Ans. Negatived.

4. "Under the pleadings and evidence in this case, there can be no recovery against the defendant."

Ans. Negatived.

The defendant's counsel has suggested that considerable has been said before you about a certain plea of justification which at one time was on the record. In an action of slander a defendant may plead "Not guilty," or he may plead "Justification," which substantially is saying: "I have said the words, and they are true;" or he may plead both.

In this case it appeared in your presence that there had been a plea of justification placed on record by the defendant; and at the time this trial was begun, that plea was withdrawn by the defendant, by leave of the court. It is now complained that it was argued before you that inasmuch as the defendant had put in that plea and left it on record for thirteen months, it was an additional injury to the plaintiff, and therefore perhaps you ought to be more severe on the defendant. You ought not to give it that effect. The parties put that plea upon the record, and they afterwards withdrew it, and so for all legal purposes and for all purposes which you may consider, it is the same as if they had not put it on record at all.

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff, for $3,000.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in refusing a change of venue; the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets; the answers to the defendant's points; the rejection of certain testimony on behalf of the defendant; and that the charge did not adequately present the case but prejudiced the jury against the defendant.

Messrs. G. A. Endlich and J. W. Ryon, for plaintiff in error:

Under the Act of March 30, 1875 (P. L. 35, 2 Purd. Dig. 1355), changes of venue shall be made in any civil cause in law or equity depending in any of the courts of this Commonwealth in the cases following, to wit: Whenever a large number of the inhabitants of the county, in which such case is pending, have an interest in the question involved therein, adverse to the applicant, and it shall appear by the oath of such applicant that he believes he cannot have a fair and impartial trial; whenever it shall be made to appear to the court that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county in which such cause is pending.

In the present case, the utterance sued for as slanderous arose out of the circumstances attending the criminal prosecution against Healy for changing the figure 9 to 0 in the assessment book. All these circumstances were bound to be inquired into upon the trial of the cause. In this inquiry, one of the principal questions involved in the case, every tax payer and citizen of the county was essentially interested adversely to the petitioner.

A defendant is responsible only for the meaning which the words used by him, reasonably interpreted, convey to the understanding of the persons in whose presence they were uttered.

Brettun v. Anthony, 103 Mass. 39, 40; Fowle v. Robbins, 12 Mass. 148.

"When the words are susceptible of a harmless meaning, it is for the plaintiff to show that they were used in a libelous and not in a harmless sense. If the plaintiff attributes to them a much wider and more extensive meaning than they fairly warrant, or the words do not fairly bear the meaning imputed to them, the defendant will be entitled to a verdict."

2 Add. Torts, § 1158, citing Broome v. Gosden, 1 Man. G. & S. 728; Williams v. Gardiner, 1 Mees. & W. 249.

The natural meaning and effect of the words spoken, as interpreted and understood in themselves, cannot be enlarged by the innuendo.

Shaffer v. Kintzer, 1 Binn. 537; Packer v. Spangler, 2 Binn. 60; Gosling v. Morgan, 32 Pa. 273; Hill v. Boswell, 2 Pittsb. Reports, 336; Adams v. Stone, 131 Mass. 433; Brown v. Piner, 6 Bush (Ky.) 518; Weil v. Altenhofen, 26 Wis. 708.

This meaning and effect are to be gathered, not only from the particular phrase complained of as slanderous, but from its context, as well; and if the context negatives the idea that the meaning contended for by plaintiff was that in which the words were spoken—if the "poisonous words are accompanied with the antidote to the poison"—no action lies.

Colbert v. Caldwell, 3 Grant, 181; Stitzwell v. Reynolds, 67 Pa. 54; Hall v. Adkins, 59 Mo. 144; McCaleb v. Smith, 22 Iowa, 242; Hayes v. Ball, 72 N. Y. 418; Edie v. Brooks, 2 Bright. Dig. 2188, 5; Castleman v. Hobbs, Cro. Eliz. 428.

The action given to professional men and tradesmen on account of words spoken of them in relation to and to the injury of their business is not meant to extend to them and their characters a higher protection than is secured to other citizens, but for the purpose of affording equal security to all.

Goodenow v. Tappan, 1 Ohio, 60.

They may be assailed in their profession or trade in a manner, and are exposed to attacks to which others are not liable. For such cases this action gives redress. It cannot be used for a term of general obloquy and reproach applied to the plaintiff as a citizen merely, any more than if he did not follow his particular profession or trade. Id.

Being called a "blackmailer" might, it is conceivable, prove an injury to a person in any avocation; and if he can show that it did so, and that it was untrue, he may recover; but it charges no indictable and infamous crime; and hence, without such proof, is not generally actionable.

Stitzell v. Reynolds, 67 Pa. 54; Kimmis v. Stiles, 44 Vt. 351. McKee v. Wilson, 87 N. C. 300.

In every reported case that it has been possible to find, in which an attorney was permitted to recover in such an action, the slander was directly and explicitly connected with his professional character.

Rush v. Cavenaugh, 2 Pa. 187; Garr v. Selden, 6 Barb. (N.Y.) 416; Goodenow v. Tappan, 1 Ohio, 60; Chipman v. Cook, 2 Tyler (Vt.) 456.

There was nothing of the kind in this case. Mr. Dettra's profession as an attorney at law was not referred to. No such reference can be fairly gathered from the allegations of the declaration, and though judge and jury think the publication proved libelous, yet, if on the record it appears not to be so, judgment must be arrested.

Hearne v. Stowell, 12 Ad. & Ell. 731; Goldstein v. Foss, 6 Barn. & C. 159; Solomon v. Lawson, 8 Q. B. N. S. 837.

The colloquium, which sets forth the matter to which the conversation relates, and the innuendo, which alleges the meaning of it, must both be established as true, before the plaintiff can show a right of action.

Barger v. Barger, 18 Pa. 489, 492.

But even if there were something in the character of the charge of blackmailing or in the evidence, to connect it with Dettra's profession as a lawyer, the word "blackmailer" was so qualified, by the context, as to rob it of its sting. "Blackmail" is defined as "Extortion of money from a person by threats of accusation or exposure, or of opposition in the public prints."

Webster.

"Money extorted from a person as a condition for refraining from making charge of offense against him, or publishing something to his prejudice * * * in common parlance, and in general acceptation, equivalent to and synonymous with extortion—the exaction of money either for the performance of a duty, the prevention of an injury, or the exercise of an influence. It supposes the service to be unlawful, and the payment involuntary."

1 Abb. Law Dic. 151.

"Money extorted from persons under the threat of exposure in print for an alleged [offense."

Edsall v. Brooks, 3 Robt. (N. Y.) 298.

Healy said: "You are a blackmailer; I mean thereby that, as Jacobs told me, you received a part of the $825 I paid to settle a criminal prosecution." To "receive" does not mean to "extort." Hence it is said in Edsall v. Brooks, 17 Abb. Pr. (N.Y.) 221; S. C. 2 Robt. (N.Y.) 29, that a charge of blackmailing "imports criminal exaction of money, and is not justified by evidence that the plaintiff (a policeman in that case) received a gratuity in violation of a rule of the department."

In slander it is sufficient if the substantial slanderous words are laid and proved.

Hersh v. Ringwalt, 3 Yeates, 508.

But it is not permitted to drop altogether both the language and ideas uttered, and sum up all in one round charge, and then leave it to the jury to say whether the words proved amounted to that charge.

Tipton v. Kahle, 3 Watts, 90, 93.

Hence, a witness cannot be permitted to state the impression produced on his mind by the whole conversation.

Harrison v. Bevington, 8 Carr. & P. 708.

Damages can be recovered only for the words charged in the declaration.

Ward v. Dick, 47 Conn. 300.

It could not be allowed to the plaintiff to support an averment that defendant had said "he is guilty of perjury" by words altogether different, even if they imported that charge.

Tipton v. Kahle, 3 Watts, 90, 93; Bundy v. Hart, 46 Mo. 460; Tucker v. Call, 45 Ind. 31; McConnell v. McKenna, 10 Irish C. L. 511; Armitage v. Dunster, 4 Doug. 291.

The substance of the words laid, i. e., the material words conveying the slander, must be proved; Johnston v. Tait, 6 Binn. 120; and their sense and the manner of speaking them, must be the same as laid in the declaration.

Long v. Fleming, 2 Miles, 104.

Whether the proofs vary from the allegations is always a matter for the court.

Oxley v. Storer, 54 Ill. 159; Hendrick v. Kellogg, 3 Greene (Ia.), 215; Birch v. Benton, 26 Mo. 153.

The very words need not be proved; but where they are in fact proved, they must, it seems, correspond with the very words laid.

Foster v. Small, 3 Whart. 141.

In the present case the words proved did not correspond with the very words laid. Instructions, correct in the abstract, may be erroneous as applied to the issue.

Mitchell v. Mitchell (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 277.

A jury is to decide upon the basis of evidence, legally brought before them, not upon the basis of their own knowledge of the circumstances connected with the case acquired by them, individually, outside of it.

Clarke v. Robinson, 5 B. Mon. 55.

Where actionable words are laid in the declaration and have been proved, evidence of the repetition of the same words after suit brought may be admitted in aggravation of damages.

Kean v. M'Laughlin, 2 Serg. & R. 469.

It was said in Wallis v. Mease, 3 Binn. 546, 549, that, after proving the words laid in the declaration (which were actionable) plaintiff might give in evidence other words, not actionable, to show malice.

Anger: Freeman v. Tinsley, 50 Ill. 497; sudden passion: Flagg v. Roberts, 67 Ill. 485; heat of passion and excitement: Mousler v. Harding, 33 Ind. 176; have always been regarded as elements in mitigation of damages.

It must be shown, in order to a recovery, that words uttered in a case of mutual provocation, affected the standing and reputation of the aggrieved party.

Johnston v. Barrett, 36 La. Ann. 320.

If the actual damages are merely nominal, punitive damages are not recoverable.

Stacy v. Portland Pub. Co. 68 Maine, 279.

Instructions must be interpreted in connection with the evidence.

Wood v. Pennell, 51 Maine, 52.

Probable cause for suspicion and honest belief in its correctness are uniformly held to be potent factors in mitigation of damages.

Porter v. Botkins, 59 Pa. 484; Minesinger v. Kerr, 9 Pa. 312; Williams v. Mayer, 1 Binn. 92, note; Beehler v. Steever, 2 Whart. 313; Kellogg v. Cary, 3 Penr. & W. 102; Doe v. Roe, 32 Hun (N.Y.) 628; Hudson v. Dale, 19 Mich. 17; Knobell v. Fuller, Peake's Add. Cases, 139.

In all civil cases the degree of proof required from a party to sustain his allegations is only such as results from a preponderance of evidence. An instruction to the jury that even a slight preponderance of proof will be sufficient to justify a verdict for the party in whose favor it is found has been held correct.

Chapman v. McAdams, 1 Lea (Tenn.) 500.

So an instruction that all that is required is a "fair" preponderance of proof.

Bryan v. Chicago etc. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 464; Zonker v. Cowan, 84 Ind. 395.

On the other hand it has been held error to charge the jury that a party's case must be established by a clear preponderance: Bitter v. Saathoff, 98 Ill. 266; or by testimony in which the jury had implicit confidence: Ott v. Oyer, 106 Pa. 6; or by weight of the evidence: Shinn v. Tucker, 37 Ark. 580; or that the party must clearly prove his case: Beach v. Clark, 51 Conn. 200; or clearly and fairly: Hall v. Wolff, 61 Iowa, 559; or that the jury must be well satisfied of the truth of his case: Monaghan v. Agricultural Fire Ins. Co. 53 Mich. 238; or that he must satisfactorily prove it by a preponderance of evidence: Bauchwitz v. Tyman, 11 Ill. App. 186; or that the jury must be satisfied from a preponderance of evidence: Brent v. Brent, White v. Gale, and Balohradsky v. Carlisle, 14 Ill. App. 256, 275, 289.

That, taken singly, no part of a charge may be pronounced to be clearly erroneous, and yet that as a whole it may mislead, is a matter familiar to the minds of lawyers and judges.

Wenger v. Barnhart, 55 Pa. 300, 310, citing Philadelphia etc. R. R. Co. v. Spearen, 47 Pa. 303; Reeves v. Delaware etc. R. R. Co. 30 Pa. 460; and hence such general tenor is ground for reversal: Washington etc. Ins. Co. v. Rosenberger, 3 W. N. C. 16; 33 Legal Int. 338.

Messrs. Henry C. G. Reber and H. Willis Bland, for defendant in error:

The power to change the venue in civil and criminal cases shall be vested in the courts, to be exercised in such manner as shall be provided by law.

Const. art. 3, § 23.

Under the Act of March 30, 1875, the court is not compelled to change the venue in civil cases, if any of the causes for a change mentioned in the Act are regularly averred, unless satisfied of the truth of them. Whether the facts alleged are true or not is left to the decision of the court.

Pa. R. R. Co. v. Phila. R. R. Co. 2 Pearson, 299.

Error cannot be assigned on a matter in the discretion of the court below; Pringle v. Pringle, 59 Pa. 281; Waldron v. Waldron, 55 Pa. 231; Dubois v. Glaub, 52 Pa. 238; Helfenstein v. Leonard, 50 Pa. 461; unless in a clear case of abuse of the discretion vested in the court.

Gallagher v. Miller, 34 Legal Int. 355; Commonwealth v. Bartilson, 85 Pa. 482.

Words spoken of a plaintiff in the way of his profession or trade are actionable, without proof of any special damages.

Rush v. Cavenaugh, 2 Pa. 189; M'Clurg v. Ross, 5 Binn. 218; Sanderson v. Caldwell, 45 N. Y. 398; White v. Carroll, 42 N. Y. 161; Foot v. Brown,* 8 Johns. (N.Y.) 64; Chipman v. Cook, 2 Tyler, (Vt.) 456.

It must injure the plaintiff's reputation to disparage him in his very means of livelihood.

Odger, Libel, * p. 64.

To render words actionable it must appear they were spoken of the plaintiff in his profession, business or vocation; "As, to say of an attorney, you are well known to be a corrupt man and to deal corruptly." 4 Rep. 16; or to charge an attorney with being a "common barrator."

Cro. Car. 192.

Any words tending to impair his credit, spoken of a person in relation to his trade or profession, are actionable.

Davis v. Davis, 1 Nott & McC. 290.

Where the court sees that the words spoken affect the plaintiff in his office, profession or trade, and directly tend to prejudice him, then they ask for no further proof of damages.

Odger, Libel, * p. 64.

Words to be actionable on this ground "must touch the plaintiff in his office, profession or trade;" that is, they must have been shown to have been spoken of the plaintiff in relation thereto, and to be such as would prejudice him therein. They must impeach either his skill or knowledge, or his official or professional conduct.

Odger, Libel, * p. 65.

It must always be averred on the record that the words were spoken of the plaintiff in the way of his business, and in relation to his office, profession and trade, and that he held such office, or was actively engaged in such profession at the time the words were spoken.

Odger, Libel, * pp. 64, 68; Bellamy v. Burch, 16 Mees. & W. 590; Forward v. Adams, 7 Wend. 204; Van Tassell v. Capron, 1 Denio, 250.

Where words clearly refer to the plaintiff's office and his conduct therein, or otherwise touch and injure him therein, it is unnecessary that the defendant shall expressly name his office or restrict his words thereto; it shall be intended that he was speaking of him in the way of his office or trade.

Odger, Libel, * p. 124; Kinney v. Nash, 3 N. Y. 177.

The words must impute to him misconduct in that character.

Ireland v. McGarwich, 1 Sandf. 155.

But it is by no means necessary that the defendant should expressly name the plaintiff's office or trade at the time he spoke, if the words would necessarily affect the plaintiff in his office or business, his credit and reputation therein.

Jones v. Littler, 7 Mees. & W. 423; Odger, Libel, * p. 543.

Blackmail in common parlance, is synonymous with extortion, the exaction of money, either for the performance of a duty, the prevention of an injury, or the exercise of an influence; it supposes the service to be unlawful and the payment involuntary.

Edsall v. Brooks, 2 Robt. (N. Y.) 29; 26 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 326; 17 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 221; 3 Robt. (N. Y.) 286.

Proof of speaking the slander is by calling those who heard the defendant speak the words.

Odger, Libel, * p. 538.

It was never necessary to prove all the words laid in the declaration, if the words that are proved are intelligible and actionable by themselves.

It is sufficient if the words alleged and those proved are the same in substance.

Estes v. Antrobus, 1 Mo. 197.

The plaintiff is not bound to prove the slanderous words precisely as said; the substance of the charge will be sufficient.

Hume v. Arrasmith, 1 Bibb, 165; Williams v. Miner, 18 Conn. 464, 474; Hersh v. Ringwalt, 3 Yeates, 508; Cummin v. Smith, 2 Serg. & R. 441; M'Connell v. M'Coy, 7 Serg. & R. 226; Foster v. Small, 3 Whart. 140.

The plaintiff may give evidence of all "surrounding circumstances," i. e. the cause and occasion of publication, later statements made by the defendant, and other extraneous facts which will explain and point the allusion.

Odger, Libel, * p. 540; Broome v. Gosden, 1 Man. G. & S. 728.

What the speaker intended to convey is immaterial in all actions of defamation.

Odger, Libel, * p. 93; Hankinson v. Bilby, 16 Mees. & W. 445.

It will then be for the jury to say whether the plaintiff's construction of the words is borne out by the evidence.

Odger, Libel, * p. 102.

The general rule as to the interpretation of words is that the words spoken are to be construed in the sense in which they are understood by those who hear them.

Backus v. Richardson, 5 Johns. 476.

The meaning of words not unavoidably imputing something derogatory to the person of whom they are published must be submitted to the jury.

Lewis v. Chapman, 16 N. Y. 369.

The court can only pronounce them prima facie libelous.

Cooper v. Stone, 24 Wend. 434.

Nice exceptions are never allowed to prevail against a reasonable interpretation and common understanding of slander.

2 Wils. 87, 114, 300.

The words shall be taken in the same sense as they would be understood by those who hear or read them.

Bull, N. P. 3, 4.

Words are not to be received in mitiori sensu, but in the plain and popular sense in which the world in general understands them.

Lukehart v. Byerly, 53 Pa. 418; Brown v. Reiter, 21 Pitts. 143; Peters v. Ulmer, 32 Legal Int. 441; Dorland v. Patterson, 23 Wend. 422; Woolnoth v. Meadows, 5 East, 468.

It is the duty of a judge to say whether a publication is capable of the meaning ascribed to it; but when the judge is satisfied of that, it must be left to the jury to say whether the publication has that meaning or not.

Add. Torts, § 1169, p. 391; Sturt v. Bragg, 10 Q. B. N. S. 908; Odger, Libel, * p. 101.

The court will take notice of the import of words in popular parlance.

Call v. Foresman, 5 Watts, 331.

It must appear to the court from the words set out in the declaration that they are capable of conveying or bearing the defamatory meaning assigned to them, and if so it is for the jury to determine whether in point of fact the construction put upon the words by the plaintiff is borne out by the evidence.

2 Add. Torts, § 1153.

"The sense in which words are received by the world is the sense which courts of justice ought to ascribe to them on the trial of an action for slander."

Rue v. Mitchell, 2 Dall. 58 (2 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 288.)

In civil cases the court is bound to instruct the jury as to whether the publication is libelous, supposing the innuendoes to be true.

M'Corkle v. Binns, 340; Hays v. Brierly, 4 Watts, 392; Snyder v. Andrew, 6 Barb. 43; Green v. Telfair, 20 Barb. 11; Hunt v. Bennett, 90 N. Y. 173; Pittock v. O'Niell, 63 Pa. 257, 258.

The only criterion of the meaning of words as used on any occasion is the understood meaning in the community, society or individuals to whom they are addressed.

Edsall v. Brooks, 3 Robt. (N. Y.) 284.

It is for the judge to decide whether the language is capable of the meaning ascribed to it by the innuendo, and for the jury to decide whether such meaning is truly ascribed.

Vanderlip v. Roe, 23 Pa. 82; Barger v. Barger, 18 Pa. 489; Pittock v. O'Niell, 63 Pa. 253.

In Pennsylvania the court is bound to instruct the jury whether the publication is libelous or not.

Townshend, Slander, 530; Pittock v. O'Niell, 63 Pa. 253.

An innuendo may be defined to be an averment which explains the meaning of the defendant's publication, by reference to facts previously ascertained by averment or otherwise.

Starkie, Slander, p. 256; 1 Lord Raym. 256.

Whether the language is capable of bearing the meaning assigned by the innuendo is for the court; whether the meaning is truly assigned to the language is for the jury.

Blagg v. Sturt, 10 Q. B. N. S. 899; 3 H. L. Cas. 395.

And if the court is of the opinion that the words were capable of the meaning ascribed to them by the innuendo, and there is any evidence to go to the jury, that they were used with that meaning, then it will be for the jury to decide whether in fact the words were understood in that sense by those who heard or read them.

Odger, Libel, * p. 540.

The charge must be taken as a whole.

Reeves v. Delaware etc. R. R. Co. 30 Pa. 460; Lehigh Valley R. R. Co. v. Brandtmaier, 5 Cent. Rep. 144, 113 Pa. 619; Watts v. Cummins, 59 Pa. 88; Kerr v. Sharp, 14 Serg. & R. 403; Carothers v. Dunning, 3 Serg. & R. 373.

The jury take into consideration every consequence which the words used would have a tendency to produce, but not merely problematical or eventual damages which may possibly happen, or possibly may not.

Even if no evidence be offered by the plaintiff, as to damages, the jury are in no way bound to give nominal damages only; they may give such substantial damages as will compensate the plaintiff for such defamation.

Tripp v. Thomas, 3 Barn. & Cress. 427; Odger, Libel, *p. 293.

Where the derangement was great and notorious, so that speaking the words could produce no effect on the hearers, it was manifest that no damage would be incurred; but where the degree of insanity was slight, or not uniform, the slander might have its effect, and it would be for the jury to judge upon the evidence before them, and measure the damages accordingly.

Dickinson v. Barber, 9 Mass. 225; Odger, Libel, *p. 354.

It is a common-law principle that a lunatic is liable for any tort he may commit, although he is not punishable criminally. When one receives an injury from the act of another, this is a trespass, although done by mistake or without design; consequently there is no reason why a lunatic should not be held liable.

Morse v. Crawford, 17 Vt. 502.

Ordinarily in an action for a personal injury, the damages are graduated by the intent of the party committing the injury; but when the defendant is a lunatic, as he has properly no will, the only correct measure of damages is the mere compensation of the party injured.

Krom v. Schoonmaker, 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 647; Bush v. Pettibone, 4 N. Y. 300.

The general rule is that lunatics are liable civilly for all torts or wrongs committed. But there is one exception to this rule, which is that a lunatic is not liable for slanderous words uttered by him while totally deranged.

Bryant v. Jackson, 6 Humph. 199.

In this case there was no attempt to prove that the defendant's mind had become so weakened by disease that no one regarded what he said.

Where insanity is alleged, the burden of proof is on the party making the allegation, notwithstanding its negative character.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 81, pp. 113, 114; Coyle v. Commonwealth, 100 Pa. 580.

The measure of proof must be determined by the character of the issue being tried, and not by the character of an issue which is not being tried. The amount of evidence required must depend, in a great measure, upon the character of the issue to be tried. If there are no opposing presumptions, a mere preponderance of evidence, however slight, must necessarily turn the scale. The strength of the preponderating evidence must be in proportion to the strength of the presumption to be overcome; or perhaps it is more accurate to say that there is no preponderance, unless the evidence is sufficient to overcome the opposing presumption as well as the opposing evidence.

Knowles v. Scribner, 57 Me. 495.

By satisfactory evidence, which is sometimes called sufficient evidence, is intended that amount of proof which ordinarily satisfies an unprejudiced mind beyond reasonable doubt.

The word positive is defined by Webster to mean "direct," "express," opposed to "circumstantial." The proof should be "satisfactory;" it may be such without being "positive."

Schrack v. McKnight, 84 Pa. 30.

The phrases "if you believe," "if you are satisfied," "if you are convinced," only imply the existence of a state of mind involving the assumption of a fact as proved to such a degree of belief that the believing subject would act upon the belief in the common concerns of life.

Johnston v. Commonwealth, 85 Pa. 54.

It is not error for the court to comment on the evidence, nor to express an opinion on the weight thereof, if the facts be left to the jury.

Bonner v. Herrick, 99 Pa. 220.

The refusal of a point which might properly have been affirmed, but the affirmance of which would not have benefited the party submitting it, is not cause for reversal of the judgment against said party.

Per Curiam:

It is clear that a large number of the inhabitants of the county did not have an interest in the question involved in the trial, adverse to the defendant below, so as to make it obligatory on the court to order the change of venue. When the change is asked for on the alleged ground that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county in which the suit is pending, a reasonable discretion must be left to the court in ascertaining the truth of the averment. No such clear abuse of that discretion is shown in this case as to justify us in holding there was any error in the refusal.

Notwithstanding the able and zealous argument of the counsel for the plaintiff in error, we are not able to sustain any of the thirty-five specifications of error.

We discover no error relating to the admission of evidence. The points were correctly answered and the testimony was submitted to the jury in a fair charge.

Judgment affirmed.

1. For a tort committed by a married woman both in the presence and in the absence of her husband, the husband and wife are jointly liable.
2. The refusal to deliver up another's chattel on demand is a tortious conversion of the chattel.
3. It seems that a contract expressly "of renting only and not a sale, conditional or otherwise," by which a sewing machine "valued at $50" is "rented" for fourteen months for the sum of $10, and the further sum of $3 per month, by the "party of the first part" to "the party of the second part," the latter not to move the machine from his residence without the consent of the former, but to be the "agent" of the former "in holding and keeping possession of said machine," to have the machine "so long as it is properly used and kept at the place agreed upon, and so long as the rent shall be faithfully and promptly paid," and to deliver the machine to the former "at the expiration of the time for which the machine is rented" with the "option" on the part of the latter to "purchase" it within ten days thereafter for $1—— is to all intents and purposes a bailment.

JULY Term, 1886, No. 116, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lehigh County, to review a judgment of compulsory nonsuit in an action of trover. Reversed.

The facts, as they appeared at the trial before Albright, P. J., were as follows:

On May 24, 1884, the defendant Maria Heil, wife of the defendant Walter Heil, entered into the following written agreement with the plaintiff for the purchase of a sewing machine for her own use:

"This agreement, made and entered into by and between Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company, of the first part, and Mary Heil, of Zionsville, Pa., of the second part.

"Witnesseth, that the party of the first part has this day rented to the party of the second part a Wheeler & Wilson sewing machine, No. 480825, style K. B. E., valued at $50, for the period of fourteen months, from the date hereof, for the sum of $10, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the further sum of $3, to be paid promptly at the office of said Company in Allentown, Pa., on the 24th day of each month, consecutively, during the continuance of this agreement, commencing on the 24th day of June next.

"And the party of the second part agrees to pay said several sums promptly, and not to move said machine from her present residence, without the consent in writing of the party of the first part.

"It is distinctly understood and agreed between the parties hereto, that this is a contract of renting only, and not a sale, conditional or otherwise, and the whole of the contract between the parties is expressed in this instrument.

"And it is further understood and agreed, that the party of the second part is to be the agent of the party of the first part, in holding and keeping possession of said machine, and that it is to be well preserved and carefully used by the said party of the second part, and delivered up to the party of the first part, on demand; but the party of the first part agrees not to demand a return of said property so long as it is properly used and kept at the place agreed upon, and so long as the rent shall be faithfully and promptly paid in the terms and spirit of this contract.

"At the expiration of the time for which the said machine is rented, the party of second part shall return and deliver the same to the party of the first part in good order, save reasonable wear. If the party of the second part

Note.—In Richel v. Munn, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 267, in the Common Pleas of Bradford County, it was held that a married woman was not empowered to confess a judgment under the Act of February 29, 1872, distinguishing McQuillen v. Singer Mfg. Co. 99 Pa. 586. This decision is in direct conflict with Singer Mfg. Co. v. Baker, cited by plaintiff in error.

In Shaw v. Dickey, 3 Pa. C. C. R., the Common Pleas of Mercer County decided the same way, holding that as, under the decisions, a married woman cannot confess judgment for necessaries, for which she would be liable by suit under the Act of 1848, for the same reason she cannot confess judgment under the Act of 1872; that under both Acts the husband is primarily liable. [J. M.]

shall faithfully keep and perform this agreement, and make all the payments therein stipulated when due, then and not otherwise, the second party may at her option purchase said machine within ten days after the time for which the same is rented, and not afterwards, by paying to the party of the first part $1 purchase money; and upon such payment the party of the first part shall sell and deliver said machine by a good and sufficient bill of sale to the party of the second part. Nothing in this agreement contained, and no payment of money pursuant hereto, excepting the payment of the purchase money as above provided, shall in anywise vest, or be understood or construed to vest, in the second party any title, legal or equitable, to said machine, or any property therein for any term whatever, or shall prevent or hinder the party of the first part from reclaiming possession of said machine whenever the party of the second part fails to pay the rent above stipulated to be paid."

In pursuance of this agreement the machine designated was put into the possession of Maria Heil in her house in Upper Milford Township, Lehigh County. The down money was paid in the surrender of an old machine, and four monthly payments were made as stipulated in the contract. By December, 1884, however, Mrs. Heil was in arrears in her monthly payments; and on the 5th of that month. Mr. E. H. Leon, the general agent of the plaintiff, and Mr. William F. Kengott, the district agent, called upon Maria Heil at her house and demanded of her the rent in arrears on the machine. She refused to pay it. The agents then demanded the machine, being prepared with a team to take it along, and Mrs. Heil refused to surrender it.

Mr. Leon then lifted the top part of the machine off the stand and took it along to Allentown, leaving the stand, including the iron wheel, treadle and head on which the machine rests, with Mrs. Heil, who made no more payments on the machine. Afterwards, and before this action was brought, Mr. Kengott went to the house of Mrs. Heil and again demanded this stand of the machine, first of Mrs. Heil, and then of Mr. Heil, and both in turn refused to surrender it, and this action was then brought to recover damages. The part of the machine detained from the plaintiff was worth $25.

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony the court entered a compulsory nonsuit, saying:

"A married woman is incapable of making a contract, except where she is specially authorized by Act of Assembly to do so, and in certain exceptional cases based upon constructions of the Act of 1848. If a married woman were sued upon this contract and by way of affirmance of it, it is probable that, under the Act of 1872, a judgment in some form could be obtained. That, however, is not the effort here; but the effort is to obtain a judgment based upon a tort, trover and conversion, against these two defendants. It is evident from the plaintiff's case that the sewing machine was placed in the hands of a married woman in pursuance of the written contract in evidence; and whether her contract be treated as an absolute sale, or as a lease, it cannot be found from this evidence that these two defendants or any one of them has been guilty of a tort.

The motion for a nonsuit is allowed, and on the same day a motion entered to take off the same."

Afterward the court refused to take off the nonsuit and this was assigned as error.

Messrs. Jas. S. Biery, and John Sparhawk Jr., for plaintiff in error:

Under the Act of February 29, 1872 (P. L. 21), a married woman may legally contract to purchase a sewing machine for her own use, on such terms as she pleases, the Legislature having set no limits as to the terms on which she may contract.

The contract in question contemplates and in terms provides for the ultimate purchase of the sewing machine and not for a bailment only. The agreement for a temporary bailment in this contract of purchase is authorized by the language of the statute. It authorizes married women, not only to purchase sewing machines for their own use, for that power they had before the passage of the Act of 1872; but it provides that "All contracts made by married women, in the purchase of sewing machines for their own use, shall be valid and binding," etc. The temporary bailment, to secure the payment by installments, and the other provisions to be observed before the final consummation of the sale, are but so many elements of the one contract in the purchase of the machine, and are necessary in order to protect the vendor of the machine, and also to conserve to the purchaser the benefits of the Act, without which she would be deprived of its beneficent provisions.

The Act should be liberally construed.

McQuillen v. Singer Mfg. Co. 99 Pa. 590.

Ordinarily the bond or other personal obligation of a married woman is void; and yet, without any enabling statute, it has been held that her bond given to secure the purchase money of land sold to her is binding upon the land and can be enforced.

Shnyder v. Noble, 94 Pa. 286; Brunner's App. 47 Pa. 67.

It matters not what the character of the purchase money obligation may be, whether mortgage, bond or notes, or whether judgment be obtained thereon by confession or suit, the result is the same.

Christner v. Hochstetler, 16 W. N. C. 369; Shnyder v. Noble, supra.

Under the Act of 1848, a married woman's power to purchase gives her a right to contract for the payment of the consideration money, so far as to charge the property with such incumbrances as may be agreed upon to secure its payment.

Patterson v. Robinson, 25 Pa. 81.

Where a married woman lives apart from her husband, and is an actual and has been decreed a feme sole trader, she is liable for an indebtedness incurred by herself in the repair and improvement of her separate estate, and suit may be maintained therefore against her alone, without joining her husband.

Winternitz v. Porter, 86 Pa. 85.

A judgment note with warrant of attorney to confess judgment, given by a married woman in the purchase of a sewing machine, is valid and binding under the Act of February 29, 1872, without the husband joining in it.

Singer Mfg. Co. v. Baker, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 118.

That this contract is an entirety cannot be controverted. There is but a single article contracted for and only a single consideration to be paid; and the intention of the parties is manifest from the terms of the contract.

The question whether a contract is entire or separable, like most other questions of construction, depends upon the intention of the parties; and this must be discovered in each case by considering the language employed and the subject matter of the contract.

2 Pars. Cont. 517, § 4; Schinn v. Bodine, 60 Pa. 182.

Whether a contract be entire or severable depends upon the intention of the parties, as gathered from the whole instrument, more than upon the specific method of performance or payment.

Quigley v. De Haas, 82 Pa. 273; Carmalt v. Platt, 7 Watts, 318.

If the consideration to be paid is single and entire, the contract must be held as entire, although the subject of the contract may consist of several distinct and wholly independent items.

2 Pars. Cont. 519; Miner v. Bradley, 22 Pick. 457.

Even purchases of a number of articles at different prices at an auction constitute an entire contract.

Tompkins v. Haas, 2 Pa. 74; Kerr v. Shrader, 1 W. N. C. 33; Coffman v. Hampton, 2 Watts & S. 377.

The plaintiff had not parted with its property in the machine, except as a bailment, at the time when its surrender was demanded on account of the nonpayment of the monthly dues, and was therefore entitled to its immediate possession under the contract; and Mrs. Heil's refusal to surrender the machine upon demand, after her default, rendered her liable in an action of trover.

A bailee is liable to his bailor in an action of trover and conversion of the property bailed.

Etter v. Bailey, 8 Pa. 442.

Whenever a person has not parted with the property, then he can assert his right, as well against an infant as an adult, as in every kind of bailment; and if the conversion is the nondelivery of the thing bailed, the owner may sustain detinue, replevin or trover.

Penrose v. Curren, 3 Rawle, 354.

If an infant take property wrongfully, this is an actionable conversion; and if it be bailed to him, and he use it for a different purpose from that for which it was bailed, the bailment is determined, and he is liable in trover.

Green v. Sperry, 16 Vt. 390; 2 Hill. Torts, 102.

Infants are generally responsible for torts, although they are not bound by their contracts.

Infancy is no defense to an action of trover or trespass for the unlawful conversion of property.

2 Hill. Torts, 521; Baxter v. Bush, 29 Vt. 465.

An infant, in an action ex delicto for an injury to property, is as fully liable for the damages as if he had been of full age.

Conklin v. Thompson, 29 Barb. 218; 2 Hill. Torts, 521.

The question of the liability in actions for torts more or less nearly connected with contracts is similar in the case of married women and of infants.

2 Kent, Com. 5th ed. 149, note 1; Id. 241, note 1.

Messrs. Henninger & DeWalt, for defendants in error:

If it is true (as the plaintiff in error contends) that the contract is an agreement of purchase, then the plaintiff's right of action in trover and conversion must fail; then the title to the machine vested in Mrs. Heil, and the only remedy left the plaintiff would be to sue for the purchase money; and in this case there is no allegation that the husband joined in the agreement; and therefore under the decision in McQuillen v. Singer Mfg. Co. 99 Pa. 586, there would be no liability as against him. No right of action would lie as against him.

If it is claimed that it is a contract of bailment or of renting, then we say that no action lies against Mrs. Heil to enforce it, because of her inability to make such a contract.

The Act of February 29, 1872, must be strictly construed; and it cannot be held that a married woman is by virtue thereof authorized to lease a sewing machine, or that her contract of renting is binding upon her. Purchase alone is mentioned and contemplated by the Act.

Although an action may be in form as for a tort, yet if the subject of it be based upon a contract there can be no recovery, when an action on the contract directly would fail; and this whether the defendant be an infant or an adult.

Keen v. Hartman, 48 Pa. 497.

Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the court:

That the contract of May 24, 1884, between the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company and Maria Heil, wife of Walter Heil, is in terms a bailment and not a sale of the sewing machine, we think cannot be doubted.

By the terms of the contract the Company "rented" the sewing machine to Mrs. Heil for a definite period at a certain rent; she agreed to become the agent of the Company in holding and keeping the possession of it, and not to remove it from the place where she then resided without the Company's consent; and at the expiration of the term or upon failure to pay the rent on demand, to deliver up the possession to the Company. On payment of the rent for the entire term specified in the contract, however, she had an option to buy, at a nominal price; but there was no present sale with a reservation of the title to secure payment.

Moreover, by the express provisions of the contract it was "distinctly understood and agreed between the parties," that the contract was "a contract of renting only, and not a sale, conditioned or otherwise," and that "no payment of money pursuant thereto, excepting the payment of the purchase money as provided, shall in anywise vest, or be understood or construed to vest, in the second party, any title legal or equitable," or "shall prevent or hinder the party of the first part from reclaiming possession of said machine," etc.

Under the very recent rulings of this court in Edward's App. and Dando v. Foulds, 105 Pa. 74, 103, and in Forrest v. Nelson, 108 Pa. 481, it must be conceded that the contract was to all intents and purposes, a bailment. Whether a given transaction is a bailment or a sale is in some cases obscure; but we think there can be no doubt as to the effect of the contract in this case.

Besides, this is a contention arising between the parties to the contract; the nature and effect of the transaction is not questioned by creditors or third parties; and if the parties were sui juris, they would of course be bound by the exact terms of their agreement, whether a technical bailment existed or not.

It may be doubted, perhaps, whether a contract of this character was authorized to be made by a married woman, under the Act of February 29, 1872. Whether it was or not, however, is we think wholly immaterial in this case. One thing is certain, that Mrs. Heil did not own the machine; she either held it upon the terms of the contract under which it came into her custody, or she did not; and in either event, the title to the sewing machine was in the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company and upon failure on her part to comply with the conditions of the contract the Company had a clear right to reclaim its property.

Assuming that the Company was bound by the contract and that Mrs. Heil was not, there could, of course, be no personal obligation on her part to pay the rent; but the right of property remained in the Company, subject to the conditions of the contract.

The rent for the machine was not paid as provided, and the Company demanded the possession of Mrs. Heil, in whose custody the Company had placed it; she refused to surrender it, not only in the presence of her husband, but in his absence; there is therefore neither proof nor presumption of coercion on his part. The Company, upon demand made, was entitled to the possession and her refusal was a tortious conversion of the property.

When a tort is committed by a wife she is personally liable, unless her husband is both present and directs the doing of it, at the time; Franklin's App. 18 W. N. C. 245, 4 Cent. Rep. 322; his presence furnishes evidence and raises a presumption of his direction, but it is not conclusive, and the truth may be established by competent evidence. Cassin v. Delany, 38 N. Y. 178.

"The true view is, when the husband is present during the commission of a tort by the wife, whether himself actively participating in it or not, prima facie the wrong shall be deemed his alone, but both in civil and criminal causes this prima facie case may be rebutted, and each of the two may be deemed in law the doer of the wrong, the same as though they were unmarried." Cord, Rights of Married Women, 1154.

They may both, therefore, be guilty of the conversion of a chattel. "Except where otherwise provided by statute, the husband is liable for the tort of the wife, during coverture; if committed in his company, and by his order, he alone is liable; if not, they are jointly liable, and the wife must be joined in the suit with her husband. And when the remedy for the tort is only damages by suit, the husband is liable with the wife." 2 Kent, Com. 149; Franklin's App. supra.

The judgment is, therefore, reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

Re Division of BERN TOWNSHIP.

1. Under article VIII, § 11, of the Constitution the division of townships, wards of cities, and boroughs into election districts is entirely within the discretion of the court of quarter sessions.
2. The Act of May 18, 1876, in so far as it prescribes the procedure by which the division shall be made, is unconstitutional and void.

(Argued March 3, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 318, E. D. Certiorari to the Quarter Sessions of Berks County, to review a judgment dividing Bern Township into two election precincts. Affirmed.

On January 31, 1887, a number of citizens of Bern Township presented a petition to the court of quarter sessions naming themselves as residents and voters of the Township, setting forth that at present the whole of said Bern Township constituted but one election district or precinct, and that it would be a great convenience to the voters of said Township to have the same divided into two election districts, and praying the said court to do so in the manner therein described and designated.

On February 7, 1887, a second or supplemental petition was presented by other citizens of said Bern Township, asking to join in the original petition.

On the same day the exceptants or remonstrants also presented their petition, protesting against the proposed division, and especially excepting to the manner of procedure, for the

NOTE.—As to the effect of the above decision. An important consideration, in connection with the above decision, may be the effect which it has upon proceedings heretofore conducted under the above Act.

It will be observed that this case simply involved the refusal of the court to follow the Act of 1876. If, however, the court should direct the proceedings in accordance with the provisions of that Act, might they not be sustained under the power given by the Constitution? While the Act itself is nugatory, the decree of the court would be an execution of the power conferred by the Constitution. If this position is correct, it will sustain proceedings heretofore conducted in accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1876.

In North Chester Borough Election District, 3 Pa. C. C. Rep. Clayton, P. J., of Delaware Co., says: "For the sake of uniformity in all legal proceedings of the same nature the Act ought to be observed."

The Act of May 10, 1878, P. L. 51, entitled "A Supplement to an Act Entitled 'An Act to Prescribe the Manner in Which the Courts May Divide Boroughs into Wards,' Approved May 14, 1874," provides that "Whenever any borough in this Commonwealth may be divided into wards, in accordance with the provisions of the Act to which this is a supplement, every such ward from and after such division shall be a separate election district," etc. It seems that this Act must fall, under the decision in the above case; and any election district, organized under the operation of this Act, without a decree of the court, creating it an election district, would be illegal. If, however, a decree of the court has been entered establishing the election district eo nomine it would seem to be valid, for the reasons before stated. [J. M.]

reason that it was not in conformity with the Act of May 18, 1876, P. L. 178.

The court below, ERMENTROUT, J., being of the opinion that the Act of May 18, 1876, did not apply to the division of townships into election districts or precincts, and without formally disposing of the remonstrance or exceptions, made the order dividing said Bern Township as prayed for.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court, 1, in granting the prayer of the petitioners; 2, in making the division without appointing commissioners, etc.; 3, in not proceeding by view, etc.; 4, in making the division upon the application of the petitioners who do not aver that they or any twenty of their number are freeholders, resident in said Township.

Mr. Adam B. Rieser, for appellants:

Article VIII, section 11 of the Constitution of Pennsylvania provides that "townships, and wards of cities or boroughs, shall form or be divided into election districts of compact and contiguous territory, in such manner as the court of quarter sessions of the city or county in which the same are located may direct; but districts in cities of over 100,000 inhabitants shall be divided by the courts of quarter sessions, having jurisdiction therein, whenever, at the next preceding election, more than 250 votes shall have been polled therein; and other election districts, whenever the court of the proper county shall be of opinion that the convenience of the electors and the public interests will be promoted thereby."

Under and by virtue of this section of the Constitution the courts of quarter sessions derive general jurisdiction of the subject matter.

The Constitution, however, does not point out how such divisions shall be made, nor the manner by which said court is to determine when the convenience of the electors requires such a division.

The Act of May 18, 1876, P. L. 178 entitled: "An Act to Prescribe the Manner by which the Courts of Quarter Sessions may Change the Boundaries of Election Districts and Townships" provides as follows:

Sec. 1. "That the several courts of quarter sessions of this Commonwealth shall have authority within their respective counties to divide townships into two or more election districts so as to suit the convenience of the inhabitants thereof."

Sec. 2. "That upon application by petition of at least twenty freeholders, resident in the township, to said court of quarter sessions, for the purpose of dividing any township into election districts, said court shall appoint three impartial men to inquire into the propriety of granting the prayer of the petition; and it shall be the duty of the commissioners so appointed, or any two of them, to make a plot or draft of the proposed new election district or districts, if the same cannot be fully designated by natural lines or boundaries, all of which they or any two of them shall report to the next court of quarter sessions together with their opinion of the same."

Sec. 3. "That when a report has been made by said commissioners, it shall be confirmed nisi by said court, which confirmation shall become absolute, unless exceptions be filed to the same not later than the third day of the next term of said court, and should exceptions be filed as aforesaid, they shall be disposed of on evidence as said court shall deem just; Provided, That if desired, a review may be had if in the opinion of the court it may be necessary to secure a fair adjudication of the same; said review to be asked for before the report has been absolutely confirmed however."

Sec. 4. "That whenever said report shall have been confirmed by the court, said court shall at the same time decree or establish the place for holding the election in the said new election district, and appoint the election board for holding the elections in said new election district till an election board shall be elected for the same as provided by law."

In Re Division of Boggs Township, 2 Cent. Rep. 376, 112 Pa. 145, although the question was not raised whether the court of quarter sessions must proceed according to the provisions of the Act of 1876, or whether it has arbitrary power under the Constitution, yet sufficient appears in the opinion of the court to indicate that the Act of Assembly must be followed, and that it is not in conflict with the Constitution.

Buckalew, Constitution, 204, 205; Re Division of Nescopeck Township, 1 Kulp, 130; Re Division of Jackson Township, 2 Kulp, 340.

The Act of May 18, 1876, P. L. 178, applies not only to a general division of a township into election districts, but also to the creation of an additional district out of a part of one of the districts, into which a township has already been divided.

Re Erection of Additional Election District in Huntington Township, 3 Kulp, 367; 14 Luz. Legal Reg. 287.

The words "townships" and "election district" in the Act of Assembly are identical with those of the Constitution. Their meaning in the one must be the meaning in the other. Sift the Act as you please, and you will not find in it a single word or idea that is repugnant or inconsistent with the Constitution. Neither does it take away from the courts of quarter sessions any power conferred by the Constitution. It simply directs how the power of the courts shall be exercised.

Messrs. Ermentrout & Ruhl, for appellees:

The Constitution lodges the exclusive power to divide election districts in the hands of the court. In the constitutional convention of 1873, Mr. White said: "I am willing to confer the power upon the court to divide election precincts whenever it becomes necessary in their judgment to have a division. * * * Just say that the court of the proper county may divide, or shall divide a district whenever the convenience of the electors and the public interests may require a division."

5 Debates, 179.

Prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, there were numerous statutes pointing out the method of dividing wards, boroughs and townships into election precincts, which required all of the paraphernalia pointed out by the petitioners in their argument; and no such division could ordinarily be made in less than six months—two terms of the sessions, and frequently more, where the same was contested. All these laws are abrogated; they no longer have existence, but are virtually repealed.

Re Contested Election of District Attorney of Dauphin County, 11 Phila. 645.

The Act of May 18, 1876, is clearly unconstitutional so far as the purposes of these proceedings are concerned.

In Re Boggs Township, 2 Cent. Rep. 376, 112 Pa. 147, the validity of the Act of 1876 was not called in question, was not raised in any form, and consequently was not passed upon by this court.

The title of this Act shows that the legislative mind overlooked the constitutional provision; there was no necessity to grant a power already conferred, nor was there need for any legislation to prescribe the manner in which the courts might make the change; for the power, being given to their discretion, necessarily carried with it the use of any means they saw fit to employ to effect the purpose.

This Act is also unconstitutional for the further reason that it is in violation of section 3 of article III, of the Constitution which requires that "no bill except general appropriation bills shall be passed containing more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title."

The avowed object in the title is to prescribe the manner of changing the boundaries of election districts and townships. A division into election precincts is one subject matter. A change of boundaries of a township is another and different subject matter.

A formal overruling of the exceptions was not necessary; the power to form election precincts being discretionary, there existed no right of exception, but simply an appeal from the rightful use of that discretion.

The order of the court was a virtual disposition of the exceptions, and was the only official act contemplated by the law. The method of procedure was satisfactory to the court; and it must be presumed that the court believed that the public interests required the division.

Mr. Adam B. Rieser, in reply:

Nothing but a clear violation of the Constitution, a clear usurpation of the powers prohibited, will justify the courts in pronouncing an Act of the Legislature unconstitutional and void.

All presumptions are in favor of the constitutionality of an Act of Assembly.

Craig v. First Presby. Church, 88 Pa. 46; Powell v. Commonwealth, 5 Cent. Rep. 890.

Our Constitution is a limitation and not a grant of power. The Legislature possesses all powers inherent in legislative bodies, unless expressly prohibited; and the prohibition must be so clear as to preclude all doubt.

Kilgore v. Magee, 85 Pa. 401.

The provision of the Constitution, prohibiting a bill from containing more than one subject, did not intend that the title of an Act should be a complete index of its contents.

Commonwealth v. Green, 58 Pa. 226; Yeager v. Weaver, 64 Pa. 425.

All that is required is that the title fairly give notice of the subject of the Act, so as reasonably to lead to an inquiry into its body. It should not mislead.

Allegheny County Home's Case, 77 Pa. 77; Juniata R. R. Co's App. 77 Pa. 429; Mauch Chunk v. McGee, 81 Pa. 433; Myers v. Commonwealth, 17 W. N. C. 9; Re Airy Street, 4 Cent. Rep. 303, 113 Pa. 231.

The Act of 1876 contains only one subject, to wit: changing the boundaries of election districts and townships. This may be done by a division into election precincts or by annexing one district or township to another.

If the title of an Act be simple, it is only those provisions that are not covered by it that are void.

77 Pa. 77; 80 Pa. 118; 95 Pa. 437.

Per Curiam:

Inasmuch as article VIII, section 11 of the Constitution declares that "Townships * * * shall form or be divided * * * in such manner as the court of quarter sessions in which the same is located, may direct," it lies not within legislative discretion to take that power from the court.

The Act of May 18, 1876, which is now invoked, is so framed as by its terms to command the quarter sessions to confirm the report of commissioners unless exceptions be filed within a given time. The court correctly held that the power still rests with the court of quarter sessions, where the Constitution placed it.

Judgment affirmed.

v.
Samuel MENGEL, Admr. of Mary Mengel, Deceased.

1. The acts of public officers de facto, coming in by color of title, are good and valid when they concern the public or the rights of third persons who have an interest in the act done.
2. An acknowledgment of a mortgage before a justice of the peace who has qualified as clerk of the oyer and terminer and quarter sessions is valid, although the Act of May 15, 1874, declares that no person shall be capable of holding and exercising both offices at the same time, and provides a fine for violation.
3. It seems that the acceptance of the money secured by the mortgage would estop the mortgagor from denying the validity of the acknowledgment.

(Argued March 2, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 17, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment for the plaintiff for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense in an action of scire facias sur mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the following opinion, delivered by ERMENTROUT, J., upon making absolute the rule for judgment:

The defendant seeks to avoid judgment upon the scire facias by alleging that Mahlon A. Sellers, Esq., the justice of the peace before whom the mortgage was acknowledged, was incompetent to do so because he was at the time of the acknowledgement also the duly commissioned and acting clerk of the Court of Oyer and Terminer and Quarter Sessions of the Peace of Berks County; that the offices of justice and clerk are incompatible; that acceptance of the latter worked a forfeiture of the former; that therefore the mortgage was void for want of a valid acknowledgment.

It is admitted that his commission as justice by its terms had not expired, and that he had neither resigned nor was removed from such office.

The Act of Assembly declaring what offices are incompatible was passed May 15, 1874, P. L. 1874, p. 187.

Section 4 of this Act, says: "No person hereafter elected shall be capable of holding and exercising at the same time the office of justice of the peace and that of prothonotary and clerk of any court." There is no provision declaring which office shall be declared forfeited. In the second section of the Act, as between state and national offices, which are declared incompatible, it is provided that the commission under the state authority shall be void.

Section 8 says: "If any person after the expiration of six months from the passage of this Act shall exercise any office or appointment, the exercise of which is by this Act declared incompatible, every person so offending shall for every such offense, upon being legally convicted, forfeit and pay any sum not less than $50, nor more than $500. Nowhere in express terms is the office declared void, nor is it in any way indicated by express words in the Act how the incumbent shall be required to make his choice between the two incompatible offices, or what action the courts of law are required to take.

Mahlon A. Sellers, Esq., was admittedly a legally commissioned and acting justice of the peace, whose commission by its terms had not yet expired, for he was commissioned March 30, 1874, for a term of five years, and the date of acknowledgment of mortgage is March 28, 1876.

Had a writ of quo warranto issued at the instance of the proper authorities, the disputed right of office might have been settled, but in the absence of any guide in the Act of Assembly, we cannot in this collateral proceeding try a question of this kind; nor has any decision been presented to us to show that performing the duties of clerk was per se a forfeiture of that of the office of justice. This question, however, it is unnecessary to decide.

So far as the public is concerned, his official acts in both capacities are good. It is a well settled principle of law that the acts of public officers de facto, coming in by color of title, are good and valid, when they concern the public or the rights of third persons who have an interest in the act done.

The case of M'Kim v. Somers, 1 Penr. & W. 302, is directly in point. The admission in evidence of a deposition was objected to because the justice before whom it was taken was not a justice of the peace, that his commission had been vacated by his removal out of the county within which he had been commissioned, and that consequently he had no power to administer the oath to the witnesses. The court held that it was sufficient that he held a commission from competent authority, and that in taking the deposition, which is an official act, he was acting in the district for which he was appointed; that this constituted him a justice de facto, with at least colorable authority, and that as long as the commission remained without being superseded by the proper authorities the validity of his acts could not be questioned; that wherever persons who have color of authority acting under commissions from the appointing power, but which it may be alleged have been forfeited by some act which may perhaps be of an equivocal nature, in all such cases the validity of the commissions cannot be examined in a suit in which they are not a party. The regular and indeed the only mode is by information.

In the case of Campbell v. Commonwealth, 96 Pa. 344, this principle is also sustained. The plaintiffs in error were tried and convicted of arson. Objection was made that two associate judges who participated in the trial and sentence had no legal title to their offices, because, under the Conttitution of 1874 and subsequent legislation, the people had no power to elect associate judges in that particular county. They had, however, been elected and commissioned by the Governor. It was held that they were judges de facto and as against all persons but the Commonwealth they were judges de jure. Having at least a colorable title to these offices their right thereto cannot be questioned in any other form than by writ of quo warranto at the suit of the Commonwealth. To the same effect are Riddle v. County of Bedford, 7 Serg. & R. 390; Keyser v. M'Kissan, 2 Rawle, 140; County of Luzerne v. Trimmer, 95 Pa. 97.

The allegations that the successor of Mahlon A. Sellers had been appointed and was holding and exercising the office of justice at the time of acknowledgment cannot avail defendant. Sellers never having resigned, no competent authority having declared a vacancy or made a removal, an election of a so-called successor and certificate of the prothonotary were powerless to create vacancy or succession; the acknowledgment of the mortgage must, therefore, be held good; the mortgage was not void and was properly recorded.

We may also add that the defendant, having upon the faith and credit of the mortgage by him thus acknowledged, obtained from the decedent $3,800, is in law, morals and common honesty estopped from denying the validity of the acknowledgment and mortgage. This is one of the cases forcibly illustrating the justice of the doctrine of estoppel: "A party shall not controvert that which was done by himself or with his assent into a wrong."

The assignment of error specified the action of the court in directing the entry of judgment in favor of the plaintiff below, for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense.

Mr. D. N. Schaeffer, for plaintiff in error: Mahlon A. Sellers, under the Act of May 15, 1874, by having accepted the office of clerk of the said courts, impliedly resigned, and ipso facto, vacated the office of justice of the peace, as fully and effectually as if he had presented his written resignation to the Governor, or had been ousted by a proceeding under a writ of quo warranto.

Rep. 87, 779; People v. Carrique, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 93; Rex v. Patterson, 4 Barn. & Adol. 9; Regents of the University v. Williams, 9 Gill & J. 365.

M'Kim v. Somers, 1 Penr. & W. 302, was a case where the justice of the peace had moved out of the county for which he had been commissioned and subsequently returned, and then continued to exercise his official functions; and it was held not to be an implied resignation, and no vacation of office ipso facto, as is the acceptance of an incompatible office. The same reasoning applies to the other cases cited by the court below.

The acknowledgment to the mortgage in question is a nullity. The mortgage for this reason is without an acknowledgment. No estate or interest in land passes by an unacknowledged mortgage. If no estate passes, no scire facias will issue on it, because a sci. fa. on a mortgage is strictly a proceeding in rem.

Wilson v. McCullough, 19 Pa. 77.

An unrecorded mortgage when properly acknowledged is valid between the parties to it, and a sci. fa. will lie on it.

Lancaster v. Smith, 67 Pa. 427.

But a mortgage without an acknowledgment, is of no validity between the parties. The Act of May 28, 1715, § 8, provides: "That no deed or mortgage or defeasible deed in the nature of mortgages hereafter to be made, shall be good or sufficient to convey or pass any freehold or inheritance, or grant any estate therein for life or years, unless such deed be acknowledged or proved and recorded (within six months after the date thereof), where such lands lie, as hereinbefore directed for other deeds." The words "deed or mortgage," relate solely to "mortgages and defeasible deeds in the nature of mortgages."

Burke v. Allen, 3 Yeates, 355.

The provisions requiring mortgages to be recorded within six months after the date thereof was changed by the Act of March 28, 1820, and is now only useful for the purpose of giving notice and of regulating the priority of liens. But that portion of the Act regulating the execution of a mortgage or defeasible deed is still in force; and unless a mortgage is acknowledged as therein directed it is of no effect. While in a deed an acknowledgment is only necessary for the purpose of recording it, yet in a mortgage an acknowledgment is necessary to make it efficacious.

Myers v. Boyd, 96 Pa. 428.

An acknowledgment of a mortgage by the mortgagor before a competent officer being therefore absolutely necessary to give it any validity, nothing can be substituted for it.

Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & Ell. 469; Reel v. Elder, 62 Pa. 317; Commonwealth v. Moltz, 10 Pa. 527; Ayres v. Wattson, 57 Pa. 360.

Duff v. Wyncoop, 74 Pa. 300.

In courts of law estoppels are for the most part reconcilable to the purest morality; and when they produce neither hardship nor injustice they merit indulgence if not favor.

Martin v. Ives, 17 Serg. & R. 364.

A defendant whose indorsement upon a promissory note is a forgery, cannot be permitted to prove the forgery, he having admitted to the holder (before he purchased it) that it was genuine.

Cohen v. Keller, 93 Pa. 123.

We do not contend that since the Act of May 15, 1874, a man may exercise both offices at the same time, and assert a legal right to take the fees and emoluments arising therefrom; but we hold that any official act which he may do for third persons in either capacity, so long as his commission has not been vacated by the courts, or superseded by the Governor, is valid, he being an officer de facto with at least colorable authority. The distinction is whether third persons or the officer himself is affected thereby. If the former, they are valid. If the latter, and he thereby seeks some advantage, personal to himself, he may not do it.

M'Kim v. Somers, 1 Penr. & W. 297; Riddle v. Bedford Co. 7 Serg. & R. 392; People v. Collins, 7 Johns. 549; Fowler v. Beebee, 9 Mass. 231; Commonwealth v. Slifer, 25 Pa. 23.

The reason that the act of an officer de facto, where it is for his own benefit, is void, is because he shall not take advantage of his own want of title, which he must be conusant of; but where it is for the benefit of strangers, or the public, who are presumed to be ignorant of such defect of title, it is good.

Keyser v. M'Kissan, 2 Rawle, 140.

In Clark v. Commonwealth, 29 Pa. 129, the defendant was indicted for murder; before trial he interposed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, in which was averred that the Hon.

Alexander Jordan, acting as President Judge of the Court of Oyer and Terminer of Montour County, had not been elected according to the provisions of the Constitution. The court sustained the Commonwealth's demurrer to this plea.

In Campbell v. Commonwealth, 96 Pa. 344, the defendant after conviction in the court of oyer and terminer, moved for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment, averring that the two associate justices who sat during the trial were not legally qualified judges of the court, their offices having been abolished in that county by the Constitution of 1874. The motion was overruled.

The mortgage evidences the fact that Mr. Sellers held his office of justice of the peace by a title regular upon its face. The affidavit of defense admits that he at that time held a commission as such officer; all inquiry, therefore, into the validity of his title to such office and whether his acceptance of an office incompatible therewith worked a forfeiture thereof, is immaterial to this controversy.

Per Curiam:

The able and satisfactory opinion of the learned judge fully sustains the conclusion at which he arrived.

2. Although the right of a vendor to rescind a sale, because of the failure of the vendee or his refusal to pay, continues so long as any weighing, measuring or other things remain to be done on his part*, yet this test does not apply to the question of the vesting of the title in a case where the vendor has no cause of rescission.

4. Actual delivery, weighing and setting aside are only circumstances from which the intention may be inferred.
5. Plaintiffs gave defendant written agreements, reciting that plaintiffs thereby agreed to sell and had sold to defendant "and agreed to deliver on board of cars at siding" all lumber thereinafter mentioned, whenever defendant should so direct. The lumber was described as being in piles of about a certain number of feet each. The price per foot and the aggregate sum were given, "more or less, whatever it may be," to be paid for as specified. The receipt of hand money was acknowledged "as part payment on above balance, whatever it may be, to be settled likewise as soon as the correct amount can be arrived at." The piles were marked as defendant's. Defendant pointed them out as his to several persons, wrote about them as his, ordered them covered and would not permit plaintiffs to fill other orders from them without replacing the quantity taken out. Defendant also gave his notes for the estimated amounts and paid them when they fell due. Part of the lumber was shipped to defendant, the rest was destroyed by fire. Plaintiffs brought assumpsit for the value of the lumber destroyed. Held, that plaintiffs were entitled to recover. Delivery was complete and the title passed when the piles were estimated and marked to defendant.

Mercur, Ch. J., dissented, on the ground that something remained to be done according to the terms of the contract.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lycoming County, to review a judgment on a finding for the plaintiffs in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

This action was tried before the court, CUMMIN, P. J., without a jury.

His finding was as follows:

I. The plaintiffs were extensive manufacturers of lumber at Muncy, in this county, where their mill and lumber yard were located. The defendant was an extensive dealer in lumber, and resided in Kutztown, Berks County.

II. In October, 1879, the defendant came to the plaintiffs' place of business to buy lumber. One of the plaintiffs', now deceased, went with the defendant into the lumber yard, and after examination the defendant selected six or seven piles and parts of piles of different grades of lumber, at prices per thousand then agreed upon. The piles thus selected were then marked with the name of the defendant, "J. R. Gonser."

The exact amount contained in the piles was not known, but for the purposes of the sale a careful estimate was made by the parties. A person was called up to witness the sale. Shortly afterwards the defendant reduced to writing his understanding of the sale and sent the following bill of sale to the plaintiffs to be executed by them and returned to him, which was accordingly done:

"Muncy, Oct. 17, 1879.

We hereby agree to sell and have sold to John R. Gonser, of Kutztown, Pa., and agree to deliver on board of cars at our siding all such lumber as hereinafter mentioned whenever said Gonser may order and direct to have the same loaded within a reasonable time given for loading, all white pine lumber, being the same, or more, as mentioned as follows, to wit-

1 pile 6-4, about 15,000 feet, called shop, at $20.50	307.50
1½ pile 4-4, about 20,000 feet, called barn, at $14	280.00
1½ pile 4-4, about 30,000 feet, called culls, at $11	330.00
The whole amounting to about	$1,327.50

more or less, whatever it may be, to be paid by note, dated Nov. 5, five months after date, due on 1st of April, 1880, for which we hereby acknowledge receipt of said John R. Gonser's note, as above stated, for $1,300; also $10 in cash, as part payment on above balance, whatever it may be, to be settled likewise as soon as the correct amount can be arrived at.

(Signed) D. Clapp & Co."

III. In December, 1879, the defendant again came to the plaintiffs' place of business to buy more lumber. Terms of sale were agreed upon at the office in the evening, and the next day the defendant and one of the plaintiffs went on the yard; and after careful inspection and examination, the defendant selected the piles of lumber he wanted. The piles so selected were then marked "J. R. Gonser."

The exact amount contained in the piles was not known, but for the purposes of the sale a careful estimate was made by the parties. Some time afterwards the defendant reduced to writing his understanding of the sale, and sent the following bill of sale to the plaintiffs, to be executed by them and returned to him, which was accordingly done:

"Kutztown, Jan. 6, 1880.

We hereby agree to sell and have sold to John R. Gonser, of Kutztown, Pa., and agree to deliver on board of car at our siding, all such lumber hereinafter mentioned whenever said Gonser may order and direct to have the same loaded, all white pine lumber, being the same, more or less, mentioned as follows, to wit: four piles of 12-inch stock culls, about 100,000 feet, all that the four piles contain, whatever culls or barn that are in the piles marked may contain, at $14 per thousand feet, $1,400; also one pile 6-4 selects and better, containing about 14,000 feet, more or less, at $30, $420.00; total amounts to about $1,820.00 more or less, whatever it may be, to be paid by note dated Jan. 5, 1880, four months after date, due on the 5th of May, 1880, for which we hereby acknowledge receipt of his note due May 5, 1880, for $1,000 (one thousand dollars), as part payment on the above, balance to be paid in the same way as soon as the exact amount can be arrived at, which becomes all due May 5, 1880.

(Signed) D. Clapp & Co."

IV. Subsequently, from time to time, portions of this lumber were shipped as ordered by the defendant, and payments were made by him of the notes which he had given as part payment of the same. The defendant pointed out to another member of the firm plaintiff, and also to their employee, the piles of lumber he had bought, speaking of them as his lumber, saying, "this is my pile," "that is my pile," etc. In his letters the defendant always ordered his lumber to be shipped and gave directions how he wanted his lumber covered to protect it from the weather. When plaintiffs sold lumber of same grade to another party, defendant refused to allow them to fill the order from his lumber, unless they would replace the quantity as he might desire. Thus the defendant from the dates of the sales exercised acts of ownership of the lumber sold.

V. April 10, 1880, a destructive fire broke out in the plaintiffs' lumber yard, and all the lumber therein was destroyed, including what remained of the lumber sold to the defendant. Neither party had any insurance on the lumber sold.

VI. The plaintiffs, alleging that the transactions were and were intended to be perfect sales on the days named in the bills of sale, and that the title to the lumber sold then rested in the defendant, now claim from him the balance of the consideration named in the bills of sale. The defendant, alleging that the transactions were and were intended to be executory agreements to sell lumber; that the lumber destroyed by fire was in the same condition as when the agreements were made; that the exact quantity of lumber sold and the exact amount of the whole consideration to be paid has never been ascertained and fixed, now claims that he has overpaid the plaintiffs for all the lumber he has received from them.

VII. The statements of accounts submitted by the parties include other sales and shipments by the plaintiffs to the defendant. At the argument of this case it was conceded that if plaintiffs were entitled to be paid for the lumber in question, which, as destroyed by fire, the balance due from the defendant would be $1,666.10, with interest from May 5, 1880; and that if plaintiffs were not entitled to be paid for the said lumber, then there would be a balance due from the plaintiffs to the defendant of $376.60, with interest from April 6, 1880.

VIII. The only question in dispute in this case is, Which of the parties shall bear the loss of the lumber sold by the plaintiffs to the defendant, which remained in plaintiffs' lumber yard and was destroyed by fire April 10, 1880? This question is to be answered by ascertaining from all the evidence whose lumber it was at the time of the fire. If at that time the lumber was the property of the plaintiffs, they must bear the loss. If it was the property of the defendant, he must bear the loss. The loss follows the title.

IX. In Bigley v. Risher, 63 Pa. 155, a sale is thus defined: "'Sale,' said Mr. Justice Wayne in Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. 544 [49 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 1191], 'is a word of precise legal import both at law and in equity. It means, at all times, a contract between parties to give and to pass rights of property for money—which the buyer pays or promises to pay to the seller for the thing bought and sold.'" Huthmacher v. Harris, 38 Pa. 498; Bowen v. Burk, 13 Pa. 148.

In Benjamin, Sales, 4th Am. ed., Vol. 1, p. 315, the law of England on the sale of a chattel, as declared by Park, J., in Dixon v. Yates, 5 Barn. & Adol. 313-340, is thus stated: "I take it to be clear that by the law of England the sale of a specific chattel passes the property in it to the vendee without delivery. * * * Where there is a sale of goods, generally, no property in them passes till delivery, because until then the very goods sold are not ascertained. But where by the contract itself the vendor appropriates to the vendee a specific chattel, and the latter thereby agrees to take that specific chattel and to pay the stipulated price, the parties are then in the same situation as they would be after a delivery of goods in pursuance of a general contract. The very appropriation of the chattel is equivalent to delivery by the vendor; and the assent of the vendee to take the specific chattel and to pay the price is equivalent to his accepting possession. The effect of the contract, therefore, is to vest the property in the bargainee."

In the same volume, page 330, the rule deducible from the American decisions is thus stated: "In the absence of an express agreement, the intent that title shall pass at once by the contract, although the seller is to deliver, is inferred where the buyer is to give notice of time and place of delivery, where payment in full is made, where the buyer employs the seller to remove the property, or where there is other evidence that the continued possession of the seller is merely for the convenience of the buyer, or that the removal of the goods is made by the seller as agent for the buyer."

X. In this State, as between vendor and vendee, I find the law to be as follows: "If any part of the price is paid down, if it be but a penny, or any portion of the goods delivered, by way of earnest, the property of the goods is absolutely bound by it; and the vendee may recover the goods by action as well as the vendor may the price of them." Gibson, C. J., in Hazard v. Hamlin, 5 Watts, 202.

Property in a chattel is not changed by a sale and delivery on conditions to be afterward performed if they are not performed; but where the delivery is absolute, and the bargain is perfect or capable of being made so by reference to something else or an arbiter, the ownership is transferred. It is certain enough when the price can be obtained by mere computation; therefore, a sale of a large raft at so much per 1,000 feet, and delivery to the buyer, changed the property, although it was to be counted, and that was not done, there being nothing more to be done by the seller. Opinion by Gibson, C. J., in Scott v. Wells, 6 Watts & S. 357.

In Winslow v. Leonard, 24 Pa. 14, which is the leading case in this State, and seems to be a leading case in all the States and cited with approval in England, it was decided as follows: "Though the right of a vendor of goods to rescind the sale, because of the failure of the vendee, or of his refusal to pay, continues so long as any weighing, measuring or other thing remains to be done on his part, yet this test does not apply to the question of the vesting of the title in a case where the vendor has no cause of rescission. Weighing and marking goods and setting them aside are evidence of a perfect sale, so as to vest the title in the vendee, but not proof of it nor essential to it. As between vendor and vendee it is specification and not delivery that is necessary to the vesting of the title. That the bargain is by words in past or present time is not conclusive evidence of a perfect sale: for if it appears that the vendor did not then own the article contracted for, or that it was not yet in existence or not selected out of a lot of similar articles, then the subject matter of the contract remains undefined, and it is incompatible with the very nature of things to call it a perfect sale. Where a contract of sale is in lawful form the vesting of the title depends upon the intention of the parties, to be derived from the contract and its circumstances."

XI. In the case at bar the plaintiffs were the owners of lumber sold; the thing sold was in existence and was selected out of a lot of similar articles, was distinctly marked and designated. The exact quantity being unknown, a careful estimate was made by the parties and substituted for the purpose of the sale, so that a full price might be stated. The defendant (vendee) prepared bills of sale which were executed by the plaintiffs, in which appropriate words were used to specify and designate the subject matter of the sale, and to make a perfect sale whereby the title would pass to the vendee; the defendant paid the earnest money and afterwards paid the notes as they became due; from time to time he ordered portions of his lumber shipped to his customers, which was done; and he exercised and continued to exercise unquestioned rights of ownership over the lumber sold, up to the time it was destroyed.

XII. After careful examination and consideration of the law and all the evidence in this case, I arrive at the conclusion and find that the title to the lumber in question vested and was intended by all the parties to vest in the defendant at the time the sales were consummated. The circumstances that the plaintiffs were to load the lumber on cars as ordered by the defendant, and that if the estimate of quantity was afterwards found to be incorrect, money was to be paid or refunded, as the case might be, in no way affect this intention of the parties that the title should vest in the defendant. It may also be observed here that it does not appear in the evidence how the exact amount of lumber sold was to be ascertained.

XIII. The points of fact submitted by the counsel for plaintiffs are affirmed.

All the points of law submitted by the counsel for plaintiffs are affirmed.

As to the five points of fact submitted by counsel for the defendant, they are all affirmed, except the third, which is refused; as it does not appear in the evidence that payments were made in the manner indicated. As to the five points of law submitted by counsel for the defendant, they are all refused, except the first, which is affirmed.

XIV. I find for the plaintiffs the sum of $1,666.10, with interest from May 5, 1880, making a total of $2,237.57.

XV. It is ordered that judgment be entered in this case in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant, for the sum of $2,237.57 unless exceptions are filed sec. reg.

The defendant's points of law which were refused were these:

2. That the two contracts dated October 17, 1879, and July 6, 1880, are executory.

3. That both of the said contracts provide that the lumber was to remain upon the mill yard of the plaintiffs; that the same was to be shipped upon the order of defendant, and that the amount to be paid by him for the said lumber was to be ascertained only when the said lumber was shipped according to his orders.

4. That when said lumber was destroyed by fire it was in precisely the same position as when the defendant purchased it; it was in the same piles and parts of piles; it had not been shipped, and neither the quantity of lumber nor the amount to be paid therefor had been ascertained, nor could they be ascertained until the lumber was shipped as provided for by the said contracts. The risk, therefore, remained with the vendors, and they cannot recover in this action.

5. That under the law and the evidence the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, and judgment must be for the defendant.

The assignments of error specified the refusal of these points, and also the conclusion of the court set forth in paragraph XII of the finding.

Mr. Henry C. Parsons, for plaintiff in error:

So long as anything remains to be done as between the vendor and the vendee for the purpose of ascertaining the amount and price of the article, the property and risk remain in the vendor; it is not changed.

Nicholson v. Taylor, 31 Pa. 130; Scott v. Wells, 6 Watts & S. 368; Thompson v. Franks, 37 Pa. 329.

Nor does earnest or part payment aid in vesting the title where the quantity is yet to be ascertained and there is no delivery. Under such circumstances the contract is essentially executory, and the part payment only shows a concluded and binding agreement.

Nesbit v. Burry, 25 Pa. 210; Hanson v. Meyer, 6 East, 614; Shepley v. Davis, 5 Taunt. 617.

If Mr. Gonser had failed, is it conceivable that the vendors would have delivered him the lumber?

Mr. J. A. Beeber, for defendants in error:

The findings of fact by the court below when trial by jury is waived will not be disturbed by this court.

Brown v. Susquehanna Boom Co. 1 Cent. Rep. 56; Jamison v. Collins, 83 Pa. 359; Lee v. Keys, 88 Pa. 175; Brown v. Dempsey, 95 Pa. 243.

As between the vendor and vendee, where the lawful form of contracting is pursued, the vesting of the title to personal property always depends upon the intention of the parties, and is to be derived from the contract and its circumstances, and when the property has been specified and selected, when the contract has a distinct subject matter, when the vendor has title, when the price has been agreed upon, and payment made on account, then all the elements of a perfect and complete sale exist and the title to the personal property immediately vests in the vendee; and if afterwards destroyed by fire, the loss is that of the vendee.

1 Benj. Sales, 4th Am. ed. 328, 336; Hazard v. Hamlin, 5 Watts, 202.

Applying this principle to the case at bar, the piles of lumber became the property of plaintiff in error, because he paid in money and notes at the time the bargain was made; and portions of the piles were shipped to him and his customers on his orders.

The question is whether the parties have agreed upon all the terms and done all the things which they intended should enter into the contract and be preliminary to the transfer of the property and this is a question of fact. The meaning of the parties must be ascertained from what they said and did.

Scott v. Wells, 6 Watts & S. 357.

In the case at bar the vesting of the title to the piles of lumber has been decided by the court below from what the parties did and said at the time the bargain was made; and if it be a question of fact, under the authority of Scott v. Wells, it cannot now be disturbed, and must be as conclusive as the verdict of a jury.

Although the right of a vendor of goods to rescind the sale, because of the failure of the vendee or of his refusal to pay, continues so long as any weighing, measuring or other thing remains to be done on his part, yet this test does not apply to the question of the vesting of the title in a case where the vendor has no cause of rescission. Weighing and marking goods and setting them aside are evidence of a perfect sale, so as to vest the title in the vendee, but not proof of it nor essential to it. As between vendor and vendee it is specification and not delivery that is necessary to the vesting of the title. That the bargain is by words in past or present time is not conclusive evidence of a perfect sale; for if it appears that the vendor did not then own the article contracted for, or that it was not yet in existence or not selected out of a lot of similar articles, then the subject matter of the contract remains undefined, and it is incompatible with the very nature of things to call it a perfect sale. Where a contract of sale is in lawful form, the vesting of the title depends upon the intention of the parties, to be derived from the contract and its circumstances.

Winslow v. Leonard, 24 Pa. 14; McCandlish v. Newman, 22 Pa. 465; Nicholson v. Taylor, 31 Pa. 130; White v. Welsh, 38 Pa. 420; Pa. R. R. Co. v. Hughes, 39 Pa. 527; Rochester Oil Co. v. Hughey, 56 Pa. 325; Rietz's App. 64 Pa. 165.

Sale is a word of precise legal import in law and equity; it means at all times a contract between parties to pass rights of property for money which the buyer pays or promises to pay to the seller for the thing bought and sold.

Huthmacher v. Harris, 38 Pa. 498; Bowen v. Burk, 13 Pa. 146; Bigley v. Risher, 63 Pa. 155.

Nicholson v. Taylor, 31 Pa. 130, was expressly decided upon the written bill of sale.

Thompson v. Franks, 37 Pa. 329, was a contest between an execution creditor of a vendor and the vendee.

Nesbit v. Burry, 25 Pa. 208, was decided upon the point that the contract required the cattle to be weighed on scales particularly named, which was not done.

Even if the contracts in the case at bar for the purchase of the piles of lumber were only executory, yet as more than one half of the lumber was shipped to the plaintiff in error before the fire, this was an appropriation of part of the goods to the fulfillment of the contract, which will convert an executory contract of sale into an executed one.

Records v. Phila. etc. R. R. Co. 9 Phila. 55.

Mr. Justice Gordon, delivered the opinion of the court:

In Lee v. Keys, 88 Pa. 175, we held, following Jamison v. Collins, 83 Pa. 359, that a writ of error to a reference under the Act of April 22, 1874, brought up only questions of law arising on bills of exceptions to the rulings of the judge, and that his conclusions on the facts of the case must be regarded in the same manner as the verdict of a jury.

This case has since been followed by Brown v. Dempsey, 95 Pa. 243, so that we may regard it as established that this court will not reinvestigate the facts as found by the judicial referee. Such being the case, our task in the matter in hand is an easy one.

According to the finding of the learned judge, we understand that the plaintiffs were the owners of the lumber sold; that this lumber was actually manufactured, and placed in separate piles; that it was selected by the defendant, and distinctly marked and designated; that as the exact quantity was unknown an estimate was made by the parties for the purposes of sale; that bills of sale were prepared by the vendee, and were signed by the vendors, in which appropriate words were used to specify and designate the subject matter of the sale, and to perfect the sale and title to the vendee.

The defendant paid the earnest money, gave his notes for the estimated amounts, and paid them as they became due; that portions of the lumber were shipped, from time to time, on his orders, and he exercised and continued to exercise unquestionable rights of ownership over the lumber up to the time it was destroyed by fire.

What we have here stated is the substance of the findings; and an examination of the evidence satisfies us that they were warranted by the testimony. Now, if there be any doubt as to the law governing this case, it may be dissipated by reference to Winslow v. Leonard, 24 Pa. 14, where it was held, that though the right of a vendor to rescind a sale, because of the failure of the vendee, or his refusal to pay, continues so long as any weighing, measuring or other thing remains to be done on his part, yet this test does not apply to the question of the vesting of the title in a case where the vendor has no cause of rescission.

It is further said in the same case that where the lawful form of contracting is pursued, the vesting of the title always depends upon the intention of the parties, to be derived from the contract and its circumstances, and that actual delivery, weighing and setting aside are only circumstances from which the intention may be inferred. When these undoubted rules of law are applied to the defendant's contention it is found to have no substantial foundation. Not only selection and marking of the lumber, but the bills of sale and the delivery of the defendant's notes, expressed the fixed intention of the parties to make the sale a present and positive one.

Nothing of any materiality remained to be done; the delivery was complete when the piles were estimated and marked to Gonser; and that they deferred a full settlement until the quantity was exactly ascertained upon shipment was of no consequence in the way of passing title. That the plaintiffs may have had the right to have refused to allow the boards to be taken from their yard, had the defendant neglected to comply with his contract, is possible; but as there was no such neglect and, therefore, no necessity for the exercise of such right, we need not discuss what might have been under different circumstances.

From what we have before us we are free to say that the rulings and judgment of the court below were in all particulars correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

Mercur, Ch. J., dissents as something remained to be done according to the terms of the contract.

William H. DIMMICK, Owner or Reputed Owner and Contractor et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
E. H. COOK CO., Limited.

1. Under the Act of June 16, 1836, a mechanics' lien may be filed for articles consisting of heating, laundry and cooking apparatus furnished in the construction of a hotel.
2. Such articles are permanent in their character, and necessary for the use to which the building is to be applied.

(Argued Feb. 24. Decided March 14, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 285, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Wayne County, to review a judgment on a finding for plaintiff in an action of scire facias on a mechanics' lien. Affirmed.

The facts, as found by Seely, P. J., on trial before the court, without a jury, are stated in the opinion.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in holding the building subject to a lien for the various articles, and in entering judgment accordingly.

Messrs. W. H. Dimmick and H. Wilson, for plaintiffs in error:

There is no Act of Assembly giving a lien, specifically, for any of the materials furnished for the building in the present case. The nearest approach to this is the Act of 1855, giving a lien for the erection of grates and furnaces; and the plaintiff below seeks to extend this to steam heating apparatus.

The law does not give a lien for everything done to make a building ready for the business which the owner intends to engage in. A lien for certain materials is given, not because they are necessary to equip the building in all particulars for the purpose for which it is designed, but because they are intended for use in the erection or construction of the building, to become thereby an integral and component part of the structure.

The question here is not whether certain articles were so attached to the freehold as to become realty, but whether the Mechanics' Lien Law gives a lien for furnishing them. If it does not, then the circumstance that they have become part of the realty is of no consequence.

Mr. George G. Waller, for defendant in error:

In so far as the steam heating apparatus and engine are concerned, if they are not covered by the Act of April 14, 1855, extending liens to plumbing, gas fitting and furnishing and erection of grates and furnaces, they are covered by the Act of 1836.

An engine, machinery and case, constituting a hoisting machine or elevator, are realty, when put in by the owner as a part of his building. Schenck v. Uber, 81 Pa. 34.

All of the machinery and fixtures, put in by defendant in error, are so attached to the building that they would necessarily pass with a sale of the realty.

Ege v. Kille, 84 Pa. 333; Morris' App. 88 Pa. 368; Justice v. Nesquehoning Valley R. R. Co. 87 Pa. 28; Seeger v. Pettit, 77 Pa. 437; Hill v. Sewald, 53 Pa. 271.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a scire facias upon a mechanics' claim. The articles in dispute consisted of heating, laundry and cooking apparatus, including a large stock or soup kettle. The building in which they were placed was a large hotel; and they were a part of the original construction of said building, the contracts therefor having been made while it was being erected. They were not temporary fixtures such as a tenant would place in the building for his own convenience, but were permanent in their character, and placed there by the owner as necessary for the use to which the building was to be applied.

Neither the Act of 1836 nor any of its supplements gives a lien specifically for the articles above mentioned. The nearest approach to it is the Act of 1855 which gives a lien for "the erection of grates and furnaces." The heating apparatus, however, in this case did not consist of either grates or furnaces, but of boilers with steam pipes running through the building. Much less could grates and furnaces be held to include laundry and cooking apparatus.

We are of opinion, however, that this claim can be sustained under the Act of June 16, 1836. By the first section of said Act it is provided that "Every building erected within the several counties of this Commonwealth * * * shall be subject to a lien for the payment of all debts contracted for work done or materials furnished for or about the erection or construction of the same."

It has always been conceded that for engines and machinery, constituting a part of a new mill, there was a lien under the Act of 1836; but if placed in the mill or about it, and no constituent part of the erection, they were not within the lien laws. Summerville v. Wann, 37 Pa. 182.

The test is whether they are a part of the original erection, and necessary for the purposes for which the building was intended.

This was a large hotel, capable of accommodating 200 guests. For such a building, permanant apparatus for heating, washing and cooking are as essential as are engines and boilers in a mill. It is true you can eat, wash and cook without them. So you can grind flour and saw lumber by hand; but the world has outgrown such a mode of doing business, and it is proper that both legislation and judicial decision should keep abreast of the times. A building with only walls and a roof is neither a hotel nor a factory. It is a building, nothing more. When a man constructs a building for a hotel, everything of a permanent character which will pass as a part of the freehold, and which is reasonably necessary to equip it for the purpose for which it is erected, is a part of such building, and therefore comes within the Act of 1836. This has often been said before, and we now repeat it.

Judgment affirmed.

EASTON BOROUGH, Plff. in Err.,

v.

John RINEK et al.

1. In an action to recover damages by the owner of land against a municipality for damages for the taking of the land for a street, a reference to the street as a boundary in a deed to private parties, held, not to operate as a dedication, so as to prevent the recovery of damages.
2. The right to damages did not accrue until the street was opened.

(Argued March 10, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 224, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas of Northampton County, to review a judgment on a verdict in an appeal from the report of reviewers assessing damages for land appropriated for a street. Affirmed.

The plaintiffs, John, Thomas and Henry Rinek, offered in evidence deeds to Jacob Rinek, one dated in 1839 and another in 1856; also the record of proceedings in partition in the estate of Jacob Rinek, to show that the property in question became vested in John Rinek; also, deeds of John Rinek and wife to Henry Rinek, and deeds of John Rinek and wife to Thomas Rinek, for the undivided third part. It was then admitted by the defendant that, by proceedings in partition, the property in question became vested in John Rinek and by him the two thirds undivided interest in it was conveyed to Thomas and Henry Rinek.

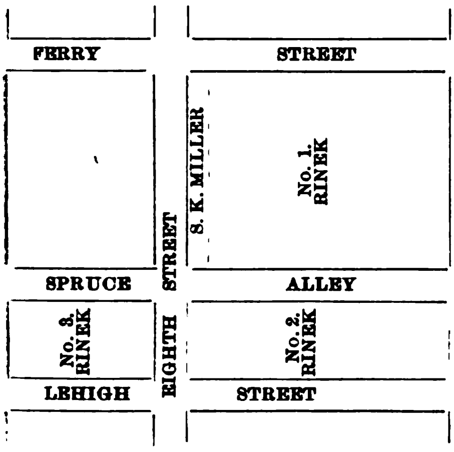
The defendant offered in evidence the records of the recorder's office, to show that Jacob Rinek, during his lifetime, made conveyances by which he recognized the existence of Eighth Street; also the official borough map of the Borough of Easton, for the purpose of showing the jury that Eighth Street had been marked on the borough chart for many years, and that it has the official stamp of the Corporation of the Borough of Easton upon it, and that if Jacob Rinek in his lifetime sold any lots on Eighth Street, or that if he made any conveyances by which he recognized the existence of Eighth Street, that is a fact which in itself dedicates Eighth Street to public use, and that these plaintiffs who claim title to this property through Jacob Rinek are estopped from setting up any claim for damages for the taking of any land for the opening of Eighth Street.

Objected to, for the reason that the record of the deed which is offered in evidence is not a record of the conveyance of any part of the property in question, and for the reason that the grantee in that deed is not a party to this suit nor interested in the result of it, and generally that it is incompetent and irrelevant, and that the defendant cannot prove the dedication of Eighth Street, from Lehigh to Spruce Street, by offering the record of the conveyances of another property situated on that street in evidence—a property not between the same two points—that is, not between Spruce Street and Lehigh Street;—and objected to further—that the borough map appears to have been made in 1873, after the death of Jacob Rinek.

By the Court:

"The objection is sustained and bill sealed for the defendant."

The only deed from Jacob Rinek referred to in the evidence, was that to S. K. Miller, for land indicated in the following draft of the premises:



This deed described the lot as "situated on the northeast corner of Ferry and Eighth Street as laid out on a new plan of said town; thence, etc. to said Eighth Street, thence along the east line of said Eighth Street," etc.

The deeds from John Rinek and wife to Henry Rinek and Thomas Rinek, dated March 18, 1869, described lot No. 3 as "situated on the west side of Eighth Street."

The charge of the court to the jury by SCHUYLER, P. J., was as follows:

The undisputed facts are that on May 4, 1885, the authorities of the Borough of Easton opened Eighth Street, in this Borough, between Lehigh and Spruce Streets, and that in so doing they took for the purposes of the new street a strip of land belonging to the plaintiffs, sixty feet in with by 196 feet in depth.

The present proceeding has been instituted under the Act of Assembly, to recover damages which plaintiffs allege they have sustained by reason of this action on the part of the defendant Borough.

Plaintiffs claim that they are entitled to be compensated in damages, to the extent of the value of the land thus taken by the defendant and we so say to you, subject to the qualification to be presently mentioned. [You have heard the testimony as to the value of the land taken. The witnesses differ widely in their estimates; but it is your duty to reconcile these differences as best you may, and to say what this value was at the time the street was opened; and your verdict will be for that sum, together with interest to the present time, unless you find that the property of the plaintiffs, which remained after the opening of Eighth Street, was benefited by the opening of said street.]

Defendant contends that the opening of Eighth Street enables plaintiffs to cut up their remaining property to better advantage and that its value was thereby enhanced. It is for you to determine how the fact is. [If you find that the remaining property has been benefited by the opening of the new street, you will next find how much; and your verdict will be for the value of the property taken, less the enhanced value of the property not taken, together with interest on the balance from May 4, 1885, to the present time.]

The assignments of error specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets, and also the following:

1. The court erred in rejecting the offer of the record in evidence, showing that Jacob Rinek in his lifetime made sundry conveyances of lots, with reference to the official plan of said Borough, by which he recognized the existence of Eighth Street as a public street.
2. The court erred in rejecting the offer of the record in evidence of the official map of the said Borough, showing that said Eighth Street was marked and designated thereon as a public street, prior to the said conveyances made by Jacob Rinek, and also prior to the conveyances made by John Rinek to Thomas Rinek and Henry Rinek.

The court below dismissed the rule for a new trial in the following opinion:

"None of the authorities cited by the learned counsel for the defendant go to the length that the sale of a lot described as bounded by a street is sufficient evidence of the dedication of such street to public use no matter how long the street may be or how many streets may intersect it; and I should hesitate to be the first to announce such a doctrine. In the case in hand Ferry and Spruce Streets furnish an outlet to the vendees of Jacob Rinek both ways, and this is all that can fairly be said to have been within the contemplation of the parties. By holding that the dedication extends to all the lots within the same block, it is going as far as there is precedent and as far, I am of opinion, as the justice of the present case requires. See 1 Hill, 189."

Mr. Wm. Beidelman, for plaintiff in error:

The record of these conveyances should have been admitted in evidence to prove the dedication of Eighth Street to public use by the plaintiffs' predecessor in title.

Re Pearl Street, 2 Cent. Rep. 308, 111 Pa. 565.

Re Thirty-Second Street, 19 Wend. 128, decides that where a street is designated on a commissioner's map as passing over certain lands and the owner of the lands subsequently sells them on such street, such act alone, without any user by the public, is deemed a dedication of the whole street, so far as it passes through his land, to public use.

Schenley v. Commonwealth, 36 Pa. 62, holds that if a lot owner lease or sell lots, describing them as bounded by certain streets, this is sufficient evidence of the dedication of such street to public use.

In Re Thirty-Ninth Street, 1 Hill, 191, it is held that by such a conveyance the owner dedicates his adjoining land in the site of the street.

In City v. Ash, 38 Legal Int. 292, where the description in a deed was "to a street intended to be opened" it was held to be a dedication.

In Re Story Street, 11 Phila. 456, the same doctrine is held: that where the owner of land sells lots on a street designated on a confirmed plan of a city, no recovery can be had for damages by reason of the opening of such streets.

In estimating the damages sustained by the opening of a street the proper measure is the difference between what the property would bring in the market before the improvement and what after the improvement was made, without reference to the purpose for which it may be used.

Cummings v. Williamsport, 84 Pa. 472; Shenango etc. R. R. Co. v. Braham, 79 Pa. 447.

Mr. Russell C. Stewart, for defendant in error:

In Re Opening of Pearl St. 2 Cent. Rep. 308, 111 Pa. 565, there was a formal dedication of the street.

In Re Story Street, 11 Phila. 456, the street was laid out of the width of twenty feet. Afterwards it was put on the city plan as of thirty feet in width. One Freeman sold to one Pierson, on Story Street, a lot described as situate on the north side of Story Street, as laid out and opened, of the width of thirty feet. This was part of the same block as the strip of ten feet for which he claimed damages. Having covenanted for a thirty foot wide street in that block he was presumed to have dedicated the remining strip of ten feet in front of his other lots in the block from Thirty-Fifth to Thirty-Sixth Street.

In Keilly's Case the grant was also after the street had been widened to thirty feet.

In Schenley v. Commonwealth, 36 Pa. 63, the streets were all opened and had been for a period of over twenty-one years.

In City v. Ash, 38 Legal Int. 292, there had been a dedication in 1855, and the deed to Ash contained notice in its words of this dedication.

In Re Thirty-Second Street, 19 Wend. 128, the deeds of the properties contained clauses as follows: "The said last mentioned piece of land and the said piece of land herein before described which on said map are laid out as a part of Thirty-Second Street are not to be inclosed but always to be and remain open as public highways." Two of the other lots were sold with reference to a map which was made by the original owner and which proved to be afterwards identical with the official map. This reference to the original map appears from the opinion of the court.

In Re Thirty-Ninth Street, 1 Hill, 101, the rule is laid down that the dedication will extend to all the lots in the same block.

In Massachusetts the rule is directly opposed to the above cases. No intention on the part of the proprietors to dedicate a street could be inferred from such facts.

Bowers v. Suffolk Mfg. Co. 4 Cush. 332.

In McCall v. Davis, 56 Pa. 434, Agnew, J., says: "Where an owner of ground lays it off into town lots, with streets and alleys for their convenient use, and sells his lots accordingly, it is a dedication of these ways to the use of the purchasers."

But this does not in all cases make them public highways.

Hall v. McCaughey, 51 Pa. 43.

In Re District of Pittsburgh, 2 Watts & S. 320, it is held the mere laying out streets, etc., for a city, under the Act of June 16, 1836, and its supplements, or under the general road law, is not of itself a taking of the property of individuals by the right of eminent domain recognized in the Constitution; and it is only when they are actually opened and applied to public use that the owners are entitled to compensation.

In Funk v. Waynesboro, School Dist. 4 Cent. Rep. 298, this case is referred to, and it is said: "It would follow, of course, that if they were never opened or the locations were abandoned there could be no damages, neither could the owner have any standing to assert what was but a possible claim."

In Forbes Street, 70 Pa. 137, we think the proper rule is laid down. There were here two classes of streets. "First, such streets as the commissioners thought proper to survey, locate, and make in the general plan of said city districts; second, such streets which, previous to the making of the said plan, had been laid out and appropriated by private persons or otherwise for public use, or for the use of the owners of lots fronting thereon, which are directed to be adopted, inserted in, and made part of the said general plan." The court says: "The question of dedication, in all the authorities in this State, really applies only to streets of the second class, and has no application to streets of the first class."

"The intention to dedicate, however, ought to be clearly manifest in order to deprive a land owner of his property."

Griffin's App. 42 Legal Int. 437.

As to the rule of estimating damages we refer to the opinions of the lower courts which were affirmed in the supreme court in Patten v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 33 Pa. 426, and East Pa. R. R. Co. v. Hottenstine, 47 Pa. 30.

In the latter case Thompson, J., says: "Courts allow the amount of the preponderating advantages to stand against the value of the property taken or other specific injury done."

"What would the property unaffected by the obstruction have sold for at the time the injury was committed? What would it have sold for as affected by the injury? The difference is the true measure of compensation."

Schuylkill Nav. Co. v. Thoburn, 7 Serg. & R. 411; Pittsburg etc. R. R. Co. v. McCloskey, 16 W. N. C. 561.

The effect of the words in the charge of the court was the same as if the rule had been stated in the very words themselves. The charge must be taken as a whole. Parts cannot be cut out and assigned as error.

Little Schuylkill Nav. R. R. Co. v. French, 2 W. N. C. 718; Carothers v. Dunning, 3 Serg.

& R. 378; Reeves v. Delaware etc. R. R. Co. 30 Pa. 460.

Per Curiam:

No question arises here between the vendor and vendee of land fronting on a street. The sole claim is by the owners of the land against the municipality, for damages which they sustained by its taking of their land for a street. No damages were sustained until the street was opened.

Judgment affirmed.

(Argued Feb. 14, Decided Feb. 28, 1887.)

Error to the Common Pleas of Lehigh County, to review judgments on verdicts for the defendants in actions of scire facias sur municipal liens. Affirmed.

These cases between the same plaintiff and defendants were tried together.

Allentown, being a City of the fourth class, under the Acts of 1874-76, the following ordinance was adopted by councils on January 16, 1883, to wit:

"An ordinance authorizing and directing the board of water commissioners to lay a twelve inch water main on Hamilton Street, west of Tenth Street, to Seventeenth Street."

"Be it ordained, by select and common councils of the City of Allentown, and it is hereby ordained, by the authority of the same, that the board of water commissioners be and is hereby authorized and directed to lay a twelve inch water main on Hamilton Street, west of Tenth Street, to Seventeenth Street."

Acting under this ordinance pipes were laid and liens filed against adjoining property owners.

The other essential facts as they appeared at the trial before HAGENMAN, P. J., of the 23d Judicial District, specially presiding, are stated in his charge to the jury.

The plaintiff offered, inter alia, to prove, as bearing upon the character of this land, that as soon as the water mains were laid and the street macadamized, a large number of buildings were erected along this street, between Twelfth and Fifteenth. But the court rejected the offer.

The charge was as follows:

This action is brought by the City of Allentown against Susie Adams and Samuel Adams, her husband, to recover an assessment which was laid against the property of the defendants on Hamilton Street, for the laying of water pipes.

The evidence discloses that Mrs. Adams owned a tract of land through which Hamilton Street runs. The tract contains some forty odd acres. The City of Allentown laid water pipes out Hamilton Street along the front of the property of Mrs. Adams; and the City assessed this property at near or about $1 a foot frontage tax towards bearing the expense of the laying of these pipes.

The jury have nothing to do with the cost of laying these pipes. The simple question for the jury to pass upon is whether the defendants are liable under the evidence for the payment of this tax, as assessed by the plaintiff.

Some years ago, and before Allentown was extended, the tract now owned by Mrs. Adams was a farm, outside of the city limits, extending from what is now known as Linden Street down across Hamilton and Walnut Streets to the Little Lehigh. At that time it was undoubtedly country property; it was a country farm. By the extension of the line of the City of Allentown this property was brought within the limits of the City. Where the previous line of Allentown was, before it was extended westward, does not appear in the evidence, but probably it was near what is now known as Twelfth Street.

That property was brought within the city limits, and thereupon Linden, Hamilton and Walnut Streets were laid out and opened. There are no other streets opened through this extent from Twelfth Street out to Seventeenth Street, except, I believe, Fulton Street, which is spoken of, to my recollection. There are streets not opened, but ordained by ordinance, running out from Twelfth Street to Seventeenth, which, when opened, will cut up this property in a large number of divisions.

This property was used as a farm before it was brought into the City. The evidence that was produced upon the part of the defendants and also upon the part of the plaintiff is that it was used as a farm. You have the testimony of one person, who was a tenant of that property. He testified that he had leased that property about 1880, and continued in possession under that lease until April, 1884, after these pipes were laid; and the whole property, except that which was cut off from it by the opening of Hamilton and Walnut Streets, was used as a farm, the same as it had been before the City was extended. These pipes were laid on Hamilton Street, and fronting on this property of Mrs. Adams; and in the subdivision of this property some forty feet lies to the east of one of these cross streets, which, when opened, will leave but forty feet.

To make myself understood: the street is not now opened, but when opened it will leave forty feet of this property of Mrs. Adams to one side of that street. Her land lies in the other direction, on the opposite side. That is the reason why this frontage tax of forty feet is charged.

The contest here is, and it was argued before you, that this is rural property, or suburban property, as it is called, and therefore is not chargeable with a frontage tax. The plaintiff contends that it is not rural property; that it is not suburban, but that it is strictly, as we understand it, city property, and therefore liable for this frontage tax.

*Cf. Philadelphia v. Keith, 1 Cent. Rep. 896; Stewart v. Philadelphia, 4 Cent. Rep. 674.

There is no dispute upon the law of this case on either side.

If it is rural or suburban property, then it is not chargeable. If it is what we call strictly city property, it is chargeable with a frontage tax. The evidence on both sides of this case was directed to the establishment of this fact. As you find it, so your verdict will be.

We were asked by the plaintiff in two points to define what rural and what suburban property is. The first point submitted by the plaintiff is: "By suburban land, is meant land and territory on the confines of a city, which, though within the geographical limits of the city, is country and rural, rather than city property." This point is affirmed. It is a definition of what is called suburban property. Suburban property is what we call property in the suburbs of the city, lying within the city limits, or within its suburbs.

The second point submitted is: "By rural land is meant country, rustic, farm land as distinguished from city or town land, or plots of land." This point is also affirmed.

The eighth point is also a definition of what rural land is. "By rural land is meant 'pertaining or belonging to the country as distinguished from a city or town; suiting the country or resembling it.'" This point is also affirmed. These are definitions of rural and suburban property, and are explanations of what we understand by rural or suburban property.

[There was one other question to which the evidence had reference, and that was as to the laying of these water pipes along Hamilton Street. It was said that these water pipes were laid at this time so as to prevent the street, after it had been macadamized, from being dug up again for the purpose of laying these pipes; and it was contended upon the part of the defendants that if that was the cause for the laying of these pipes, then they cannot be held liable for that frontage tax.]

At this point, before I turn to the evidence that was submitted by the defendants to show the character of this property, I may say to you that the laying of these water pipes along Hamilton Street, and in front of this property, may have enhanced the value of this property, and if it be rural or suburban property, that will not give the City a right to charge the property with a frontage tax.

The laying of a water pipe along a street in front of property where there is no water, necessarily and of itself adds an increased value to the property; but that does not justify or authorize the city, which lays a pipe in front of a property, to charge that property to the extent of what may be the increased value of the property.

[The supreme court has said, in a case which I have before me, that that cannot be inquired into. The case to which I refer was a case in the City of Philadelphia. There the property was what we call rural property. The city laid the water pipes in front of it, and then charged the lot or property with a certain frontage tax by the foot. It being rural property it was held that that could not be done. The city then offered to prove that the property was enhanced in value by the laying of these water pipes, and the court below said, it was not evidence, and the party could not prove it. The case went before the supreme court, which said: "This is an attempt to charge the farm land of the defendant at the rate of $1 per foot for water pipes laid by the City. The property being rural there is an absence of power to charge it in that manner." Whether or not the property on each side of the street, including the defendants', is enhanced in value by the laying of the water pipes is therefore irrelevant].

What kind of property is this? Is it rural or suburban property, or is it what we strictly call city property? If it be rural or suburban, then the court says to you that the defendants cannot be charged with this frontage tax. If it be city property, they can be charged.

I referred to the fact of how this property came within the city limits. It was by the extension of the boundaries of Allentown to the westward that the property was brought within the city limits. The simple extending of the line of the City of Allentown, bringing property within it, of itself does not make it city property. While strictly speaking we would call it city property, because it is within the limits of the City, the jury will understand, from what I have already said, what is meant by rural, suburban or city property.

[The defendants offered a considerable amount of testimony to show that this land was used, after it was brought within the limits of the City, as it had been previously. There was a large number of witnesses examined; and they all, without exception, to my recollection, said that this property was farm land; that it had been used before it was within the city limits as a farm, and was used as such up to the time when these pipes were laid, in the summer of 1883; that it was tilled as a farm usually is, and that wheat, corn, potatoes, etc., were raised on it.

I will refer to the testimony of several witnesses, who testified in this case, and those parts I will read to you. The jury will recollect that this is from the evidence as to how this property was used, before and after the time it was brought within the city limits, up to 1883; and they will have to determine from that evidence, and from the property both near to Allentown and beyond it, as to whether it may be styled rural or suburban property, or whether it should be called city property.

Mr. Thos. B. Metzger was called upon the part of the defendants and he said that he had known this property some thirty-six years. Then the question was put: "From that time on down to the time these water pipes were laid it has been used for farming purposes continuously?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. All of the land adjoining is used for farming purposes?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. It is all country land?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. There are no houses on either Hamilton

Street or Walnut from Reinhart's house out to the house that you own beyond Seventeenth Street?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. There are no houses west of Jefferson Street, on Hamilton or Walnut?

A. None on the south side of Hamilton except Reinhart's; it is used as farm land out to my house.

Q. Your farm is opposite the Griesemer farm?

A. Partly."

The jury will remember that all the witnesses examined on the part of the defendants testified that from Twelfth Street, out to Seventeenth, on Hamilton Street, there was at the time this property was brought within the city limits but one house (the Reinhart house), and that from that time down to 1883 there were only two other houses built on Hamilton Street on the south side, and none on the north side. All the witnesses examined on the part of the defendants give the same statement of facts—that all this part of the City of Allentown lying to the west of Twelfth Street, was in 1883 almost, if not entirely, in the same condition it was when, in the year 1869 or 1870, the boundaries of Allentown were extended westward.

There was one witness examined on the part of the plaintiff, Dr. E. G. Martin, who probably was mayor at the time when this improvement was made on Hamilton Street. In his cross examination the question was asked.

"There was at the time these mains were laid no other property along Hamilton Street, from Twelfth to Seventeenth Streets in 1883, that was benefited by it as a public improvement?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. The street was macadamized at that time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And to save the trouble and expense of digging up the street after it was macadamized it was thought best to do it before the street was macadamized?

A. Yes, sir. I think that was the gist of it."

This has reference to the other point which I will presently refer to, as to the question whether these pipes were laid as a convenience to the City, and to save expense to the City in laying the pipes.

"Q. This property in 1883 from Twelfth Street, out to Seventeenth Street, on both sides of Hamilton, was what is known as country property?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. It was used for farming purposes?

A. Yes, sir."

Later on there was some inquiry made about lots, and the question was put: "Q. So far as you know no portion of the Adams tract was ever sold off in lots?

A. Not as far as I know.

Q. And that the whole of it was used from Linden Street to the Little Lehigh as a farm?

A. Yes, sir."

Further on in his testimony he was asked: "Q. Water was of no use to the owners of these properties along Hamilton Street?

A. No, sir."

This is the character of the evidence that came in from all the witnesses that were examined, pretty much on both sides, while there was some difference in the testimony of the witnesses who were examined on the part of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff alleges that by the opening of Hamilton Street through this property, probably also in consequence of the laying of these water pipes, this property of the Adams tract became more valuable, because of its character for building lots, than it was before. That testimony was offered on the part of the plaintiff to show that it is city property, and not what we call rural or suburban property.]

(The court then proceeded to answer the point, submitted by the parties, concluding with the defendant's fifth point which was as follows):

"If the jury believe that the laying of the mains in front of the property of the defendants was not called for by reason of there being any houses where water could be used near, in front of or beyond the property of the defendants, and that they were laid because the City proposed to macadamize Hamilton Street from Twelfth to Seventeenth, and thereby save the City the expense of digging up the street after it had been macadamized, then the laying of them must be regarded as a public improvement, and the cost cannot be assessed on the abutting land owners." [This, gentlemen, is the law, and the point is affirmed.]

The question for you to consider is, under all the evidence, whether this is what we call farm, rural or suburban property. Is it rural or suburban property? If it is, then this assessment, as it has been laid, cannot be recovered by the City. If it is city property the City can recover. This is entirely to be passed upon by you under all the evidence. You will examine the whole case from beginning to end, and say whether it is rural or suburban property. If you find that it is, then this assessment by the foot rule cannot be sustained. If it is city property it can be sustained.

[In regard to this other point. If the pipes were simply laid before macadamizing, for the purpose of saving expense to the City, and it was not regarded as a public improvement at the time it was made, there can be no recovery on that point. If there was no necessity for this improvement, or the laying of this pipe at the time it was done, and the City laid these pipes in advance of the time of macadamizing the street simply to save costs and expenses to the City there can be no recovery.]

The question as to whether this property would be liable for this public improvement by some other assessment than the assessment by the foot rule is not raised in this case; and therefore it is not necessary for the court to express any opinion about it.

Verdict and judgment were for the defendants in both cases.

The assignments of error specified the rejection of the plaintiff's offer, the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets, and that the charge was partial and misleading.

Messrs. R. E. Wright's Sons, for plaintiff in error:

The City of Allentown accepted the provisions of the Act of 1874 dividing cities into classes, soon after its passage, so that that Act with its supplements constitute the city charter.

By it the water department, being authorized thereunto by councils, may lay water pipes and charge the cost thereof to the owners of abutting lands.

Purd. p. 1239, pl. 166, 167, p. 1240, pl. 174.

The claim filed therefor is prima facie evidence of the amount due.

Purd. p. 1227, pl. 106.

The jury cannot review the discretion and motives of the municipal legislature and annul its ordinances.

Easton Borough v. Neff, 102 Pa. 477; Commonwealth v. Woods, 44 Pa. 117; Borough of Freeport v. Marks, 59 Pa. 257; Fisher v. Harrisburg, 2 Grant, 296; O'Maley v. Freeport Borough, 96 Pa. 30.

If the court in its charge to the jury refers to the evidence and comments upon it, it is but right that it should bring every part of it which bears upon the point to their notice so that they may not be misled, and if the court instructs the jury that it can see no evidence which leads to a certain conclusion, when there is such evidence, it is error.

Nieman v. Ward, 1 Watts & S. 68.

It is cause for complaint if the court in its charge omits facts material to one party and grounds its instruction only on that which makes in favor of the other.

Heilbruner v. Wayte, 51 Pa. 259.

A tendency to mislead, in the general tenor of the charge, although no particular portion of it is clearly erroneous, is sufficient ground for reversal.

Washington Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Losenberger, 8 W. N. C. 17.

If the court proceeds to state the testimony of witnesses, it ought all to be stated, in substance at least.

Parker v. Donaldson, 6 Watts & S. 137.

Where the language of the charge as to the true character of the testimony tends to mislead the jury, it is error and a ground for reversal.

Fawcett v. Fawcett, 95 Pa. 376.

In Gehman v. Erdman, 15 W. N. C. 280, Judge Clark said: "The testimony was voluminous; and as the plaintiff in error complains, the jury would doubtless rely upon and be largely influenced by the impressions received from the rehearsal of it by the court. It was important, therefore, that the résumé should be as full on the one side as on the other, that the jury might not be misled."

The main question here at issue before the jury was whether these lands were rural or city lands; and the whole body of the voluminous testimony was directed to the solution of that question.

Local taxation can be sustained only for local benefits. Where the benefits conferred by a public improvement are not local, there can be no local assessment to pay the expense of erecting them.

Hammett v. Philadelphia, 65 Pa. 146; Washington Avenue, 69 Pa. 352.

While the paving or curbing of a street, or the laying of water pipes in a city, in front of lands that are adapted and available for city and building purposes, either at the time or in the immediate future, benefits abutting properties beyond the benefits conferred upon the public generally, it is clear that in country or rural districts where the lands are not available for such purposes as made these improvements beneficial, where their principal value consists in their use for farming purposes or in their devotion to uses that were not aided by the improvement,—in such cases as there are no local benefits there can be no local assessments.

Seely v. Pittsburgh, 82 Pa. 360; Bidwell v. Pittsburgh, 85 Pa. 412; Craig v. Philadelphia, 89 Pa. 265; City v. Rule, 8 W. N. C. 244; Philadelphia v. Wetherill, 13 W. N. C. 10; Scranton v. Pa. Coal Co. 15 W. N. C. 131.

The court in charging the jury ignored the testimony for the plaintiff that the principal use and value and characteristic of these lands consisted in their adaptability for and use and value as city building lots.

This evidence went to the main contention in the cause.

Mr. Edward Harvey, for defendants in error:

The authority and discretion vested by the Act in the board and in councils to lay water pipes is not questioned in these cases. Ample power to lay the pipes may exist, and councils may be powerless to assess on the basis of the "per foot front rule."

The right to improve by municipal regulation is statutory; the power to assess a tax for such improvements, while it, too, may be statutory, yet is always subject to constitutional limitation.

Hammett v. Philadelphia, 65 Pa. 146; Washington Avenue, 69 Pa. 352.

In Craig v. Philadelphia, 89 Pa. 265, it was held that on a sci. fa. on a municipal claim to recover the amount of an assessment of a tax for a street improvement, the defendant could show that the widening of the street was not called for by any reason save as a public improvement.

In Re Canal Street, 11 Wend. 155, the defendant was allowed to show that the assessment laid would have ruined the property owners, if required to pay; that it was exorbitant and beyond the benefits conferred.

In Creighton v. Manson, 27 Cal. 613, the lot in question, before the grading of the street, was appraised for revenue purposes at $1,400; it was rendered worthless by the grading; and the assessment for the grading was $1,989.54. This was proved to defeat a recovery, and it was held to be a good defense.

In Scranton v. Pa. Coal Co. 105 Pa. 445, a recovery was defeated by proof on the trial of a sci. fa. that the property was rural.

In Philadelphia v. Johnson, 93 Pa. 15, the defendants gave evidence to show that the materials used in paving were not good.

Rural land is not subject to the "per foot front rule assessment."

Scranton v. Pa. Coal Co. 105 Pa. 445; Ferson's App. 96 Pa. 140; Philadelphia v. Johnson, 93 Pa. 15; Seely v. Pittsburgh, 82 Pa. 360; Philadelphia v. Wetherill, 13 W. N. C. 10.

The judge submitted all of the evidence bearing on this point to the jury. All that is required is that the court leaves the questions of fact fairly to the jury in the charge taken as a whole.

Reese v. Reese, 90 Pa. 89.

A strong expression of opinion upon the facts, which, if taken in connection with the whole charge, does not amount to a binding instruction, is not ground for reversal.

Johnson v. Commonwealth, 85 Pa. 54; Bonner v. Herrick, 39 Legal Int. 364; Gehman v. Erdman, 15 W. N. C. 280.

A case will not be reversed on account of an expression of opinion by the court as to which of certain witnesses are most entitled to credit, or upon evidence in the case, which, however, is submitted to the jury for its decision.

Porter v. Seiler, 23 Pa. 424.

All other questions are immaterial in this case, except that the land assessed was rural. That question was resolved according to the preponderance of proof, and according to the case of Philadelphia v. Wetherill, 13 W. N. C. 10.

The blending of town and country, of city lots and farm lands, of the residences of the living and the graves of the dead, constitute a group so motley and discordant, a series so wanting in similitude and uniformity, that the frontage or per foot front rule cannot be applied to it. It is so plainly, palpably, rankly and ruinously unjust, it must be pronounced no proper or lawful mode of special taxation.

Seely v. Pittsburgh, 82 Pa. 367.

The per foot front rule can apply only to cities and large towns, where the density of population along the street, and the small size of lots, make it a reasonably certain mode of arriving at a true result.

Washington Avenue, 69 Pa. 361.

Per Curiam:

It is well settled, when the land, in front of which the water pipes are laid, is farm land and suburban property, that it cannot be assessed according to the "foot front rule." In such case, there is an absence of power to tax it in that manner.

We discover no error in the answers to the points nor in the charge of the court. The law was correctly declared.

Judgment affirmed in each case.

Emma E. BAUDER, Appt.,
v.
John J. BAUDER.

1. A wife who, after obtaining in the court of quarter sessions an order against her husband for support on the ground of his desertion, persistently refuses, for the period of two years, his request to leave her parents' house and live with him, is guilty of desertion, and the husband is entitled to a divorce.
2. The record of the proceeding in the court of quarter sessions, although admissible upon the question of desertion as a fact, is not a bar to the divorce.
3. The evidence in this case held sufficient to justify a submission to the jury and a decree in divorce for desertion.

(Argued Feb. 17, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 110, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of divorce a. v. m., entered by the Common Pleas of Lehigh County. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial of the issue before ALBRIGHT, P. J., are stated in the opinion.

The libelant proposed to prove that he was married to the respondent; that she deserted him maliciously and refused to live with him for the last two years preceding the filing of the libel.

Objected to by the defendant as incompetent and irrelevant, because the witness, libelant, was prosecuted in this court for desertion, and the case was heard on the 13th of November, 1882, and the libelant was sentenced to pay $1.50 a week for the support of his wife and child, and entered into recognizance in the sum of $100 with John Bauder as bail, and has complied with that sentence from that day up to this; and therefore that proceeding is a bar to this one.

Objection overruled. First assignment of error.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

"In the opinion of the court, if the court were to say that that was conclusive (referring to the husband's desertion and conviction in the criminal court), then the Acts of Assembly which provide that if desertion is proved for two years the party is to have a divorce would be negatived and of no effect. So you will take that action of the criminal court as one of the facts in the case and give it such effect as it may be entitled to, bearing in mind what the court has said upon the subject." Second assignment of error.

The respondent presented the following points:

1. "If the jury find that the sentence of the Court of Quarter Sessions of Lehigh County, in compliance of which the libelant in this suit entered bail for the payment of a weekly sum of money to Emma E. Bauder, the respondent, is still in full force and that the libelant has still continued up to the present time to pay to said respondent in compliance of said sentence, the verdict of the jury must be in favor of the respondent."

Ans. Negatived. Third assignment of error.

2. "If the jury find that there was no agreement entered into between libelant and respondent to again live together as husband and wife since order of the Court of Quarter Sessions of Lehigh County sentencing to pay a weekly sum to respondent, the verdict of the jury must be in favor of the respondent."

Ans. Negatived. Fourth assignment of error.

3. "The former sentence of the Court of Quarter Sessions of Lehigh County and the entering of the recognizance of libelant to pay respondent a weekly sum so long as they shall live separate and apart, and if it is proven that said sentence and recognizance is still in force,

---

NOTE.—Where husband and wife have separated by agreement and afterwards the husband asks the wife to permit him to live with her at the place she is living apart from him, it has been held by the Court of Common Pleas No. 3 of Philadelphia Co. that her refusal is not desertion. Eisenberg v. Eisenberg, 1 Pa. C. C. R. 590.

it is a complete bar to the present action and the verdict must be for the respondent."

Ans. Negatived. Fifth assignment of error.

4. "Under all the evidence, the verdict must be for the respondent."

Ans. Negatived. Sixth assignment of error.

The seventh assignment of error alleged the action of the court in decreeing a divorce.

Messrs. Harry G. Stiles and John D. Stiles, for appellant:

The conviction and sentence in a criminal court is a bar to a suit for divorce on the ground of desertion during the existence of the bond given in that court.

Vanleer v. Vanleer, 13 Pa. 211.

The decree of the court between the same parties and on the same subject matter is an absolute bar until reversed or set aside.

Marsh v. Pier, 4 Rawle, 273.

And this is so, even if the former judgment was erroneous but not void.

Hinds v. Willis, 13 Serg. & R. 213.

A respondent cannot be guilty of desertion who merely declines the invitation of her husband (who had theretofore, according to the language of the bond, "separated himself from her without reasonable cause"), to return to his home after he had been adjudged guilty and was held in a bond for her separate support.

Nathans v. Nathans, 2 Phila. 393; Breinig v. Breinig, 26 Pa. 165; McClurg's App. 66 Pa. 373; Act of February 26, 1817, Purd. 512.

There can be no desertion pending a suit by the husband.

1 Bish. Mar. & Div. §§ 801, 802; Schoote v. Schoote, 8 W. N. C. 286.

Under color of maintaining a suit for a divorce, the husband will not be permitted to avoid the consequence of an abandonment and neglect to provide for his wife.

Doyle v. Doyle, 26 Mo. 545, 550; Simons v. Simons, 13 Tex. 468.

A husband cannot obtain a divorce from his wife on the ground of desertion, although she has separated herself from him for over two years, where it appears that during that period he remitted an allowance to her.

Ralston's App. 93 Pa. 133.

Mr. C. J. Erdman, for appellee:

An appeal lies from a decree in pursuance of a verdict; but the supreme court will not retry the matters of fact decided by the jury.

Andrews v. Andrews, 5 Serg. & R. 374.

It is established by the verdict, and may now not be disputed, that for two years the appellee in good faith provided a habitation and support for his wife and honestly and properly asked her to live with him from time to time, and that she continually and deliberately refused to live with him.

It does not appear from the report of the case of Vanleer v. Vanleer, 13 Pa. 211, when the two years' alleged desertion were computed from, but probably a date subsequent to the giving of the bond, and there appears to have been no testimony of an offer to live with the wife afterward.

The decree of the court below was just and proper.

Commonwealth v. Demott, 64 Pa. 305; City v. Thiele, 10 Phila. 205; Keller v. Commonwealth, 71 Pa. 413; Breinig v. Breinig, 26 Pa. 161.

A divorce is a matter of right if the grounds prescribed by the Legislature are proven. The proof is by the verdict of a jury.

The order of a judge in the quarter sessions has no conclusive effect upon subsequent proceedings for divorce. It establishes the fact that the husband deserted the wife at and prior to the order, and nothing more. It does not follow that he must always remain such deserter. The wife may subsequently desert the husband by her refusal to live with him without cause. This is what the jury has found she did in this case, and this finding no prior proceeding or decree has barred.

Mr. Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

The libelant applied for a divorce from his wife, on the ground of alleged desertion. The desertion being denied an issue was formed and tried. On that issue the jury returned a verdict in May, 1885, finding that the respondent, the appellant, willfully and maliciously deserted and absented herself from the habitation of the libelant without any just or reasonable cause, and that such desertion had been persisted in for two years and upwards. This finding of facts, if correct, sustains the decree.

The counsel for the appellant contends that the verdict is wrong, by reason of a decree in the quarter sessions of the county in November, 1882. It appears that by reason of the desertion of his wife by the appellee, after hearing the parties, the court of quarter sessions on November 13, 1882, sentenced the appellee to pay $1.50 per week towards the support of his wife and his child so long as they should live separate and apart, etc.

This sentence of the quarter sessions was admitted in evidence on the trial of the present issue; but the learned judge held it was no legal bar to the divorce prayed for by the libelant. In this there was no error. Two and a half years had elapsed between this sentence and the decree of divorce.

The evidence is that after the sentence was pronounced the libelant visited his wife "nearly every week and every two weeks, and later every month," and proposed to her to keep house with him. He leased a house and repeatedly asked her to come and live with him. She answered him evasively, never expressed a willingness to do so and did not return to him nor to his house. The evidence is ample to justify the jury in finding that he offered to receive and provide for her, and that she refused all his offers and without any just or reasonable cause that she persisted in that desertion for two years and more previous to the trial of the issue.

There is no error in the charge of the court nor in the answers to the points. We discover no merit in the sixth and seventh specifications of error.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellant.

Damon Y. KILGORE, Appt.,
v.
Michael HOFFMAN, Trustee of David Hethery, Deceased.

Where the auditor appointed to audit the account of a trustee refuses, for lack of vouchers, to allow certain credits claimed, finds numerous evidences of mismanagement through lack of business qualifications on the part of the trustee, but not through dishonesty, and accordingly reduces the trustee's commissions to the amount due him upon the business properly done, some of the exceptions to the account being dismissed and some sustained, it is not error to decree as to costs that they be divided between the estate and the accountant.

(Argued Feb. 25, Decided March 7, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 84, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Appeal from a final decree of the Common Pleas of Chester County, confirming the report of an auditor appointed to examine and report his opinion upon exceptions filed to the account of a trustee. Affirmed.

The facts as found by the auditor William T. Barber, Esq., were as follows:

' David Hethery, in his lifetime, was the owner of a farm situate in East Nantmeal Township, Chester County, containing between seventy-seven and seventy-eight acres of land.

On the 10th day of September, 1868, he executed and delivered to Michael Hoffman a deed of trust for certain purposes, to wit: that said Hoffman should raise money and pay off Hethery's debts existing at that time; that he should manage, use and let the said real estate, and receive the rents and profits of the same, and appropriate the said proceeds to payment of taxes and repairs, and for the support and maintenance of him, the said David Hethery, etc.

Michel Hoffman accepted the trust, and afterwards applied to the Court of Common Pleas of Chester County, by petition, asking to mortgage the said real estate in order to raise money to pay off the indebtedness of David Hethery. The court made a decree, allowing the trustee to borrow the sum of $1,500, and on the second of January, 1878, the trustee borrowed said sum on bond and mortgage, which were made a lien on the said real estate. The $1,500, together with the rents, issues and profits of the farm, were expended; and the trustee now alleges that he had contracted a large amount of debts, besides the above, in order to carry on the business under the trust.

David Hethery died on the 23d of March, 1885. The trustee, Mr. Hoffman, filed an account of his trust on the 4th of August, 1885, showing a balance due to himself of $1,411.61.

To this account Damon Y. Kilgore filed several exceptions. The matters in controversy, among others, were that a large number of items of credits in the trustee's account, amounting to nearly $800, were believed to be incorrect, and should be stricken from the same; that the compensation to accountant—$200—should not be allowed; that the account was erroneous in other respects, and especially that the trustee had not charged himself with all the moneys which came or should have come into his hands, and that the account required a general examination and correction.

The auditor was appointed to examine into the facts and circumstances and report his opinion, etc., to the court. There were fifteen meetings of the audit; and the auditor says in his report "the large majority of which was made necessary in order to afford accountant full opportunity to vouch his disbursements, for which he had neglected to take receipts."

The trustee kept his accounts in a careless, confused, and unskillful manner, which rendered them difficult for him to explain, or for any person to understand. Many of the items in his account were so uncertain that he asked for delay in order to enable him to vouch the same; a large number were imperfectly vouched and many others he could not vouch at all, and they were stricken from the account by the auditor.

The auditor found that the trustee had claimed a credit in his account for $90 interest paid to Eber Anderson, which Mr. Anderson testified was paid by David Hethery himself, personally, and that he gave Hethery a receipt for the same, which was exhibited to the auditor.

The auditor further found that the trustee had taken credit in his account for $200 of interest due himself, when in fact there was only $100 due to him; that he had taken credit in his account for four several items of $50 each, which were not allowed by the auditor; and that he had taken credit in his account for forty-nine items aggregating the sum of $781.99, which were improper, and which he disallowed and struck from the account.

And the auditor, from these facts, restated the account of the trustee, allowed him commissions and placed the whole of the expenses of the audit, amounting to $170.70, on the estate of David Hethery.

To the finding of the auditor exceptions were filed by both parties. Those filed by the executor of David Hethery, had reference, inter alia, to the allowance of commissions to accountant, and the placing of any part of the expenses of the audit on the estate.

The auditor thereupon filed a supplemental report substantially as follows:

The accountant, so far as appears in evidence, has in no way misbehaved himself, or abused the trust confided in him. His sins were those of omission, for which he has been fully punished in the loss of money, much of which the evidence shows to have been paid by him to and for the decedent, but for the payment of particular amounts of which no sufficient vouchers were produced. There is no good reason, therefore, for depriving the accountant of commissions. The auditor had in mind, as suitable compensation, the sum of $160, being an average of $20 per year, to which sum the auditor thinks the accountant was entitled, so long as the deed of trust remained unrevoked. From the year 1869 to the year 1877, the former auditor allowed him $25 per year for an administration of the trust conducted in precisely the same manner, to which allowance the decedent then made no objection.

With reference to expenses of audit, the auditor took into consideration that a large portion of the evidence related to exceptions filed by the executor as to rents, pasturage, depreciation of property, etc., which exceptions were not sustained, the exceptant, however, contending that upon a fair settlement there should be a small balance due the estate of the decedent. The auditor, therefore, comes to the conclusion that it would be proper to divide the costs equally between the estate and the accountant, making $85 to be paid by each party. The same result has been obtained by placing all the costs upon the estate, and reducing the commissions to $75.

The court, FUTHEY, P. J., dismissed the exceptions and confirmed the report.

The assignments of error specified, inter alia, the action of the court in dismissing the above exceptions.

Messrs. R. E. Monaghan and A. P. Reid, for appellant:

The report of a master or an auditor is neither a decision nor an infallible guide, but an instrumentality, to aid the court in performing its own functions.

Compensation is allowed to a trustee for the preformance of duty, as a reward for a faithful execution of the trust confided to him. Integrity, industry, intelligence, and enlightened activity in the trustee, are the qualities which command reward. But if a trustee does wrong, he is entitled to no compensation. Wrongs resulting from neglect of duty, slothfulness, ignorance and confusion of accounts, are means by which compensation is forfeited. Wrongs of omission are as great as wrongs of commission; and neither are entitled to be rewarded.

If the trustee makes false charges against the estate, or seeks to profit out of the funds of his principal, or takes credit against the estate for moneys not due to him, are such misconduct as always is followed by loss of commissions. An unfaithful trustee will not be allowed commissions. They are disallowed to trustees to deter men from committing breaches of trust—as a penalty for a known violation of duty.

Per Curiam:

The auditor found that the accountant had managed the estate conscientiously and to the best of his ability; that while he lacked business qualifications, yet his integrity and his intention to act for the best interests of his cestui que trust were unimpeached. In view, however, of the fact that the estate had not been well managed he reduced the commissions of the accountant and imposed one half of the costs of the audit upon him. The court confirmed the decision of the auditor.

We discover nothing inequitable in their conclusion, in considering the whole evidence in the case.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellant.

v.
Samuel MISHLER.

Where an action is upon a note under seal and, after the introduction of evidence tending to prove its execution and loss, a paper alleged by the plaintiff to be a copy of it is, without exception, admitted in evidence as proof, not of its execution, but simply of its contents, an exception to binding instructions to the jury to find for the defendant does not raise the question whether the court should have admitted the paper as a copy of a note the execution of which had been sufficiently proved to entitle it to go to the jury.

(Argued Feb. 8, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1885, No. 186, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Somerset County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of scire facias to review a judgment. Affirmed.

Judgment was confessed on behalf of defendant by the attorneys for plaintiffs on the following note:

$64.63. Davidsville, Pa., Dec. 1, 1873.

Four mounths after date I promise to pay to the order of S. J. Cover sixty-four 63-100 dollars, without defalcation, for value received.

And further, I do hereby empower any attorney of any court of record within the United States, or elsewhere, to appear for me and, after one or more declarations filed, confess judgment against me as of any term for the above sum, with costs of suit, and attorney's commission of —— per cent for collection, and release of all errors, and without stay of execution, and inquisition and extension upon any levy on real estate is hereby waived, and condemnation agreed to; and the exemption of personal property from levy and sale on any execution hereon is hereby expressly waived, and no benefit of exemption to be claimed under and by virtue of any exemption law now in force or which may be hereafter passed.

Witness my hand and seal,

Sophia Cover. Samuel X Mishler, [Seal.]
mark.

Scire facias was issued to review this judgment, when the defendant filed an affidavit of defense setting forth that he never signed the note on which the original judgment is entered, and never authorized anyone to do so for him, by mark or otherwise.

These papers constituted the pleadings in the case, it being agreed that it should be tried on the scire facias, as effectually as if the original judgment had been opened.

At the trial before BAER, P. J., the note was not produced and its loss was testified to by the counsel who copied it in the narr.

The widow of the payee, who was, under exception, admitted as a witness, says she was called into a room to witness a note; that defendant and her husband were alone in the room; that she signed her name to a note as a witness, that it was for something like $60 or $64 (she was very indefinite as to the time; thought it was in 1874); that Mishler said nothing to her or in her presence, and she said nothing to him. She also said "I don't say that I saw him sign it;" nor did she say that it was signed at all, or whether by name or mark. She did not say she read the note, nor did she say that the copy of the note inserted in the narr. was a copy of the note she signed as a witness.

The plaintiffs then offered the copy of a note dated December 1, 1873, payable four months after date to S. J. Cover, calling for $64.63 purporting to be signed by Samuel Mishler, by X mark, and with the name of Sophia Cover at the lower left hand corner.

This was admitted by the court, merely as proof of the contents of a lost paper, but was not admitted as an executed note; the court holding that the execution of the note was not sufficiently proven. To this ruling of the court no exception was taken by the plaintiffs, and they rested their case at that point.

The defendant offered no evidence and the court instructed the jury:

"The defendant offers no evidence; but from the evidence in the case, we say to you that your verdict must be for the defendant."

Judgment and verdict were accordingly for the defendant.

The assignment of error specified the charge of the court.

Messrs. Coffroth & Ruppel, for plaintiffs in error:

It is not generally necessary that an attesting witness should be able to recollect the circumstances attending his signature, or the fact that he saw the maker of the instrument attach to it his name.

1 Whart. Ev. § 739.

The evidence should have gone to the jury for them to say whether the execution of the note was sufficiently proven. It was not the province of the court to decide.

Hamsher v. Kline, 57 Pa. 402.

If there is any evidence, however slight, tending to prove the formal execution of a deed, it is sufficient to entitle it to go to the jury.

2 Greenl. Ev. § 295.

Equal reason exists for the application of the same rule where he has lost all memory of the transaction. Prima facie the presumption is that what he has attested has taken place in his presence.

Sigfried v. Levan, 6 Serg. & R. 311.

Where the defendant moves for a nonsuit, the plaintiff's evidence must be taken to be true, and every reasonable inference of fact which a jury might draw from it in favor of the plaintiff must be drawn by the judges.

Miller v. Bealler, 100 Pa. 583.

The binding instruction, given by the court to the jury, to find for the defendant brings the whole record before this court for review.

"A writ of error which goes to the whole record, brings it necessarily into the court of error. Counsel may come here and assign errors upon any part of that record and it is our duty to notice them."

Wheeler v. Winn, 53 Pa. 129.

Messrs. W. H. Koontz and H. S. Endsley, for defendant in error:

Exception was not taken by the plaintiffs in error at the proper time and place.

To authorize memoriter proof of a lost document, the witness must have read it, or heard its contents from its author, and be able to speak at least to the substance of such contents. Such evidence, also, should be supported strongly by circumstances in cases where the probabilities are that a writing of the character of that in dispute would be carefully preserved. But before such evidence will be admitted it must be shown that the original instrument was duly executed, and was otherwise genuine.

1 Whart. Ev. §§ 140, 142.

To make a copy of a lost instrument of writing admissible, the evidence of the genuineness of the original from which it was taken must be of the most positive and unequivocal kind.

Krise v. Neason, 66 Pa. 253.

Attestation means the witnessing of an instrument of writing at the request of the party signing the same by subscribing the same as a witness.

The attesting witness need not see the party sign the instrument, if he signs it in the presence of the maker and at his request.

It is enough, prima facie, if he swears that the signature is his own, and adds that it would not have been affixed but for the purposes of attestation. If he can merely swear to his own signature, other evidence of the genuineness of the instrument may be then received.

Huston v. Ticknor, 99 Pa. 231; Greenl. Ev. § 569; 1 Whart. Ev. § 739; 1 Bouv. Law. Dic. 166.

If there is attestation, and the witness confesses himself to be the attesting witness, prima facie, the presumption is that what he has attested has taken place in his presence; but if the subscribing witness denies attestation, or is unable to prove execution, then collateral circumstances are admissible in evidence, as where there is no attestation.

When the subscribing witness is dead, absent or becomes interested, proof of the witness's handwriting is prima facie evidence of execution and delivery.

1 Whart. Ev. § 723 et seq.

In Pigott v. Holloway, 1 Binn. 442, the subscribing witness proved his own handwriting and his own seal, and deposed, having the instrument before him, that he was convinced he was present and attested the execution of the instrument.

There is no such testimony in this case to prove execution; but on the contrary the fact of execution is negatived by the testimony of the subscribing witness.

The case of Miller's Estate, 3 Rawle, 311, arose on the execution and delivery of a specialty. The subscribing witnesses recognized their signatures, and remembered the transaction but did not remember any formal delivery. Their failure of memory was held to be sufficient ground for introducing the testimony of another witness present at the time, who swore that he affixed the seal with the assent of the obligor, and that the instrument was afterwards acknowledged in the presence of the subscribing witnesses.

In Hamsher v. Kline, 57 Pa. 402, the subscribing witness proved his signature, but he had lost all memory of the transaction; and the same rule was held to apply as if he were dead, out of the State, or had become interested; and the presumption prima facie was that what he had attested had taken place.

In the case at hand the subscribing witness proves that she signed a note as witness, but she goes further and details such facts and circumstances as negative the idea that it was executed by the defendant.

It is for the court to judge whether there has been sufficient evidence of execution of a deed to go to the jury.

Hays v. Hays, 6 Pa. 368.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

The single assignment of error in this case is not sustained. It was not error to give the jury a binding instruction to find for the defendant, for the reason that there was no evidence which would have justified a verdict for plaintiff. The note in controversy had been lost and some evidence was offered tending to prove its execution, and a paper was produced which the plaintiff contended was a copy thereof. At the close of his case the copy was offered in evidence. The court said:

"It is admitted simply as a proof of the contents of the lost paper; it is not admitted as an executed note at this stage of the case, the execution of the note not being sufficiently proven."

The plaintiffs rested their case at this point and the defendant not having offered any testimony, the court gave a binding instruction to find for the defendant, to which exception was taken and a bill sealed.

It appears that the paper referred to was admitted merely as a copy of a paper which the plaintiffs had sued upon, and which they claimed to have been signed by the defendant, but the execution of which had not been proved. We need not discuss the question whether the court should have admitted the paper as a copy of a note, the execution of which had been sufficiently proved to entitle it to go to the jury, for the reason that no exception was taken to the exclusion of the note, and the exception to the charge does not cover it.

Judgment affirmed.

KEYSTONE MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION, Piff. in Err.,
v.
Charles NORRIS, To the Use of Jacob R. Spangler.

1. An insurable interest in the life of another arises from the relation of the party taking the insurance to the insured, either as surety or creditor or from ties of blood or marriage, so that from the relation thus established there may be some expectation of benefit or advantage in the continuance of the assured life.
2. A policy issued by a prearranged plan to one who assigns it to a third person having no insurable interest in the insured, the latter paying all the premiums, is void, notwithstanding the one to whom the policy was issued had such an interest.
3. An action instituted in a court having no jurisdiction of the defendant will not suspend the running of a condition of limitation in a policy of insurance.

(Argued Feb. 16, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 271, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lehigh County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of debt on a policy of life insurance. Reversed.

This was an action by Charles Norris to the use of Jacob R. Spangler, against the Keystone Mutual Benefit Association, on a policy of insurance for $1,000 on the life of Louisa Rousch.

At the trial before ALBRIGHT, P. J., the following facts appeared:

The policy was issued August 29, 1878, in pursuance of an application dated August 6, 1878, and purporting to be made by the assured. It was payable to Norris, a son-in-law of the assured, and on September 16, 1878, was assigned by him to Jacob R. Spangler, who paid all the premiums but had no interest in the life of the assured.

It was understood among the parties to this transaction, before the application was made, that the policy was to be assigned in this manner.

There was a condition in the policy as follows:

"No suit or action at law under this contract shall lie against this Association, unless the same be brought within one year from and after the death of the insured; and this policy is issued and accepted upon the express condition that said period of time be the limit of the right of action at law under this contract."

The insured died October 28, 1882, in Baltimore. On March 10, 1883, Spangler brought a suit in his own name upon the policy in York County; but the court set aside the service, on the ground that as the assured did not die in the county, and the principal office of the Association was in Lehigh County that action could not, under the Acts of April 24, 1857, and April 8, 1868, be maintained, and the judgment was affirmed by the supreme court June 2, 1884. The present action was begun March 14, 1885.

The court refused the following points presented by the defendant:

"4. This suit not having been brought within one year after the death of the insured cannot be sustained, as that is the limit of the right of action at law under the contract."

"5. According to the admission of Spangler the policy was taken out by him; all the premiums and assessments were paid by him; and that was done upon the strength of an understanding between Spangler and Mrs Rousch; this made Spangler in law the real beneficiary, and as he had no insurable interest in the life of the insured the verdict must be for the defendant."

"6. According to the admissions of Spangler and Norris, made at the trial, the contract of insurance was, in its inception, a wagering policy and therefore void; and the verdict must be for the defendant."

"7. If the jury believe that Spangler effected this insurance for himself; that he paid all the premiums and assessments; that the policy was taken out with the understanding that it was to be for the benefit of Spangler and to be assigned to him; then he, having shown no insurable interest in the life of the insured, would not be entitled to recover, and the verdict must be for the defendant."

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff.

The assignments of error specified, inter alia, the refusal of the above points.

Mr. Edward Harvey, for plaintiff in error:

If, in such case, the insurance company pays him the amount of the policy, the administrators of the insured person may recover it in an action against him.

Gilbert v. Moose, 104 Pa. 74.

So far, however, as the policy itself is concerned, it is valid. The sole inquiry is, to whom do the proceeds belong.

It was a substantial compliance with the policy, that the first suit was brought within the year. The defendant having, instead of meeting the issue tendered, moved in abatement of the writ, or to set aside its service, cannot take advantage of the time thus intervening; in analogy to statutes of limitation, and the decisions under them, the present suit was in time because brought within one year after writ quashed.

In Pennsylvania the Statute of Limitations as to personal action provides that if a judgment for plaintiff is reversed on error, or the judgment arrested and judgment given against the plaintiff, that he take nothing by his plaint, a new action may be brought within a year thereafter.

By analogy the equity of the proviso must be extended far beyond its terms.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

Jacob R. Spangler, the use plaintiff, had no insurable interest in the life of Mrs. Rousch; hence this policy, now in suit, which was taken for his use, in the name of Charles Norris was but a wager on Mrs. Rousch's life, and as such void and of no effect.

A single question and answer, selected from his own testimony, proves the nature of the transaction beyond cavil.

Question: And it was understood between you and Mrs. Rousch, before the insurance was taken, that it was to be taken in the name of Norris, and by Norris assigned to you?

Answer. Yes, sir.

If, now, we admit that Norris had such an interest in the assured as would have warranted him in taking a policy on her life, yet that fact cannot help out the plaintiff's case, since the policy was not founded on that interest; neither was it for the benefit of Norris, but for the benefit of one who had no interest whatever in the insured life. Norris' name was used as a mere blind, and could deceive no one conversant with the facts; Spangler was the real beneficiary and the policy would have been quite as efficient had it been issued directly to him. The doctrine here advanced is supported by all our own authorities, one of the most recent being Corson's App. 4 Cent. Rep. 307, 113 Pa. 438.

As a case in point we may also cite Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 924], in which it was held by Mr. Justice Field that an insurable interest, such as will take the contract out of the wager class, must arise from the relation of the party taking the insurance to the insured, either as surety or debtor or from the ties of blood or marriage; so that from the relation thus established, there may be some expectation of benefit or advantage in the continuance of the assured life; otherwise, the risk is to be regarded as a pure wager in which the interest of the policy holder is to be found rather in the cessation than the continuance of the life. On all authority, therefore, the court should have affirmed the defendant's fifth, sixth and seventh points.

Nor can we agree with the learned judge of the court below, that the running of the one year limitation prescribed by the policy was suspended by the York County suit. Passing by the fact that that suit was brought in the name of the equitable instead of the legal plaintiff, yet as it was instituted in a court not having jurisdiction of the defendant, it was wholly without effect. As a consequence, the analogy sought to be established between the plaintiff's case and the Act of the 27th of March, 1713, and the decisions under it, wholly failed, and so the court should have ruled.

The judgment is reversed.

James WOODRING.

1. The mere possibility of a subsequent acquisition of property cannot be transferred by assignment. Jermyn v. Moffitt, 75 Pa. 402.
2. An assignment of wages to be earned in the future, executed when the assignor was not in the employment of the party from whom the wages is demanded by virtue of the assignment, is void, and will not be enforced by the courts.

(Argued March 10, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 210, E. D., before Mercur Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Northampton County, to review a judgment for plaintiff on a special verdict in an action of debt for wages. Affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of a justice of the peace.

The plea of nil debit was entered, and a statement of claim filed. The jury found a special verdict as follows:

"And now, December 8, 1886, the jury find a special verdict as follows: that, during September and October, A. D. 1886, James Woodring worked, at manual labor, for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, twenty-six days and earned $32.62 wages, which was due and payable October 8, 1886: that prior to October 8, 1886, either October 6 or 7, Eliza McDermott served upon the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company the following notice, and copy of power of attorney:

" 'To the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.: You are hereby notified that I have an assignment from James Woodring of the wages due him from you, a copy of which assignment is hereto annexed, and you are notified not to pay the same to said James Woodring or to any other person for him, as I shall look to you for the same.' Dated 'Phillipsburg, New Jersey,——— day of,———,' and signed 'Eliza McDermott.'

"The following is a copy of the power of attorney:

" 'Know all men, by these presents, that I, James Woodring, of the Town of Phillipsburg, County of Warren, and State of New Jersey, in consideration of groceries and provisions furnished me and my family by Eliza McDermott, of Phillipsburg, aforesaid, do hereby constitute and appoint Eliza McDermott my true and lawful attorney, for me and in my name, and for the use and benefit of said Eliza McDermott, and at her expense, to receive, collect, sue for, and receipt for all wages or moneys, due, or that may hereafter become due me from————————and I do hereby authorize and empower the said Eliza McDermott to fill up this power of attorney with the names of any person, firm or corporation for whom I may be working at any time during the time I am receiving groceries and provisions as aforesaid from the said store of the said Eliza McDermott, or, if I should quit dealing with the said Eliza McDermott, leaving any balance due or owing by me to her, hereby declaring this power of attorney shall be operative and have good effect to whom presented, who owes me for wages for labor at any time during the period I may be dealing with or owing the said Eliza McDermott; and I hereby declaring that this power of attorney is, for the consideration above mentioned, by me irrevocable.

" 'In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 7th day of September, A. D. 1885.

James Woodring. [seal.]'

" 'Signed and delivered in presence of,
'John M. Voorhies.'

"That on October 8, 1886, the pay day of the defendant, he applied to the paymaster for his money and was informed that the above power of attorney had been handed in against him and the paymaster said that he could not pay him.

"That on October 8, after the above information from the paymaster, Woodring served a notice upon the said paymaster as follows:

" 'To the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co:

" 'Please take notice that I claim all moneys due me from your Company and demand that they be paid to me only. No one has any legal right to receive them except myself.

'Respectfully,
'James Woodring.'

" 'Easton, October 8, 1886.'

"That after October 8, 1886, and after the service of the last named notice, the defendant paid the amount in controversy to Eliza McDermott.

"That on the day of the execution of the said power of attorney, viz.: September 7, 1885, the plaintiff opened an account with Eliza McDermott for groceries, which was continued until December 28, 1885, when the balance due for groceries was $78.04; that Woodring then removed from New Jersey to South Easton Pa., and has not since dealt with Eliza McDermott, and made no payments on account: the only credit since then being the $32.62 received from the defendant.

"And the jury further find that on September 7, 1885, James Woodring was not employed by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, nor under any contract of employment with them, and that he did not enter their service until September, 1886.

"And the jury further say that they are ignorant whether the plaintiff, upon foregoing facts, is in law entitled to recover. If the court shall be of the opinion that the law is with the plaintiff, then we find in favor of the plaintiff the sum of $32.62, with interest from October 8, 1886, and judgment to be entered in his favor against the defendant for that amount; but if the court should be of the opinion that the law is with the defendant, then judgment to be entered in their favor."

The opinion of the court was delivered by Schuyler, P. J., as follows:

The only controverted question raised by the special verdict is this: Can a person not engaged in any employment for another, and not under contract for such employment, for a valuable consideration, make a valid assignment of all wages which he may earn in the future, without limit as to time or amount? The learned counsel for the defendant contends that such an assignment will be enforced in equity. The two authorities relied on as sustaining this position are East Lewisburg Lumber etc. Co. v. Marsh, and Ruple v. Bindley, 91 Pa. 96, 296.

In the first of these cases, Marsh, who was at that time engaged in manufacturing agricultural implements, assigned as collateral security, to the East Lewisburg Lumber Co., the proceeds of future sales of said implements during the then current year, and it was held that, although the proceeds of sale assigned had no actual existence and rested in expectance only, the assignment was valid. It will be noticed, however, that the thing assigned was individuated, and was the fruit of an employment existing at the time of the assignment.

"In Ruple v. Bindley, Ruple was under contract to put up the stairs in a building in process of erection by Bindley, and not having the means to fulfill his contract, one Lewis agreed to advance the same. To secure Lewis, Ruple gave him an order on Bindley for $104, the amount advanced by Lewis, to be paid out of his wages when the stairs were finished. This was held to be a valid assignment of the $104. But here again the thing assigned was individuated, and was besides the fruit of an employment, under contract at the time the order was given. No argument is needed to show that these cases fall very far short of sustaining the broad position the defendant is compelled to assume in the case at bar.

Of greater force and more directly in point is Mulhall v. Quinn, 1 Gray, 105, cited and recognized in East Lewisburg Lumber etc. Co. v. Marsh, supra. In that case there was an assignment of all claims and demands which the assignor had or might have against the City of Boston for money due or to become due for services rendered to the city; and the assignment was accompanied by an irrevocable power of attorney authorizing the assignee to draw the money assigned. Notice of the assignment was given to the city; but the city did not accept or undertake to pay the assignee. At the time of the assignment the assignor was not employed by the city or under any contract for such employment; but he had been employed prior thereto and became so subsequently. The contest was between the assignee and the plaintiff in a trustee attachment for the benefit of all creditors.

"Under these circumstances," says Shaw, C. J., "the court is of opinion that beyond the earnings due at the time of the assignment there was no valid assignment which can be set up to defeat the trustee attachment, and that the earnings of the assignor between the assignment and the attachment did not vest in the assignee. The future earnings constitute a mere possibility, coupled with no interest. There was no subsisting engagement under which wages were to be earned; and it depended altogether upon a future engagement whether anything would ever become due. None of the cases go so far as to hold that the mere possibilty of being again employed by the city, and of earning wages under that employment at a future time, is capable of being assigned. A power of attorney, although irrevocable in terms, does not amount to an assignment, when no assignable interest exists at the time."

Still more to the point is the language used in Jermyn v. Moffitt, 75 Pa. 402, where Mercur, J., says: "We, however, are clearly of the opinion that an assignment, like the present, which professes to transfer a debt to arise for wages not yet earned, against any person by whom the assignor may thereafter be employed, although followed by a subsequent notice of the assignment to such an employer, is insufficient without acceptance to make a valid transfer of the debt against the employer."

In Ruple v. Bindley, supra, Trunkey, J., says, after quoting this same language, that "the soundness of this principle is unquestioned."

In this connection it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that the jury in the case at bar do not find that the defendant accepted the order given by the plaintiff in favor of Mrs. McDermott, and in the absence of such finding the legal inference is that the order was not accepted.

But aside from these authorities, and aside from the question of acceptance, we think all assignments such as the one in controversy here should be declared void, as being against the principles of public policy. The present assignment is by a day laborer, in consideration of groceries and provisions furnished him and his family; and it covers all wages, past and future, due and to become due, to the assignor from any person, firm or corporation, whatever, so long as the assignee's claim remains unpaid.

True, in the present case, the assignee's claim amounts to but $32.62; but the principle would be the same if the claim were ten or a hundred times that sum. Nor does the fact that the assignment was in consideration of groceries and provisions furnished the family of the assignor give the transaction special character. A money consideration would, in contemplation of law, be just as effectual. Nor, if the transaction be fair, need the price paid be a full equivalent for the wages assigned.

Should the law be declared to be that such an assignment is valid, it is not difficult to see that it would open the door to improvidence and profusion on the part of the assignor, and in the end to utter and hopeless poverty. Take the case of any wage earner, or salary earner, or anyone who is compelled to work for a living, for in either case the principle is the same. He conceives himself to be in want of money, whether for necessaries or luxuries makes no difference. He finds that he can raise the coveted money by assigning his future earnings to become due from any and every source. No purchaser offers for his wages, in any existing employment, for he may quit that employment at any time thus rendering worthless his assignee's security. He, therefore, under the pressure of his supposed wants, pledges his whole money earning power for a price.

Presently the money or provisions, or what not, thus acquired, are all gone. They may have been recklessly squandered; they may have been doled out only for the very necessaries of life, during a period of sickness or other misfortune. It is all the same. He is not only penniless, but he has incurred a debt which it may require months and even years to work off. Turn where he will, go where he will, his creditors may follow him and sweep away every dollar of his earnings until his debt is paid. In the meantime his children are clamoring for bread.

Or there may be a whole community of wage earners thus situated. They may be entirely honest. They may have stout hearts and willing hands. The harvest may be plenty and the laborers few. But how can men labor for that which satisfieth not, and their families starving before their eyes. In addition to all this, the danger to society from such a condition of things would be both grave and alarming. It is true generally, as argued by the learned counsel for defendant, that persons sui juris may make their own contract, but the rule has its exceptions. A man may not sell himself into slavery.

Nor is the doctrine for which I have been contending obnoxious to the justly severe criticism of Mr. Justice Gordon in Godcharles v. Wigeman, 4 Cent. Rep. 887, 18 W. N. C. 214, directed against certain legislation in the supposed interest of the laboring classes, to the effect that "It is an insulting attempt to put the laborer under legislative tutelage which is not only degrading to his manhood, but subversive of his rights as a citizen of the United States."

When the court says to the laborer that he shall not beggar himself and family by making merchandise of what is virtually his entire wage earning power, it merely extends to the laborer the same rule which is applicable to the judges themselves, and to the officers of our army and navy; for neither the salaries of the judges nor the pay of these officers may be assigned, either by the party or by operation of law; and for the same reason, to wit: that it is against public policy that they should be. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1040.

And now, December 13, 1886, judgment is entered on the verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

The assignments of error specified: 1, the action of the court in entering judgment for the plaintiff; 2, in holding the power of attorney and assignment void, notwithstanding the wages had been paid to the assignee before suit brought; and 3, in not entering judgment for the defendant.

Messrs. R. E. Wright, H. S. Drinker and B. F. Fackenthall, for plaintiff in error:

The power of attorney was irrevocable, for two reasons: first, because it was for a valuable consideration, the furnishing of the groceries on credit; and second, its terms and being inter partes and during their life makes it so.

Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 174, 202, 206 (21 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 589, 596, 597); Blackstone v. Buttermore, 53 Pa. 266; Hartley's App. 53 Pa. 212; Bancroft v. Ashhurst, 2 Grant, 513.

But the instrument is really an assignment of the wages for a valuable consideration, and not a mere authority to collect them. In that aspect it is binding on both parties, from the time of its execution and the delivering of the goods.

An assignment for a valuable consideration of demands having at the time no actual existence, but which rests in expectancy only, is rated in equity as an agreement and takes effect as an assignment, when the demands intended to be assigned are subsequently brought into existence.

East Lewisburg Lumber etc. Co. v. Marsh, and Ruple v. Bindley, 91 Pa. 96, 296.

In our case the debt was contracted after the assignment was made, so that our agreement is not obnoxious to the rule that a pre-existing debt is in many cases not a valuable consideration.

Bayler v. Commonwealth, 40 Pa. 37; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. part 2, p. 1606, 4th Am. ed. quoting Wilson's Estate, 2 Pa. 325.

In Strausser v. Taylor, 2 Luzerne Legal Rep. 314, Pershing, P. J., holds that "An order by a workman to his employer to pay part or all of his wages earned, or to be earned, to a third party, who in consideration thereof supplied goods to the workman cannot be revoked after acceptance of the order by the employer."

In Trumbower v. Ivey, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 470, Yerkes, P. J., holds: "An order to collect and appropriate wages to become due from any future employment may become an irrevocable assignment by an appropriation of the wages to a particular use; but it may be revoked as a power of attorney at any time before execution. As an assignment of wages to be earned in a future employment it will not be enforced by the courts."

In Pennsylvania it is settled beyond dispute that a mere expectancy, or estate to arise in the future, may be assigned. It is true it has been said that such a transfer cannot operate as an assignment at law; but it will be recognized as a transfer in equity and will be enforced in a proceeding at law.

In Bittenbender v. Sunbury & Erie R. R. Co. 40 Pa. 270, it was held that the future earnings of a railroad company are assignable; and in a number of recent cases the very question now in controversy was considered and passed upon by this court.

In the other States the decisions are in full accord with the Pennsylvania doctrine on this subject.

An assignment, for a valuable consideration, of demands having at the time no actual existence, but which rest in expectancy merely, is valid in equity, as an agreement; and it takes effect as an assignment when the demands intended to be assigned are subsequently brought into existence.

Where a person having a demand due him assigns parts of it to different persons, to secure the payment to them of specific sums, in succession, a court of equity has jurisdiction of a suit by one of the assignees to collect his part of the demand.

Where a demand against the Corporation of the City of New York is assigned, notice of the assignment given to the city comptroller is notice to the Corporation.

Payment by a debtor, of his debt, to the original creditor, after notice that the debt has been assigned, constitutes no defense to a suit brought by the assignee.

Field v. Mayor of N. Y. 6 N. Y. 179.

A written order, given for a valuable consideration, and addressed by a workman to his employer, requesting him to pay his wages for the ensuing three months, as they become due, to a third person, is, upon its acceptance by the employer, a good assignment of the wages, as against a subsequent attachment by the trustee process; although the workman is paid by the day and is not hired for any specified time.

Lannan v. Smith, 7 Gray, 50.

Evidence that an order addressed to a manufacturing corporation by a workman in their employ was received by their paymaster, and treated by him as he treated all such orders drawn on the corporation by their workmen, is competent evidence of the acceptance of this order by the corporation. Id.

An assignment of wages to be earned during a specified time, under an existing engagement, made in consideration of necessaries to be furnished to the assignor, if without fraud, will hold the full amount of wages specified, even if supplies to that amount have not been furnished before the service of a trustee process on the employer.

A city officer, who is chosen for a year, subject to be removed from office at any time, at the will of the mayor and aldermen, and whose salary is payable quarterly, may legally make an assignment of a quarter's salary before the quarter expires.

Brackett v. Blake, 7 Met. 335.

A debtor who is employed in the service of a third person may lawfully assign to one of his creditors his future earnings in such service; and if the employer thereupon agrees to pay the same to the assignee, he cannot, after the services are rendered, be charged as the trustee of the assignor in a trustee process sued out by another of his creditors.

Weed v. Jewett, 2 Met. 608.

Where a workman, in the employment of a manufacturing company, made an assignment of the wages then due, and which thereafter become due, to him, to a certain date, in consideration of being indebted to the assignee, and an undertaking on the part of the latter to supply the former with groceries, from time to time, as his family might need them, it was held that the assignment, in the absence of fraud, was valid and transferred to the assignee all the assignor's interest in his wages for the time specified.

Emery v. Lawrence, 8 Cush. 151.

"The lay or share in the profits of the voyage, which a seaman in a whaling ship receives, according to a custom, in lieu of wages, is assignable before the commencement of such voyage."

Gardner v. Hoeg, 18 Pick. 168.

☞An assignment of future wages, without limitation of time, will include wages earned by a laborer for nine months thereafter, under a contract then existing, by which he was to labor for his employer for an indefinite time, although his rate of wages was afterwards increased, especially if the parties have treated the assignment as applicable to such wages, and payments thereof have been made to the assignee since the rate was increased.

Boylen v. Leonard, 2 Allen, 407.

The court below, in commenting on Jermyn v. Moffitt, makes the mistake of applying language to that case which Chief Justice Mercur used in speaking of an attempt to the assignee to hold an employer who had refused to recognize the assignment.

The doctrine of Mulhall v. Quinn, 1 Gray, 105, and Farnsworth v. Jackson, 32 Maine, 419, has not been recognized in Pennsylvania. The ruling in Jermyn v. Moffitt, is quite to the contrary.

The facts found by the special verdict amount to an acceptance of the assignment by the Railroad Company.

"Where the drawees have expressly or impliedly promised the drawer to pay the check, the holder may sue if payment be refused.

When the depositor settles his accounts with the bank, and leaves the exact amount of an outstanding check expressly for its payment, and the bank tacitly retains the money, and settles on that basis, it is liable to the holder, on the implied acceptance.

Saylor v. Bushong, 100 Pa. 23.

"A bank is under no legal obligations to the holder of a check drawn upon it, to pay or accept the check, whether the funds of its depositor are sufficient to meet the check or not. But if the bank does not pay or accept the check on presentation, it is bound to refuse within the proper time; it has no right to receive and keep the check for an indefinite time (longer, it seems, than the next day at farthest), and then to refuse payment."

First Nat. Bank of Northumberland v. McMichael, 106 Pa. 460.

"A check was drawn to Cook. Barnes indorsed Cook's name withouth is authority and received the money; the bank deducted the check from the drawer's account and settled with him on that basis. Held, that Cook could recover the amount of the check from the bank. The conduct of the bank was an acceptance and bound it as a certified check would."

Seventh Nat. Bank v. Cook, 73 Pa. 483.

Our attention is called to the Act of May 10, 1881, P. L. 17, which reads as follows:

"That no person within this State shall be charged as an acceptor on a bill of exchange, draft or order drawn for the payment of money, exceeding $20, unless his acceptance shall be in writing, signed by himself or his lawful agent."

It is to be assumed that this Act is made for the protection of "alleged acceptors" from liability depending upon parol evidence.

An acceptor may waive the protection of the statute and make a parol acceptance; and if in pursuance of it he pays the amount of the draft or order to the payee, the drawer cannot complain and set up the statute as a reason why the acceptor should pay a second time.

We submit also that it is a grave question whether the statute applies to an assignment or letter of attorney coupled with an interest, and whether it is not to be confined to the language "bill of exchange, draft or order."

Mr. Russell C. Stewart, for defendant in error:

An assignment which professes to transfer a debt to arise for wages not yet earned against any person for whom the assignor may thereafter be employed, although followed by a subsequent notice to such employer, is insufficient, without acceptance, to make a valid transfer of the debt against the employer, the cases go further than this, but all agree this far.

Mulhall v. Quinn, 1 Gray, 105; Herbert v. Bronson, 125 Mass. 475; Hartley v. Tapley, 2 Gray, 566; East Lewisburg Lumber etc. Co. v. Marsh, 91 Pa. 96; Field v. Mayor, 6 N. Y. 169; Ruple v. Bindley, 91 Pa. 296; Jermyn v. Moffitt, 75 Pa. 400.

See also Collins' App. 107 Pa. 590.

The jury in this case do not find that the order was accepted by the Company. In a special verdict nothing is to be taken by implication or intendment; whatever is not found in it is supposed not to exist.

Pittsburgh etc. R. R. Co. v. Evans, 53 Pa. 250; Loew v. Stocker, 61 Pa. 347.

Where there is a possibility of future earnings, coupled with an interest in a contract of employment, in such case, when the earnings accrue, the courts will enforce assignments of them for the reason that the natural and legitimate fruit of the contract and work under it will be future earnings. They are the outcome of something which has tangibility, namely: the contract of employment. To a certain extent the earnings can be specified and individualized. For a long time the courts refused to uphold assignments of property to be acquired in the future; the reason being twofold:

"First, to allow such transfers would be to violate the rules against maintenance and champerty; and secondly, because there could be no valid sale unless the thing to be sold was in rerum natura and under the immediate control of the vendor."

The first case wherein the principle of enforcing assignments of property to be acquired in the future was thoroughly discussed seems to be that of Holroyd v. Marshall, 10 H. L. Cas. 209, which decided that as soon as the property comes into existence the assignee is entitled to have immediate specific performance of the contract to assign, and the assignor will hold it in trust for the assignee. Under this principle the cargo of a ship to be acquired on a voyage was held assignable, and the fleece of a particular flock of sheep, and even the inheritance to descend from a particular person.

However, the property must be specifically pointed out as the product of a particular ship or flock or person.

Belding v. Read, 3 Hurlst & C. 961.

Equity considers that as done which a chancellor would decree to be done. This presumes that a chancellor would make a decree if all the proper facts were before him; therefore in equity the element of time is eliminated from the question, but certain facts must be present before that decree can be made. The chancellor cannot supply the facts. The parties must show them to him. In this case the only facts that could have been shown to a chancellor would have been that at the time the contract was signed Woodring was working for someone else. As far as the fruits of that engagement went the chancellor would have sufficient facts before him to make a decree that McDermott was to receive the amount coming from that engagement; but when he makes a decree that McDermott is to receive money from the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, the chancellor supplies the fact that the Lehigh Valley Railroad has come into this case.

The cogent reasons resulting from public policy, as they appear in the opinion of the lower courts in this case and in the opinion of the court in Fairgrieves v. Lehigh Nav. Co. 2 Phila. 182, to which we think it unnecessary to add anything, should influence this court in refusing to extend the operation of equity powers beyond what has been decided in the cases of Mulhall v. Quinn and Jermyn v. Moffitt, supra.

Per Curiam:

The learned judge committed no error in entering judgment in favor of the plaintiff below, on the special verdict. The attempt was to assign that which had no existence, either substantial or incipient. There was no foundation or contract on which an indebtedness might arise. It was the mere possibility of a subsequent acquisition of property. This is too vague and uncertain. It cannot be sustained as a valid assignment and transfer of property. Jermyn v. Moffitt, 75 Pa. 403.

Judgment affirmed.

Jacob FOLKENSON, Plff. in Err.,
v.
EASTON BOROUGH.

The Act of May 24, 1878, providing for the assessment of damages to property owners, occasioned by the change of grade of streets in boroughs, is not retroactive so as to give damages for injuries sustained prior to the Constitution of 1874.

(Argued March —, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 236, E. D. Certiorari to the Common Pleas of Northampton County, to review the action of the court in sustaining a demurrer to a petition for a jury to assess damages caused by a change of grade of a street in a borough and dismissing the petition. Affirmed.

Reported below, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 511, as Beck v. Borough.

The plaintiff presented his petition November 15, 1886, asking for a jury to assess damages caused by a change of grade of a street in 1871.

The defendant demurred and assigned for cause of demurrer to petition that it is not sufficient in law, inasmuch as it is shown by the petition that the injury complained of by reason of the change of grade was inflicted in the year 1871; and the proceedings are therefore barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The court, REEDER, J., dismissed the petition and sustained the demurrer for the reasons given in the case of Beck v. Borough of Bethlehem, the opinion in which was delivered by SCHUYLER, P. J., as follows:

George Beck, the plaintiff, is, and has been since the year 1868, the owner of a house and lot at the corner of Church and Linden Streets, within the corporate limits of the defendant borough. On April 12, 1886, the plaintiff presented a petition to this court, in which he complains that the proper authorities of said borough did "during the year 1872" change the grade of said Church Street, thereby causing great damage to his said house and lot, and praying for viewers to assess the damages thus sustained by him. Viewers were appointed as prayed for, and it is to their report that the present exceptions were filed by the defendant.

It will be noticed that the injury complained of was, according to the petition, committed in 1872; and there is no pretense that at that time the plaintiff had any claim for compensation that could be enforced against the defendant. But the plaintiff rests his present claim for compensation on the Act of May 24, 1878, P. L. 129, Purdon, Dig. 213, which provides that "In all cases where the proper authorities of any borough * * * have or may hereafter change the grade or lines of any street * * * thereby causing damage to the owner or owners of property abutting thereon * * * the court of common pleas * * * shall appoint viewers to estimate and determine the amount of said damages, who shall make report of the same to the next term of said court; and if no exceptions be filed within ten days thereafter, the court shall confirm the same and enter judgment thereon with costs."

Notwithstanding the ingenious argument of the learned counsel for the defendant, we are clear that this Act is retroactive. There can be but little doubt that the Act as originally framed was intended to apply to future changes of grade only, and it is more than probable that while the Act was on its passage some member of the Legislature, perhaps more concerned for his own private interests than for the rules of grammar or the rights of municipalities, caused the word "have" to be inserted before the words "or may hereafter change." But it matters not how the word found its way into the Act. It is enough that it is there, and being there the courts are bound to give it effect if possible.

Now the word "have" according to Webster, "as an auxiliary verb is used with the past participle to form preterit tenses;" and as used in the Act of 1878, it must refer to past changes of grade.

Nor do we think, as contended by the learned counsel for the defendant, that the Act as thus read is an ex post facto law, within the prohibition of the Constitution. "Ex post facto laws relate to penal and criminal proceedings." Grim v. Weissenberg School Dist. 57 Pa. 433.

A proceeding against a borough to recover damages for the change of grade of a street is neither penal nor criminal. Nor is the mere fact that an Act is retrospective any objection to it, for there is no clause, either in the Constitution of the United States or in that of this Commonwealth, which prohibits retrospective laws. Lane v. Nelson, 79 Pa. 410.

As has already been intimated, prior to the Act of 1878 the plaintiff had no remedy. It had been decided in O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. 187, and was then the law, that a municipal corporation was not liable for damages occasioned by the change of grade of its streets. The law was held to be that way for purely technical reasons, to wit: that in changing the grade of its streets a municipal corporation acted as the agent of the Commonwealth; that the act was the act of the Commonwealth, and that the Commonwealth was exempt from coercion by action. The great judge who delivered the opinion of the court in this case deplored the necessity for the decision, and pronounced it "inequitable to injure the property of an individual for the benefit of the many." And in Re Ridge Street, 29 Pa. 395, the law as laid down in O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, was declared to be "very harsh law."

Finding the law in this unsatisfactory condition, the Legislature passed the Act of 1878, which provides not only for compensation in damages for future changes of grade, but also for past changes. It must be admitted that the retrospective feature of the Act is a bungling and reckless piece of legislation; but in principle, persons who had sustained damages before the passage of the Act were as much entitled to compensation as those who at a future day might be injured in their property. By this Act the Commonwealth submits itself and its agents to the jurisdiction of the court; and this is the full import of the Act, except that it provides a more effectual form of proceeding than a common-law action.

It is a mistake to say that the Act makes that a wrong which was right before. The exact converse is true, for the Act makes that right which was wrong before, by converting a claim which, although just and equitable, was (for technical reasons merely) utterly worthless into a claim of recognized legal obligation. That this is a legitimate exercise of legislative power will appear from the following citation: "The fact that a claim against a municipal or public corporation is not such an one as the law recognizes as of legal obligation has often been decided by courts of the highest respectability and learning to form no constitutional objection to the validity of a law imposing a tax and directing its payment * * * The cases on this subject when carefully examined seem * * * to assert the doctrine that it is competent for the Legislature to compel municipal corporations to recognize and pay debts not binding in strict law, and which for technical reasons, could not be enforced in equity, but which, nevertheless, are just and equitable in their character and involve a moral obligation. To this extent and with this limitation, the doctrine is unobjectionable in principle, and must be regarded as settled. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 75.

It remains to inquire whether the plaintiff's claim is barred by the Act of 1713, known as the Limitation Act. In the discussion of this question the learned counsel on both sides seemed to take it for granted that the decision of the question would be influenced by article XVI, § 8, of the New Constitution, which provided that "Municipal and other corporations and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use shall make just compensation for property taken, injured or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of their works, highways or improvements, which compensation shall be paid or secured before such taking, injury or destruction."

As this section provides compensation solely for injuries inflicted in the future, that is after the adoption of the Constitution, it is not easy to see what bearing it can have on a claim for compensation for injuries inflicted two years before the adoption of that instrument; nor can we see that the Act of 1878 is dependent in the slightest degree for its validity on the new Constitution. If it were, the plaintiff's claim would have to fall for the reason just given. But the power of the Legislature to make laws is absolute, in the absence of constitutional restriction; and we have been referred to no restriction that limits the power of the Legislature to pass such an Act as that of 1878.

It has already been shown that the retroactive feature of that Act is not unconstitutional. As to the prospective feature of the Act it will be sufficient to refer again to O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, where Chief Justice Gibson, after lamenting the want of such an Act under the Constitution of 1838, uses the following language: "The constitutional provision for the case of private property taken for public use extends not to the case of proprty injured or destroyed; but it follows not that the omission may not be supplied by ordinary legislation."

After this slight digression we return to the inquiry whether the plaintiff's claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations. While this Act, strictly speaking, applies only to common-law forms of action, yet it is the cause of action rather than the form of action which determines the applicability of the statute. Wickersham v. Lee, 83 Pa. 425. "Accordingly it has been uniformly held," says Sharswood, J., in Hannum v. Borough of West Chester, 63 Pa. 478, "to apply to proceedings in other courts, and before other tribunals than those of the common law, though the words of the statute are evidently confined to the latter; and this is merely by analogy, as has been sometimes inaccurately stated, but because the true spirit and interest of the statute requires that the rule should be uniform."

Further on in the same opinion the law is declared to be that "The bar of the statute is applicable, though the Legislature may provide new and special proceedings in cases, which before were remedied in the common-law forms; for it cannot be supposed that a virtual repeal of the statute was intended. The inquiry must then be, What would have been the form of action at common law, if the special tribunal and proceeding had not been adopted? If in such a proceeding there would have been a bar, it will still continue."

It is true that in Hannum v. Borough of West Chester the point decided was that the statute did not apply to the proceedings in that case, which were similar in form to the present proceedings, and like them were for the assessment of consequential damages. It has also been held that the statute does not apply to proceedings to assess railroad damages. Delaware etc. R. R. Co. v. Burson, 61 Pa. 369.

It by no means follows that the bar of the statute may not be interposed in proceedings under a retrospective Act of Assembly. Indeed, the principal vice in the plaintiff's argument is in the assumption that the Act of 1878 puts parties theretofore and thereafter injured by a change of grade on the same footing. This would be impossible. Finding nothing, therefore, in the form of the proceedings to prevent the application of the bar of the statute, let us next inquire whether there is anything in the cause of action which, as has been seen, is the true criterion that leads to such a result. To ascertain just what this cause of action is we must again recur to the Act of 1878 in connection with the undisputed facts:

In 1872 the defendant changed the grade of Church Street, thereby causing damage to the plaintiff, whose property abutted on said street. The plaintiff is thus within the purview of the retrospective features of the Act, which provides under such circumstances for a petition for viewers to "estimate and determine whether any, and if any, how much damage such property owner may have sustained, or seems likely to sustain" by such change of grade.

In McClinton v. Pittsburg etc. R. Co. 66 Pa. 409, Agnew, J., speaking of such a petition as that mentioned in the Act of 1878, says: "The petition, properly used, is not for the recovery of past damages under an unlawful entry, but for compensation for a right to be invested in the company. Though the latter is often denominated damages, its subject is essentially different from the former. It is called damages only in the sense of an unliquidated demand, but in its nature it is the price of a purchased privilege."

We find the same thought in Hannum v. Borough of West Chester, applied to the proceedings for the recovery of consequential damages.

Bearing in mind the distinction here indicated, the question of the application of the Statute of Limitations in a case like the present becomes easy of solution. We now know what it is that the Act of 1878 does for the plaintiff. It does not give him an infinitude of actions by converting the defendant into a continuing tort feasor, but it gives him a single remedy for a single cause of action, to wit: the price of the privilege exercised by the borough in changing the grade of Church Street. If this is the limitation placed on retrospective statutes concerning the same subject matter, a fortiori should a retrospective statute be so construed.

Such being the nature of the plaintiff's cause of action, it falls easily within the equity of the Limitation Act of 1713. That Act begins to run when the right of action accrues. Barton v. Dickens, 48 Pa. 523; in the present case it began to run May 24, 1878, the date of the approval of the Act under which the proceedings were begun. The plaintiff, having failed to file his petition within six years from that date, is we think forever barred. As the benefit conferred by the Act was a mere gratuity, we do the plaintiff no injustice to hold that he must be considered as having waived it after so long a delay. There is nothing in this conclusion that is in conflict with Fegley v. Borough, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 505, decided in this court by my predecessor, Judge Meyers, the petition in that case having been filed within six years from the passage of the Act of 1878, although not until after sixteen years from the time the change of grade was made. It was in view of the decision in Fegley v. Borough that I took occasion above to speak of the Act of 1878 in its restrospective aspect as a reckless piece of legislation.

I am aware that in Craft v. Borough, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 508, the decision in Fegley v. Borough, is critised as involving a "startling proposition." But it is easier to criticise the effect of that decision than to answer the argument upon which it is made to rest. As strengthening that argument I take the liberty of referring to Leasure v. Mahoning Township, 8 Watts, 552.

Nor is the decision reached in the present case in conflict with Knauss v. Borough, decided by myself and not reported, the change of grade in that case having been made since the Act of 1878, which assimilates the case to Hannum v. Borough.

The defendant's fourth exception is that "The Statute of Limitations is a bar to this action." Some attempt was made to show that the change of grade was made later than 1872, the time mentioned in the petition; but there is no pretense that it was made after the passage of the Act of 1878. We think, therefore, that the exception is well taken; but exactly what disposition to make of it is not so clear. The Act provides that "If no exceptions be filed" to the report of viewers "within ten days" after the same is made, "the court shall confirm the same and enter judgment thereon with costs, * * * from which judgment either party shall be entitled to an appeal as in other cases."

What is to be done in case exceptions are filed and sustained, and whether the appeal provided is to the supreme court or to this court, in analogy to a writ of error coram nobis, are left to conjecture.

In Rodgers v. Borough, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 523, the latter view, so far as the appeal is concerned, seems to have been taken by common consent. We have no precedent, bad or otherwise, to guide us where exceptions are filed. The difficulty would be increased if the exceptions involved questions of fact. Perhaps the easiest way out of the present difficulty will be to treat the defendant's fourth exception as a plea to the jurisdiction, the want of jurisdiction appearing on the face of the proceedings.

The defendant's fourth exception is sustained and the proceedings are set aside.

The assignment of error specified the action of the court in sustaining defendant's demurrer, that the Statute of Limitations, was a bar to the proceeding and in dismissing plaintiff's petition.

Messrs. H. S. Cavanaugh and H. J. Steele, for plaintiff in error:

The Act has been given a retrospective effect by all the lower courts that have so far passed upon it.

Fegley v. Borough, Craft v. Borough, and Beck v. Borough, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 505, 508, 511.

There can be no doubt of the right of the Legislature to pass statutes which reach back to and change or modify the effect of prior transactions, provided that no objection to them exists, other than their retrospective character.

Grim v. Weissenberg School Dist. 57 Pa. 435; Lane v. Nelson, 79 Pa. 407; Hepburn v. Curts, 7 Watts, 300; Leasure v. Mahoning Township, 8 Watts, 551.

The Legislature in granting the municipal charter did not make a contract such as was contemplated by the Constitution, which could not be modified by subsequent legislation.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 334.

Granting, however, that this Act did impair the obligation of contracts, it is clearly competent for the Commonwealth to pass a retrospective law impairing her own right.

Davis v. Dawes, 4 Watts & S. 401.

When on the part of the government or its subordinate agents a moral obligation to relieve its citizens exists sufficient to support a promise if the same state of things existed between individuals, the Legislature has the right to recognize the obligation and to direct its discharge.

Lycoming v. Union, 15 Pa. 166; Town of Guilford v. Cornell, 18 Barb. 615; New Orleans v. Clark, 95 U. 644 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 521).

The Statute of Limitations can have no application to proceedings under the Act of 1878, because the injury complained of is in the nature of a nuisance, every continuance of which is a new nuisance for which a fresh action will lie; and it can only be barred by adverse possession or user for twenty-one years.

Broomall v. City of Chester, 1 W. N. C. 228; 3 Bl. Com. 220; Smith v. Elliott, 9 Pa. 345; Fell v. Bennett, 1 Cent. Rep. 409; Delaware etc. Canal Co. v. Torrey, 33 Pa. 149; Whitehouse v. Fellows, 10 C. B. N. S. 765; Holmes v. Wilson, 10 Ad. & Ell. 503; Hannum v. West Chester, 63 Pa. 475.

The evident object of the Act was to provide a remedy and at the same time avoid a multiplicity of suits.

Humphrey v. Irvin, 4 Cent. Rep. 685; O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. 187.

The Statute of Limitations does not apply because a special statutory remedy, which precludes all others, has been provided for a cause of action unknown to the common law.

Wood, Limitations, §§ 29, 36, 39; Penrose v. King, 1 Yeates, 344; Richards v. Bickley, 13 Serg. & R. 395; Summerville v. Holliday, 1 Watts, 507; Cork & Bandon R. Co. v. Goode, 13 C. B. 824; Bullard v. Bell, 1 Mason, 243; Delaware etc. R. R. Co. v. Burson, 61 Pa. 369; McClinton v. Pittsburgh etc. R. Co. 66 Pa. 404; Hannum v. West Chester, 63 Pa. 475; Council v. Moyamensing, 2 Pa. 224; Magee v. Commonwealth, 46 Pa. 358.

The statute does not apply because the injury complained of was an exercise of the right of eminent domain.

A municipal corporation, invested with the right of eminent domain, being the agent of the State, was liable to damages for injuries to private property, no further than it was declared to be so in its Act of incorporation.

M'Clenachan v. Curwin, 3 Yeates, 362; East Union v. Comrey, 100 Pa. 362.

Prior to the Constitution of 1874 municipal corporations were held to be not liable for damages by reason of the change of grade of their streets or indeed for any consequential injury.

Philadelphia & Trenton R. R. Co. 6 Whart. 25; Green v. Reading, 9 Watts, 382; O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. 187.

How, then, could the statute apply to a future remedy, the granting of which would depend entirely upon the grace of the Legislature.

Hannum v. West Chester, 63 Pa. 475; McClinton v. Pittsburgh etc. R. Co. 66 Pa. 410.

Mr. Wm. Beidelman, for defendant in error:

The reasonable and proper application of the Act of May 24, 1878, seems to be that it was intended simply to provide a remedy for the infringement of the new right created by article XVI, § 8, of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, because prior to the adoption of that instrument there existed no right of action, either at common law or by statute, for the recovery of damages inflicted by a change of grade.

New Brighton v. United Presby. Ch. 96 Pa. 331.

Unless the Constitution by its very terms is made retrospective, it, as well as the Act of 1878, should be given prospective effect.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. pp. 76, 456.

What the Legislature evidently intended by the words "have changed" was any change made after the adoption of the Constitution, and before the passage of the Act of 1878. Such a construction would make the Act consistent, not only with existing laws but with common sense also.

Per Curiam:

The court committed no error in sustaining the demurrer of the defendant. It certainly was not the intention of the Act of 1878 to give damages for injuries sustained prior to the Constitution of 1874. Before this time no remedy existed whereby a recovery could be had for such injuries; and we cannot assume, from the rather careless language of the Act that its retroactive power should go back of the Constitution, upon which it is based.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW YORK.

COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of the State of New York, Respts.,
v.
Peter SMITH, Appt.

1. On a trial for murder, where dying declarations are sought to be given in evidence, the court may receive, in the presence of the jury, preliminary proof of the expectation of death, before deciding to admit the dying declarations.
2. Where the trial court heard the whole statement of the dying declarations upon the preliminary issue before it of their admissibility, and permitted a cross examination on the subject, and then decided upon their admissibility and directed a portion of them to be read to the jury as evidence in the case and ordered the balance to be struck out and instructed the jury to disregard it, held, that that was not first admitting erroneous proof to go to the jury and then striking it out, and that no error was committed.
3. Held, further, that the admissibilty of the proposed evidence was determined as soon as was consistent with the right of cross examination reserved to the defense.
4. Although as a general rule the trial court should confine the preliminary examination to the facts relating to the declarant's condition of body and mind at the time, yet the inquiry will remain in each case, under its own peculiar circumstances, how far the examination should extend in order to ascertain the mental condition and belief of the deceased.
5. The exercise of that discretion by the trial court, in acquiring the needed information, is reviewable by the general term, but not by this court, unless it can see that such discretion was abused and the action of that court arbitrary and without reason.
6. Held, further, that it is apparent that the determination of the trial court to hear all that the deceased said before deciding whether any of it was admissible was not, under the circumstances, arbitrary nor an abuse of discretion; and as the general term had held that the rights of the prisoner were not prejudiced, its conclusions must prevail.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of General Sessions on conviction of defendant under indictment for murder in the first degree. Affirmed.

The facts appear from the dissenting opinion of Andrews, J.

Mr. John O'Byrne, with Mr. Arthur C. Palmer, for appellant:

To render a statement admissible as a dying declaration it is not enough that it appears that the person making it was under the impression that death must ultimately ensue; but it is necessary that it should appear that the person was conscious at the time that death was actually imminent.

But, assuming for the purpose of argument that the necessary foundation had been laid, the declaration was inadmissible in view of all that the deceased said.

The same principles of law are applicable to the contradictory statement of persons in extremis as to those of a witness under oath.

The evidence would not have been admissible in an action for damages.

The evidence which found its way upon the record and was subsequently stricken out was, beyond question, prejudicial to the defendant.

It was the duty of the court to determine whether, upon the facts proved, the statement of the deceased was competent. Its decision upon that question is a matter of law and may be reviewed Declarations must state facts, not opinions. Stark. Ev. § 38, and note.

Messrs. Randolph B. Martine, Dist. Atty., and McKenzie Semple, Asst. Atty-Gen., for respondent:

The record shows that the declarations admitted in evidence as the dying declarations of John Hannon were made under a sense of impending and immediate dissolution, and without hope of recovery.

As to the question of the sufficiency of the preliminary proof, see People v. Sweeney, 4 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 275.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We all agree in this case that no error was committed upon the trial, unless as to the single point which in the opinion of Andrews, J., is deemed sufficient ground for ordering a new trial. That opinion stated fully and accurately the facts disclosed by the proofs, and shows that the killing was admitted; and the only issue that remained was whether the fatal shot was accidental or intentional. It further holds that when the admissibility of the dying declaration of Hannon was brought in question, it became the duty of the court to determine as a preliminary issue whether the alleged declarations were made by the deceased under a conviction of approaching and imminent death, and that such necessary preliminary examination might, in the discretion of the court, be conducted in the presence of the jury.

When the dying declarations of Hannon were offered by the prosecution, the defense objected, upon the ground that they were not such. The trial judge answered in substance that he could not determine that question until he knew whether or not they were made in anticipation of approaching death. The defense then claimed a right to cross examine "upon that point." The judge answered "Not just yet" and finally said, before the preliminary examination began: "When the district attorney gets the statements of the witness, you may cross examine, and I will then determine whether it comes within the rule."

At this stage of the case there seems to have been no room for a misunderstanding as to what was at the moment before the court. It was an issue of law, to be determined by the court, upon facts addressed to it, and with which the jury had nothing whatever to do.

The defense so understood it for they sought to enter at once upon a cross examination of the witness on that point. Everybody understood that the admission of any declarations of Hannon was stayed and barred until upon the examination by the prosecution and the cross examination by the defense the issue of admissibility should be tried and determined by the court. During the trial of that preliminary issue the jury stood merely [in the attitude of spectators. They had no concern with it and knew from the statement of the court that they had not. They understood that out of its result something might come before them as evidence, or nothing, and that until the judge ruled, the facts developed were for his consideration and not for theirs. The fact that their presence was not error shows that in the judgment of the law a jury must be deemed capable of that amount of discrimination at least.

And thus the trial of the preliminary issue before the court was entered upon, with the complete knowledge and understanding of all parties. The district attorney proceeded at once to the precise point and proved the statement of Hannon to his mother, that he was "going to die."

At the close of about one half of a printed page directed to the issue before the court the prosecution said: "Now we think we have laid the foundation for declarations." The judge seems not to have been entirely satisfied. The mother had given to her son the doctor's assurance that he would get well. It had produced no apparent effect at the moment, but who could tell that if the rest of the conversation occurring thereafter should be disclosed, there might not appear a hope of recovery, born of that assurance, or a spirit of hatred and revenge inconsistent with the solemn truths of statements in the presence of death?

The prosecution had obtained enough for its purpose, but the court had a duty to its own conscience, a duty not to be hasty or to be misled, and to make sure that it fully and correctly understood the frame of mind of the deceased. The learned judge, therefore, continued the examination; and at some point the district attorney apparently aided in its progress, until the witness had disclosed not a selected part but the whole of what deceased said to her during the last two days of his life. Near its close Hannon spoke of the influence of Sweeney with the police.

The prisoner's counsel asked the court: "Will you admit this," to which the judge replied: "I have not admitted anything yet; I want to hear the whole statement made by the deceased, before I determine whether I will or will not allow the alleged dying declarations in evidence."

Nothing could be plainer or more direct than this. All that had been said by the witness was thus again declared to be purely tentative and preliminary, not yet evidence in the case, and wholly directed to the enlightenment of the court in the performance of its duty. The statement, thus interrupted, was thereupon finished in a single sentence more, of about half a dozen lines.

So far, no evidence of Hannon's declarations had been admitted at all. They had been repeated for the information of the court, to enable it to perform the duty of ruling whether any (and if so what portion) of them were competent evidence to be submitted to the jury. Until some such ruling was made there could be nothing to which the prisoner could except, as constituting legal error. What followed was in some respects out of regular order. The district attorney, dropping the entire subject of the conversations with the deceased, proceeded to examine Hannon's mother, not upon the preliminary issue but upon matters relating to the main issue, and belonging to the consideration of the jury.

It would have been more regular to first finish the preliminary issue. The prisoner's counsel, however, seems to have acquiesced. He had been told that he could cross examine upon the preliminary issue, when the prosecutor had finished. That time had come and he was at liberty if he cared for the order of the proceeding to interpose and assert the right which the court had promised to give him, and ask a decision of the preliminary issue before the trial proper was resumed. He did not do so. He chose to sit silent while the added proof competent upon the main issue was being submitted to the jury.

When the district attorney closed his examination of the witness the prisoner's counsel asked three not very important questions, and then turning to the court said: "I move now to strike out all the evidence given by the witness in regard to the interview with the deceased, on the ground that it is inadmissible, for the reason that the necessary foundation has not been laid for such declarations."

This motion was singularly inapt, except for one purpose. As no declarations had yet been received in evidence there were none to strike out, and the objection was to the whole of them when some were beyond doubt admissible. If the purpose was to draw from the court the admission that they had been received, or an assent to such a claim, that purpose failed; for the court said in answer to the motion:

"As I understand the position of the matter now it is this: Mr. O'Byrne claims the right to cross examine the witness in reference to what will be claimed by the district attorney, as evidence of dying declarations, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is admissible. Are you cross examining on that point?"

The prisoner's counsel replied: "I am not; I am in a general cross examination."

The answer suggested to the judge the possibility of some confusion, for he at once said: "You may enter on the record that the court will now permit the defendant's counsel to cross examine the witness, before passing upon the question of admissibility of the alleged dying declarations made by the deceased to the witness, as testified to by her."

To this the prisoner's counsel said: "We cannot be estopped by any such record as that; it is a monstrous proposition."

Why that should have been said, after what had occurred, it is difficult to say. We do not mean to criticise the counsel who bore the heavy responsibility of his client's life or misinterpret his zeal; but at least we differ from him entirely. We see in the action of the trial court a steady purpose to keep the evidence of declarations out of the case, until at a proper and suitable time it should be determined what, if any, were admissible.

The counter effort seemed to be to insist that the court stood in the position of having admitted in evidence what it is clear was never admitted at all. The cross examination then proceeded. Before it closed it reverted to the declarations of the deceased, which had been repeated to the court. The witness was asked if she recollected the interview clearly; if she thought her son was dying; why she did not send for a priest on Wednesday; what was the subject matter of deceased's conversation on Thursday, and what was the whole conversation between them.

As the witness began to repeat it the counsel suddenly closed his cross examination. The court then asked if it was finished, and receiving an affirmative answer, proceeded to determine the preliminary issue, and decide what portion of the statement of the witness to the court should be admitted, and directed the stenographer to read to the jury and he did read to them "so much and such parts thereof as are embraced within black lines;" and marked on the margin: "Allowed to stand as evidence of dying declarations," and ordered the balance to be "stricken from the evidence;" and in view of what had occurred took the added pains to caution the jury to disregard what they had heard repeated but what the court decided it would not admit.

Upon this state of facts I cannot resist the conviction that the declarations of Hannon now objected to were never admitted in evidence but wholly excluded; and that the case is not at all one in which erroneous proof was first admitted and then sought to be stricken out, but one in which no error of admission existed which required correction. It seems sufficiently evident also that any doubt on the subject and any confusion or mistake as to what was being done was steadily and persistently guarded against by the court and the admissibility of the proposed evidence determined as soon as it could be done consistently with the right of cross examination reserved to the defense.

Since there could be no valid exception to the admission of evidence which was never admitted, the only possible inquiry becomes whether the action of the court in acquiring the needed information on which to rule is itself the subject of our review. We do not see how it can be. It rests in the judicial discretion. It never goes to the jury, except so far as admitted. Some means of information the court must have. The suggestion made is that "It should have confined the preliminary examination to the facts relating to the declarant's condition of body and mind at the time."

That proposition stated as a general rule for the guidance of trial judges, in exercising their discretion, need not be doubted; but the inquiry will remain in each case, under its own peculiar circumstances, how far the examination should extend, in order to ascertain with accuracy and reasonable certainty the mental condition and belief of the declarant. The exercise of that discretion was reviewable by the general term, but is beyond our jurisdiction, unless we can see that such discretion was abused, and the action of the court arbitrary and without reason.

We cannot say that. There was a motive that might fairly have operated upon the judicial mind to push the inquiry beyond the point at which the district attorney paused, and that motive was, as we have already suggested, to ascertain whether the assurance of survival which the deceased had been told the doctors had given, became at any time so operative upon him as to awaken a hope of life. With that circumstance before it, the court might reasonably conclude that a part of what was said would scarcely furnish as safe a basis of judgment as the whole. We can readily see that the determination of the court to hear all that the deceased said before deciding whether any of it was admissible should not be deemed arbitrary or an abuse of discretion, under the existing facts.

Suppose that it had turned out, as from what appears seemed quite possible, that the very last thing said by Hannon, relating not at all to the facts of the shooting, had shown the presence of a lurking but confident hope of recovery. Singularly enough the prisoner's counsel illustrates the force of what we are saying by claiming in his able brief precisely such a result. He plants himself on the very last words of Hannon which closed the conversation with his mother, and which were about Sweeney and the police, and argues that they show a hope of recovery.

Hannon said: "I am afraid, Mother, you will get no satisfaction for your son." She replied: "Johnny, that can't be so." He answered: "I hope so, Mother, because I would like to go agin them fellows."

The counsel claims that the expression does bear somewhat upon Hannon's frame of mind, and yet, without what preceded it, its occasion and even its accurate meaning might be lost to us. It does appear to have been deemed sufficiently material by the learned trial judge to have affected his judgment; but he could not have known that in advance; and it is easy to see that it might have assumed a form which would have been very material. The hope of survival, the lingering belief that death is not inevitable, may disclose itself to an observant mind where even the witness does not see it, and may come to the surface when the talk is far away from the facts of the killing and from the res gestæ.

The suggestions show that the action of the court was, at least, not arbitrary and without some apparent reason; and so its discretion was not abused. The general term, which had the power to review it, has held that the rights of the prisoner were not prejudiced; and its conclusions must, therefore, prevail.

The judgment should be affirmed.

Ruger, Ch. J., Earl and Danforth, JJ., concur; Andrews, J., reads dissenting opinion for reversal, in which Peckham, J., concurs. Rapallo, J., absent.

Andrews, J., dissenting:

The defendant was jointly indicted with one Alexander Sweeney in the Court of General Sessions in the City of New York, for the murder of John Hannon, by shooting with a pistol, April of 1885. He was separately tried, and was convicted of murder in the first degree. The transaction took place at about 6 o'clock in the evening, at a shanty at the foot of Thirty-Eighth Street in the City of New York, where the deceased was employed as a watchman in the street cleaning department.

The deceased was at the time sitting or lying on a bench in the shanty, and a man named Tracy was in the room sitting by and leaning upon a table. Tracy saw Smith and Sweeney enter the door, and he pretended to be asleep. He testified that they had some conversation in a whisper, which was followed almost immediately by the report of a pistol, and they then turned and left the place. Tracy, seeing that Hannon was shot, followed the two men and pointed them out to officers who arrested them. The shooting was done on Tuesday evening. Hannon was taken the same evening to Bellevue Hospital, and died there the Saturday following. It was found that a ball had penetrated the skull over the right eye, entering the brain.

There was no controversy, on the trial, that the shot proceeded from a pistol in the hands of the defendant. The defense was that the shooting was unintentional and accidental. The testimony of the defendant, who was sworn as a witness in his own behalf, tended to support this explanation.

The theory of the prosecution was that it was a deliberate and premeditated murder, committed by Smith and Sweeney, acting in concert, from enmity, each having a grudge against the deceased. The prosecution in support of this theory, proved that Smith and Sweeney had known each other from boyhood, and were intimate friends, and were also acquaintances of the deceased. For the purpose of showing the hostility of Sweeney to the deceased, the prosecution was permitted, against the objection of the defendant's counsel, to show that a fight had occurred between them on the day before the homicide.

It was also shown by the evidence of the mother and sister of the deceased that about two years prior to the homicide an altercation took place between the defendant and the deceased, during which the former drew a pistol, and that on that occasion the defendant threatened to kill Hannon "if it is twenty years to come."

The People, further to support the indictment, offered evidence of declarations made by the deceased to his mother at the hospital on Wednesday morning, the day after the shooting, and also to his sister on Thursday morning. The principal and serious allegations of error relate to this evidence: first, as to whether the declarant made the declarations under a sense of impending death, within the rules governing the admission of dying declarations; and second, whether the court committed a legal error in permitting declarations of the deceased to be proved in the first instance not relating to the immediate circumstances of the death, and which the court subsequently ordered to be stricken out.

In respect to the first question, viz.: whether the deceased at the time of making the declarations, was in such condition of body and mind, and had such a sense of impending dissolution as to make his dying declarations admissible as such, we entertain no doubt. As the sequel proved, he had received a mortal wound. His conversation with his mother indicated that he considered his condition hopeless. He said: "Yes, Mother, I am shot. Mother will you take me home? The Bellevue people are good; they are good enough, but they can do nothing for me." The mother said "Johnny, the doctor don't say so; the doctor says you will get well."

He said: "Mother, lift me up; kiss me; kiss me, because I am going to die; the bullet that Pete Smith put in my head, it is in it, and it will fetch me, and leave you without your only son."

There was other conversation not necessary to repeat. Suffice it to say that all his statements as to his condition indicate that both on Wednesday and Thursday mornings he had a settled conviction that he was fatally wounded and that death was imminent.

It would not be profitable to go over the cases as to the preliminary proof necessary to entitle dying declarations to be given in evidence. Each case differs in its circumstances, and the cases are not all reconcilable. The rule admitting dying declarations is anomalous, and courts are strict in requiring that, before admitting them, it shall be made clearly to appear that the declarant was in fact resting under the shadow of death from the fatal stroke, and so believed, entertaining no hope of recovery.

The circumstances proved in this case bring it within the rule, according to the best considered authorities. Reg. v. Reauy, 26 L. J. M. C. 43; Reg. v. Jenkins, 11 Cox, C. C. 250; Reg. v. Peel, 2 Fost & Fin. 21; 3 Russ. Cr. 4th Eng. ed. 250 et seq.; 1 Greenl. Ev. chap. 9.

The more serious question arises in respect to the alleged error of the court in admitting declarations made by the deceased in relation to matters not the proper subject of proof by dying declarations.

The course of the trial upon this point, as disclosed by the record was this: the mother of the deceased, on being called and sworn as a witness for the People, was asked by the prosecuting attorney to state the conversation she had with the deceased at the hospital on Wednesday morning.

The defendant's counsel interposed an objection that it was not "in the nature of an ante mortem, and was inadmissible." The court replied: "I cannot determine whether it is or not, till I hear it." On the defendant's counsel repeating the objection, the court stated: "Mr. Palmer, rather than that you should interrupt at every question put to the witness, you may consider an objection and exception to every question put to to the witness."

The witness was again asked to state the conversation, when the defendant's counsel asked the court if it had decided to admit declarations of Hannon, when not in fear of imminent death, and the court replied that it had not, adding: "How do I know as yet but that they were made in anticipation of immediate death?" The defendant's counsel then asked to be permitted to cross examine the witness on that point, but the court denied his request, saying that when the district attorney got the statement of the witness the defendant's counsel could then cross examine, and the court would decide whether it came within the rule; and to this ruling an exception was taken.

The district attorney then proved by the mother the declarations of the son heretofore stated, and said: "Now I think we have laid the foundation for declarations."

The court then took up the examination of the witness, and she proceeded, in answer to the questions of the court and the district attorney, to give testimony occupying four printed pages of the case, narrating the whole conversation with her son. Much of the evidence was elicited by answers to the specific questions as to declarations having no relation to the res gestæ of the homicide.

After an examination of the witness, covering twenty printed pages, embracing many subjects other than the interview at the hospital, the court directed the stenographer to read to the jury from his stenographic notes a part of the evidence of the witness, pointed out by the court, of the conversation with her son, which embraced the evidence which has been detailed, showing Hannon's expectation of death, and also his declarations as to the circumstances of the murder, and directed that the further evidence of the witness, of what transpired at the interview, should be stricken out and disregarded by the jury.

The portion of the evidence directed to be read to the jury is inclosed in black lines in the error book, and occupies about a printed page of the testimony of the witness.

Following the testimony admitted is the testimony stricken out, which occupies three printed pages.

In the testimony stricken out is the following to a question by the mother: "Johnny, what did they shoot you for?" The deceased replied: "Very little cause, Mother; but Pete Smith has promised me this for a long time."

To another remark by the mother, "Johnny, how early they went down to shoot you," he replied: "That was their best chance, Mother, because the carts never came in with their first loads before 7 or half past 7 in the evening; Smith and Sweeney knew the time the loads came in, just as well as I did; they thought they would catch me alone."

The mother asked "How came Tracy to be with you, Johnny?" He answered, "Because I asked him to remain with me all night; I was afraid; I asked Tracy to stay with me; he said he would stay; I asked William Curry to remain with me the night before; he also did stay. Mother, I think I would got shot Tuesday morning only for having William Curry with me."

The mother asked, "Johnny, why do you think that?" He replied: "Because Sweeney and another man came down in the morning, between 5 and 6 I think it was."

The particulars of the interview between Sweeney and deceased on Tuesday morning, as related by the latter, were then called out by specific questions by the district attorney.

It appeared from his statement to his mother that Sweeney called the deceased out of the shanty and Sweeny said: "What talk have you had about what you can do to me and Smith?" The deceased replied, "I have no talk about what I can do to you." Sweeney then called him a liar, and on the deceased saying, "If you want any more satisfaction, I am man enough for you, if I only get fair play," Sweeney said, "We will not mind it now; we will have another time to fix this."

Further declarations of the deceased were proved, to the effect that Sweeney and Smith had relatives in the police force, who would be able to prevent the mother "getting any satisfaction for her son."

We are of opinion that the court committed a legal error under the circumstances, in permitting proof of declarations of deceased in respect to facts not coming within the class of facts which may be proved by dying declarations, and that the error was not cured by striking these declarations from the record and directing the jury to disregard them.

There is no doubt of the proposition stated by the counsel for the People that the question whether circumstances exist which make declarations admissible as dying declarations, is a preliminary fact to be determined by the court, and that it cannot be left to the jury to say whether the deceased thought he was dying or not; for that must be decided by the judge, whose decision is reviewable on error, before he permits the declarations to be given in evidence.

This was decided at a conference of all the judges of England in 1790 and has been generally accepted as the rule in this country. 3 Russ. Crimes, 4th Eng. ed. 266, and cases cited. Donnelly v. State, 2 Dutch. (N. J.) 463; 1 Whart. § 681.

It is a necessary result of this doctrine that the court must in the first instance hear the evidence bearing upon the condition of the declarant, and his sense of impending death. If on this inquiry the court determines that the circumstances justify the introduction of dying declarations, then on their being offered the question whether they relate to facts which may be proved by dying declarations, arises and is to be determined by the court in the ordinary way.

It is also well settled that dying declarations relating to transactions prior to the homicide, and not a part of the res gestæ, are not admissible. The rule is stated by Abbott, Ch. J., in Rex v. Mead, 2 Barn. & Cres. 605, in language often quoted with approval, that "Evidence of this description is only admissible, where the death of the deceased is the subject of the charge, and the circumstances of the death the subject of the dying declaration." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 156; People v. Davis, 56 N.Y. 95; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Mosley, 8 Wall, 397 [75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 437.]

The declarations of Hannon to which we have referred, which were stricken out by the court, were clearly inadmissible under the rule, and were calculated seriously to prejudice the defendant. They supplemented with great force the evidence tending to show concert, deliberation and premeditation.

We think it was the duty of the court to have confined the preliminary examination to the facts relating to the declarant's condition of mind and body at the time.

The whole examination was taken before the jury in the ordinary manner of taking testimony on the trial of an issue. It was we think the duty of the court in fairness to the prisoner, and that a discreet administration of the criminal law required the court to have called the attention of the witness on the preliminary inquiry, to the particular point to which the inquiry was directed, and not to have permitted her to testify to declarations not only irrelevant to the preliminary fact, but inadmissible on the main issue. The court not only omitted to call the attention of the witness to the point, but refused to permit the defendant's counsel to examine her on the preliminary question until after the examination by the district attorney, covering the whole interview, had been concluded. The testimony stricken out was received after all the testimony admitted bearing upon the preliminary inquiry had been elicited.

The part stricken out was evidence received subsequent to the evidence retained. It might happen that a witness, called to testify to dying declarations, might on the preliminary examination (through ignorance or want of discrimination) intermingle declarations as to the condition of the deceased with declarations relating to the crime. Such prejudice as the defendant might suffer in such a case he would have to bear as an unavoidable incident of the trial.

But that is not this case.

We think the judge erred, and that according to the suggestion of the court, made to counsel on the trial, an exception must be deemed to have been taken to the objectionable evidence; and we think it quite clear that the error was not cured by striking it from the record and instructing the jury to disregard it. Erben v. Lorillard, 19 N. Y. 299; Linsday v. People, 63 N. Y. 154; Furst v. Second Ave. R. R. Co. 72 N.Y. 542.

The judgment and conviction should therefore be reversed, and a new trial granted.

1. Chapter 542 of Laws of 1880, as amended by chapter 361 of Laws of 1881 and chapter 151 of Laws of 1882, in regard to taxes, are free from constitutional objection and valid.
2. A foreign corporation, incorporated under the laws of Utah to conduct the business of mining in that Territory, where it mined the ore and manufactured it into base bullion which it partly refined in Chicago, which does not have or carry on in this State any refining or manufacturing establishment, and only within this State delivers its bullion to the United States Assay Office, to be further refined, for a compensation, is not engaged in manufacture within this State so as to be entitled to an exemption from taxation under said Act of 1881.
3. Under section 3 of the Act of 1881 it is not sufficient to exempt a corporation from taxation that it is a manufacturing corporation, but it must also carry on manufacture within this State.
4. The words "doing business in this State" in such Act, do not mean the whole business of the corporation; but where the principal officers of the corporation have their offices in New York City, its directors' meetings are held and its dividends declared and paid there, and, as in this case, in addition thereto, a substantial part of the regular business of the corporation is continuously carried on there during the whole year, its silver bullion sold and the proceeds of it received there and some of it deposited or loaned and used for the purposes of the Company there, the corporation is brought within the Act as "doing business within this State."
5. In computing the taxes to be paid by the defendant in this case under the above mentioned laws, its entire capital stock was properly taken as the basis of taxation.

6. By chapter 501 of the Laws of 1885, for the first time the basis of computing a tax under section 3 of the Act of 1881, to be paid by a corporation, was fixed as the amount of capital stock employed within this State.
7. In this case, as a judgment was entered for the tax before the passage of the Act of 1885, defendant can have no benefit from its provisions authorizing the comptroller to adjust all accounts against a corporation for all taxes and penalties under the Act of 1881, by taking as the basis for taxation the capital employed within this State by such corporation.
8. The defendant in this case was liable to the penalties imposed by section 2 of the Act of 1881, for neglecting to pay the taxes within the time specified therein.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming a judgment entered in Albany County on report of a referee in favor of plaintiffs in an action to recover taxes and penalties under the Act of 1880, chapter 542, and supplements thereto. Affirmed.

Reported below, 38 Hun, 276.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Messrs. Julien T. Davies and Edward Lyman Short, for appellant:

The defendant was not, during the years ending November 1, 1881, and November 1, 1882, doing business within the State of New York, within the meaning of the statute, and hence is not liable to taxation under the Acts in question.

People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387; People v. Commissioners, 59 N. Y. 40; Parker Mills v. Commissioners, 23 N. Y. 242; Doty v. Mich. Cent. R. R. Co. 8 Abb. Pr. 427; Smyth v. Internat. Life Asso. Co. 4 Abb. N. S. 11.

If the defendant was, during the years ending November 1, 1881, and November 1, 1882, "Doing business within this State," then such business constituted a carrying on of manufacture within this State, and the Horn Silver Mining Company was a manufacturing corporation carrying on manufacture within this State within the meaning of Laws of 1880, chap. 542, § 3, as amended by Laws of 1881, chap. 361, § 3, and was not liable to taxation under the provisions of these statutes.

In other statutes of this State and others, and in England, and in the language of various legal instruments, the terms "manufacturing" and "manufacture" have been applied to processes and products similar to those of the defendant.

The defendant carries on manufacture within the State of New York. The defendant deposited its silver bullion in the assay office for the purpose of completing the process of manufacturing the ore into standard bars. This process is spoken of in the Revised Statutes of the United States as a "manufacture" of bars. See § 3553.

The defendant sells its silver on the street by transferring the receipts of the assay office after the silver bars have been completely manufactured into standard bars.

Gillman v. State, 55 Ala. 248; Ex parte Smith, 2 Pugsley (N. B.) 147.

If any tax was due from the Horn Silver Mining Company in January, 1883, the basis of such tax was only the capital employed within this State.

A close analysis of section 1, chap. 361, Laws 1881, in connection with section 11, chap. 151, Laws 1882, shows that subsequent to the passage of the second Act, the law was that the capital employed within this State was to be the basis of taxation, and section 11 of chapter 151 provided for a method by which the comptroller could initiate and carry out a revision of the amount of this capital in case of his dissatisfaction with a company's report.

If the State did not intend to take as a basis of taxation the capital employed within the State, there is no object either in a corporation making a return of the capital employed within the State, or in the comptroller's having the power to revise such a return. The Act of 1882 was not before the court in People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387.

The Pennsylvania courts have construed their statutes to fix as the basis of the tax the capital employed in that State; and it may be said to be common learning that under such circumstances the New York Legislature must have adopted within the statute the judicial construction already given to it in the State of its origin.

Skouten v. Wood, 57 Mo. 380; Skrainka v. Allen, 76 Mo. 384; Commonwealth v. Hartnett, 69 Mass. 451.

To measure the taxation of the business of a foreign corporation or of the franchise of a domestic corporation by the capital employed within the State is consistent with equity and the established policy of this State.

The subsequent Act of 1885, chap. 501, determines clearly that the Acts of 1880 and 1881, as amended by the Statute of 1882, establish as a basis for taxation the amount of capital employed within this State.

Mr. D. O'Brien, Atty-Gen., for respondents:

The defendant while doing business within this State is not exempted from taxation as a manufacturing corporation carrying on manufacture within this State.

96 N. Y. 387, 397.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced to recover certain taxes claimed to be due from the defendant under chapter 542 of the Laws of 1880, as amended by chapter 361 of the Laws of 1881, and chapter 151 of the Laws of 1882.

The plaintiffs claim in their complaint that there was due January 1, 1882, from the defendant the sum of $7,500, being the tax at the rate of 1½ mills of each dollar of valuation of its capital stock at $5,000,000; and also $1,500, as a penalty for neglect or refusal to pay the tax for two years.

They also claim that there was due January 1, 1883, from the defendants the sum of $30,000, being a tax at the rate of one quarter of a mill for each 1 per centum of dividends declared during the year ending November 1, 1882, upon $10,000,000, the par value of defendant's capital stock, the dividends declared being 12 per centum; and also $3,000 as a penalty for neglect or refusal to pay the tax within fifteen days from January 1, 1883.

The defendant is a foreign corporation, incorporated under the laws of the Territory of Utah. The plaintiffs recovered the amount of taxes and penalties claimed, and the defendant complains of the recovery, upon several grounds which will be separately considered:

The constitutional objections to the Acts under which these taxes were imposed have been sufficiently considered in prior decisions of this court, and the Acts must now be regarded as free from constitutional objection and therefore valid. People v. Home Ins. Co. 72 N. Y. 328; People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387; People v. Gold etc. Telegraph Co. 98 N. Y. 67.

We have now, therefore, only to construe the Acts and apply them to the facts of this case.

First. The defendant claims that it was "a manufacturing corporation carrying on manufacture within this State," and therefore not liable to taxation under section 3 of the Act of 1881, which excepts such corporations from taxation under that Act. As appears from its articles of association, the defendant was organized to conduct the business of mining in Utah Territory, of the buying, selling, leasing and operating mines and mining claims in that Territory, and smelting, reducing and refining works there or elsewhere; of conducting a general mining, milling and smelting business, in all its branches, including buying and selling mineral ores and bullion, carrying on a general mercantile business by buying and selling such goods, merchandise, stores and miners' supplies as are usually kept in and required by the wants of a mining camp or settlement; of the building and operating all such roads, tramways and transportation routes as may be convenient in transporting the products of its business or procuring supplies; of purchasing, hiring and holding all such real and personal property wherever situate, as may be required in carrying on any of its business, and, when no longer required for business purposes, leasing, selling or exchanging the same; and generally to do all acts and things incidental to a general mining business, or to any of the specified pursuits, the corporation being primarily formed for the immediate purpose of working and developing the estate, property and premises known as the Horn Silver Mine, and for the treatment and reduction of the ores and metals therein contained.

The business of the defendant in Utah consisted in mining the ore and manufacturing it into base bullion. The bullion was then shipped to Chicago, where it had a refinery in which the lead was smelted from the base bullion and separated from the silver. The bullion thus refined was then shipped to the City of New York where it was delivered to the United States Assay office, where it was still further refined into standard silver bars, for doing which the defendant paid 2 per cent of the silver. It generally sold the receipts issued for the silver by the assay office in the City of New York; and so much of the proceeds as were not sold there were transmitted to Utah and Chicago for use in the business of the Company at those points. It did not have or carry on within this State any refining or manufacturing establishment: and its claim to be a manufacturing corporation carrying on manufacture within this State is based solely upon the fact that it delivered its bullion to the assay office to be further refined, for a compensation to be paid by it.

Upon these facts the referee found that it was not engaged in the manufacture within this State, and we are of the same opinion. As its name implies, it is a mining corporation, and was organized primarily for that purpose; and all its other business was incidental, connected with and related to that. But even if it could, in any proper sense, according to the common understanding of the phrase used in this statute, be deemed a manufacturing corporation in Utah, yet it cannot with any propriety be said that it carried on manufacture within this State. According to common comprehension and the ordinary use of language, the process of refining this bullion at the assay office was not a manufacture, and the assay office was not a manufacturing establishment. But whether it was or not, the defendant, which employed the assay office for a compensation to refine the bullion, was not itself engaged in the manufacture. It was no more a manufacturer than a farmer is who takes his grain to the grist mill to be ground into flour, for a part of the grain or a money compensation, or who takes his wool to a cloth manufacturer to be made into cloth for a compensation, and then to be returned to him. A railroad company may manufacture all its cars and engines, and yet it cannot be properly classified as a manufacturing company.

The definition of the terms "manufacturing corporations" and "manufacture," as derived from some decisions and statutes to which our attention has been called, is of little service in the construction of the language of this Act. These terms must be construed in view of the general purposes of the Acts in which they are used, and the general phraseology found in connection with them. To give effect to the legislative intention, their ordinary meaning may be enlarged or restricted. Under this section it is not sufficient (to exempt a corporation from taxation) that it is a manufacturing corporation, but it must also carry on manufacture within this State.

In exempting such corporations from taxation under the Act, the Legislature may be supposed to have been influenced by two things: a desire to encourage manufacture within the State, and the fact that a corporation carrying on any manufacturing business within the State would necessarily have visible, tangible property, liable under the general laws of the State to taxation. We are, therefore, constrained to hold that the defendant cannot be allowed the exemption claimed.

Second. It is claimed that the defendant was not during the years 1881 and 1882 "doing business in this State," and that therefore it was not liable to taxation under the Act of 1881. It is quite true that by far the larger share of its business was carried on in Utah and at Chicago. But its president, secretary and treasurer had their offices in New York; the directors held their annual meetings there; its dividends were declared and paid there; its silver bullion was all sent there and sold there, and the proceeds of it received there; some of the proceeds were deposited in banks, some loaned in the City of New York, and some of it used for the purposes of the Company in that city, and the balance was transferred to Chicago and Utah for use in the business of the Company.

There was thus a very substantial portion of its business done in the City of New York. The business did not consist of occasional transactions; but an office was kept there and the business continuously transacted there during the whole year. We cannot construe the words "doing business in this State" to mean the whole business of the Corporation within this State; and while we are not prepared to hold that an occasional business transaction—that keeping an office where meetings of the directors are held, transfer books kept, dividends declared and paid and other business merely incidental to the regular business of the corporation is done,—would bring a corporation within this Act; yet when, as in this case, all these things are done and in addition thereto a substantial part of the regular business of the Corporation is carried on here, then we are unable to say that the Corporation is not brought within the Act as one "doing business in this State."

There is no injustice in subjecting to taxation such a corporation enjoying the benefits of our great mart, the advantages of our social order and the protection of our laws.

Third. It is further claimed that in computing the taxes only, only the amount of defendant's capital employed within this State should have been taken as the basis, and not its entire capital. We do not perceive how it is possible to limit the computation of the taxes as thus claimed.

Section 1 of the Act of 1881 provides that hereafter it shall be the duty of the president and treasurer of every corporation liable to be taxed on its corporate franchises or business to make report to the comptroller annually, in writing, stating specifically the amount of "capital" paid in; that in all cases where any such corporation shall fail to make or declare any dividend upon either its "common or preferred stock," or in case the dividend or dividends made or declared upon either its "common or preferred stock" during the year shall amount to less than 6 per centum upon the par value of the "stock," the treasurer and secretary thereof shall in each year in which no dividend has been made or declared, or in which the dividend made or declared upon either its "common or preferred stock" amounted to less than 6 per centum upon the par value of the "stock," estimate and appraise the "capital stock" of the company upon which no dividend has been made or declared, or upon the par value of which the dividend or dividends made or declared amounted to less than 6 per centum, at its actual value in cash, and shall forward a certificate thereof to the comptroller.

Section 3 provides that every corporation incorporated under any law of this State, or under the laws of any other State or country and doing business in this State, except savings institutions and other corporations named, shall be subject to and pay a tax upon its corporate franchise or business, to be computed as follows: if the dividend or dividends made or declared by such corporation, joint stock company or association during any year amount to 6 or more than 6 per centum upon the par value of "its capital stock," then the tax to be at the rate of one quarter mill upon the "capital stock" for each 1 per centum of dividends so made or declared, or if no dividend be made or declared, or if the dividend or dividends made or declared do not amount to 6 per centum upon the par value of "the capital stock," then the tax to be at the rate of 1½ mills upon each dollar of a valuation of "the capital stock," made in accordance with the provisions of the first section of the Act. And in case any such corporation, joint stock company or association, shall have more than one kind of "capital stock," as for instance "common and preferred stock," and upon one of said stocks a dividend or dividends amounting to 6 or more than 6 per centum upon the par value thereof has been made or declared, and upon the other no dividend has been made or declared, or the dividends made or declared amounted to less than 6 per centum upon the par value thereof, then the tax shall be at the rate of one quarter mill for each one per centum of dividend made or declared "upon the capital stock," upon the par value of which the dividend or dividends made or declared amount to 6 or more than 6 per centum; and in addition thereto, a tax shall be charged at the rate of 1½ mills upon each dollar of a valuation, made also in accordance with the provisions of the Act, of "the capital stock" upon which no dividend was made or declared, or upon the par value of which the dividend or dividends made or declared did not amount to 6 per centum.

It is very clear from this review of the two sections that the whole capital stock—the same stock upon which dividends are declared and paid is to be taken as the basis of taxation. And so we held in People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387, where we said that "We find no authority in this case for apportioning a tax upon such a corporation as this upon the amount of dividends earned in this State, or upon the amount of capital stock employed in this State."

But it is claimed that since the Act of 1882 a different construction should be given to the Act of 1881. The Act of 1882 did not amend any of the sections of the Act of 1881, but added thereto three sections, the first of which, section 11, it is important only to notice. That provides that when the comptroller is dissatisfied with the report of any corporation or association or joint stock company liable to pay a tax under any of the provisions of the Act, whose capital is only partially employed in this State, he is authorized to fix and determine the amount of capital stock which in his judgment shall be the basis for the tax under the provisions of the Act, and to settle an account for the taxes, penalties and interest due the State thereon; and any association, corporation or joint stock company dissatisfied with the account so settled, may, within ten days after notice thereof, appeal therefrom to a board, consisting of the secretary of state, attorney-general and state treasurer; which board on such appeal shall affirm or correct the account so settled by the comptroller, and the decision of such board shall be final.

Under the Act of 1881, it was the duty of every corporation liable to taxation under that Act, annually to make a report to the comptroller stating specifically the amount of its entire capital paid in and the amount and rate of per cent of each dividend declared during the year; and in case it had declared no dividend during the year, or a dividend of less than 6 per centum upon the par value of its stock, it was also required to send a verified estimate and appraisal of its capital stock to the comptroller, and it was provided that if the comptroller was not satisfied with the valuation so made and returned, he could make a valuation thereof and settle an account upon a valuation made by him for the taxes, penalties and interest due the State thereon; and it was further provided that if the corporation was dissatisfied with the account so settled it could appeal to a board consisting of the secretary of state, attorney-general, and state treasurer; which board on such appeal could affirm or correct the account as settled by the comptroller, and the decision of such board was final. Under that Act the whole capital stock was to be reported and in the cases provided the whole capital stock was to be estimated and appraised, and all the clear and express provisions in the Act of 1881 are left unrepealed.

Now what was meant by section 11 in the Act of 1882? It does not authorize the corporation, in making the report required by the first section of the Act of 1881, to report only the amount of its capital employed within this State; and it does not require the comptroller to take the amount of capital so employed as the basis of taxation. The utmost effect that can be given to it is to authorize the comptroller when he shall ascertain that only a portion of the capital of a corporation is employed within this State to fix and determine the amount of capital stock which in his judgment shall be the basis of the tax under the provisions of the Act. That was an authority which he did not have under the Act of 1881. Under that Act he had no right to review the report of the corporation as to the amount of its capital stock, but under the Act of 1882 in all cases where a portion only of the capital stock of the corporation is employed within this State; he has a right to review the report and determine the amount of the capital stock which shall be used as a basis for the tax.

There is another qualification to section 11, and that is before the comptroller can be called upon to exercise his judgment and discretion he must be dissatisfied with the report of the corporation. Here there was no dissatisfaction on the part of the comptroller; and hence the emergency which authorized him to exercise his judgment, in fixing and determining the amount of capital stock which is to be taken as the basis for the tax had not arisen. That this is a proper construction of section 11 of the Act of 1882 is made more clear by reference to chapter 501 of the Laws of 1885.

In that Act section 11 is amended so as to provide in distinct terms that the amount of capital stock which shall be the basis for taxation under the provisions of section 3 of the Act of 1881, in the case of every corporation, joint stock company and association liable to taxation thereunder, "shall be the amount of capital stock employed within this State." Then, for the first time the basis for computing the tax was actually fixed by law, at the amount of capital stock employed within this State; and the discretion conferred upon the comptroller by the same section in the Act of 1882 was taken away.

Therefore, while it is extremely hard and unjust that the defendant should be required to pay a tax computed upon the basis of its entire capital stock, we are unable so to construe the statute as to relieve it therefrom.

The injustice of such a basis of taxation has finally been recognized by the Legislature; and it is quite unfortunate for the defendant that it is deprived of the benefit of this change, particularly as by the fourteenth section of the Act of 1885 the comptroller was authorized and directed, upon the application to him of any corporation, to make, settle and adjust all accounts against such corporation, joint stock company or association, for all taxes and penalties arising under the third section of the Act of 1881 since the 12th day of May, 1882, by taking as a basis for taxation the capital employed within the State by such corporation, association or joint stock company.

But there was a further provision in section 14 that such corporation, joint stock company or association should not be entitled to the benefit of a settlement upon such basis unless it shall have secured such adjustment and paid into the treasury the full amount of the taxes so settled before the first day of August, 1885, nor in the case of any tax for which suit had theretofore been brought by the attorney-general and for which judgment had been entered therein.

As judgment was entered in this action before the passage of that Act the defendant can have no benefit from its provisions.

Fourth. We see no reason to doubt that the defendant was liable to the penalties imposed by section 2 of the Act of 1881, for neglecting to pay the taxes within the time specified therein.

We are reluctantly brought to the conclusion that the judgment below cannot be reversed. If it be true that, as against all other corporations but this defendant and two or three others, the taxes have been computed upon the basis of the capital employed in this State, then the defendant has good reason to complain of unjust discrimination; and it may very properly appeal to the Legislature for the relief which it has failed to obtain elsewhere. A great State can afford to be both just and magnanimous; and it is certainly against a sound public policy to treat with injustice foreign corporations who come to our great metropolis to transact their business and thus add to the prosperity, wealth and importance of our State.

Our conclusion is that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

1. A lease executed by the City of New York in 1810, demising lands for a term of thirty years, containing an agreement that the City, at the expiration of the term, to wit: in 1840, would demise the premises to the lessee, his assigns, etc., for the term of twenty-one years thereafter, with a like covenant for future renewals, should not be so construed as to create a perpetuity.

3. A practical construction given to such lease by two renewals signed by both parties, the latter of which provided for the surrender of the premises, is entitled to great weight in ascertaining its meaning and effect.

The right of renewal was a continuing right.

Moss v. Barton, 35 Beav. 197.

Where there was a lease for twenty-one years, with a covenant to renew on the request of the lessee from twenty-one to twenty-one years to make up ninety-nine years and at the expiration of the first term, rent being in arrears and no application being made for renewal, ejectment was brought and the lessor put in possession; on a bill in chancery for a renewal, a renewal was decreed on payment of the rent, the lessor not having been prejudiced by the neglect to demand the renewal.

Rawstorne v. Bentley, 4 Bro. Ch. 415; Statham v. Trustees Liverpool Docks, 3 Younge & J. Ch. 565; Hunter v. Hopetoun, 13 L. T. N. S. 180; Phyfe v. Wardell, 5 Paige, 279.

The covenant to renew was an independent one; and it was the duty of the lessor to offer the renewal, whether the lessee asked for it or not. Time was in no sense of the essence of the contract. There was no condition precedent for the lessee to perform; and while he remained in possession under renewals he had a right to rely upon the covenant that they should be continued, and had no cause for complaint, and was not bound to bring his action until he learned that the lessor had, by a conveyance, placed it out of his power to further perform the covenant for renewals.

Nicholson v. Smith, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 640; Johnson v. Conger, 14 Abb. Pr. 195; 1 Platt, Leases, 614, 713, 731, 744; Bridges v. Hitchcock, 5 Bro. P. C. 6; Maynie v. Scot, Cro. Eliz. 479; Richardson v. Sydenham, 2 Vern. 447; Brook v. Bulkeley, 2 Ves. 498.

Again; it is a rule in equity that the court will consider done those things which should have been done, and therefore will construe the covenants contained in the latter leases as containing the same provisions as those required in the first one.

Story, Eq. Jur. § 64.

The court below erred in awarding costs against the plaintiffs personally, and also in awarding execution against them. The suit was brought by them as executors; and an execution could only issue by order of the surrogate, and against the property of the deceased. There was no claim of mismanagement or bad faith against them.

Code Civ. Proc. § 3246.

The court below erred in awarding costs on the appeal from the judgment, and also separate costs on the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial. This is expressly prohibited by subdivision 2 of section 3239 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Stanton v. King, 76 N. Y. 585.

Mr. D. J. Dean, with Mr. E. Henry Lacombe, for respondent:

The court should not reform the leases to conform to plaintiffs' prayer for relief.

Courts lean against such a construction of leases as will lead to perpetuities. They should not be astute to reform them so as to lead to the same result.

Carr v. Ellison, 20 Wend. 178; Banker v. Brakes, 9 Abb. N. C. 412; Piggot v. Mason, 1 Paige, 412; Rutgers v. Hunter, 6 Johns. Ch. 215; Hyde v. Skinner, 2 P. Wms. 196.

There is no evidence before the court which will warrant the reformation of either of the leases in question.

The evidence must show that there was a mutual mistake, and that the instrument does not contain some covenant or condition, which the parties supposed that it did contain; or the evidence must establish fraud by one of the parties, by which the other party was deceived and led into a mistake. Before any reformation of a written instrument can be had upon parol evidence of mistake or fraud, such evidence must be very clear and satisfactory.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 10th day of April, 1810, the City of New York executed to Peter Lorillard a lease demising to him certain premises for a term of thirty years ending on the first day of May, 1840. The lease was executed by both parties, and in it the City agreed that at the expiration of the term, to wit: May 1, 1840, it would demise the premises to him, his assigns, etc., "for and during the term of twenty-one years thereafter, with a like covenant for future renewals of the lease as is contained in this present indenture."

On February 1, 1839, Lorillard assigned the lease to John Syms, who thus became substituted in his place. On the first day of April, 1840, the City executed a lease of the same premises to John Syms for another term of twenty-one years in which it covenanted that at the expiration of that lease, to wit: May 1, 1861, it would again demise the premises "in pursuance of this present lease * * * for and during the term of twenty-one years thereafter upon such rents as shall be agreed upon," or determined by two sworn appraisers and an umpire.

On the 20th of April, 1861, the City executed a third lease to John Syms for twenty-one years from May 1, 1861. That lease contained no covenant for renewal, and in it Syms covenanted that at the end of that term he would peaceably and quietly leave, surrender and yield up to the City or its successors or assigns all of the demised premises. Syms died in 1868, having some years before his death erected a valuable building upon the premises.

In April, 1880, the City sold the premises to John B. Haskin. Thereafter, in October, 1880, the plaintiffs, as executors of Syms, commenced this action, alleging in their complaint, among other things, the facts hereinbefore stated, and praying that the City be adjudged to reform the leases dated April 1, 1840, and April 20, 1861, by inserting therein a covenant for a further renewal of twenty-one years from May 1, 1882, and that the sale and conveyance to Haskin be set aside, and the plaintiffs be given a renewal lease for twenty-one years from May 1, 1882, or if the defendant had put it out of its power to perform the covenant by having sold the premises, that it and Haskin be adjudged to pay the plaintiffs their damages by them sustained for the conversion of the building on the premises to their own use, and for damages by depriving the plaintiffs of a further renewal of the lease of the demised premises to the amount of $18,000.

Upon the trial, at the close of the evidence, the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant.

We are of opinion that the verdict was properly directed. The lease executed in 1810 should not be so construed as to create a perpetuity. Rutgers v. Hunter, 6 Johns. Ch. 215; Carr v. Ellison, 20 Wend. 178; Piggot v. Mason, 1 Paige, 412; Banker v. Braker, 9 Abb. N. C. 411.

Its language is satisfied by holding that it gave the lessee the right to two renewals, and those renewals were subsequently given; and it must be assumed that the parties so understood the first lease. The two renewals signed by both parties gave that lease a practical construction which should have great weight with any court called upon to ascertain its meaning and effect.

But the second lease executed in 1840, which then defined the rights of the parties, contained a covenant for but one renewal. In the last lease there was no covenant for renewal; and in that lease the lessee absolutely covenanted at the end of his term to surrender up the premises to the lessor. So long as that lease remained in its present form, neither the lessee nor any person claiming under him could assert any right to the premises after its termination. It defines the precise rights of the parties in the demised premises, and neither could assert anything in contravention of it.

This action was brought mainly for the purpose of reforming the last two leases. But there was no proof of any mistake or fraud in their execution or in the terms inserted in them; and therefore, even if the Statute of Limitations did not furnish a bar to the action to reform the leases, there was no basis or ground for their reformation. The plaintiffs' action, therefore, utterly failed; and a verdict was properly directed for the defendant.

The judgment entered upon the verdict provides that the defendant should recover costs of the plaintiffs and have execution therefor. At the general term it was also adjudged that the City should recover of the plaintiffs, as executors, its costs, and should have execution therefor. The plaintiffs now complain of this provision for costs, and cite section 3246 of the Code. That section expressly authorizes costs against them as executors. The court did not direct them to pay the costs personally; but the judgment for costs is against them in their representative capacity.

After a verdict had been directed for the defendant, the plaintiffs moved for a new trial upon the judge's minutes, which was denied, and after entry of judgment they appealed to the general term, both from the order denying their motion for a new trial and from the judgment; and at the general term both the order and judgment were affirmed, and the court awarded against the plaintiffs, not only costs upon the appeal from the judgment, but also $10 costs upon the appeal from the order. Having awarded costs upon the appeal from the judgment, the court had no power to award costs upon the appeal from the order. Code, § 3239, subd. 2.

It is a small matter and should have been corrected in the court below, and we have no means of knowing that it was not corrected in the judgment finally entered.

The judgments in the court below should not have contained the provisions that the defendant should have executions for its costs. The judgments for costs could be enforced by executions only in case they were allowed by the surrogate, as provided in sections 1825 and 1826 of the Code. But this is an innocuous informality. Any informality in the judgment should have been corrected by motion; and if the plaintiffs failed upon such motion, in a matter affecting a substantial right, not resting in discretion, they could have reached this court by an appeal from the order denying their motion. We do not correct such informalities upon a mere appeal from the judgment.

The judgment should, therefore, be affirmed, with costs against the plaintiffs as executors.

All concur.

(Decided March 22, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Chemung Oyer and Terminer on conviction of defendant of the crime of body stealing. Reversed.

The defendant was jointly indicted with Edmund A. Reilly and J. Thomas Nealson. The indictment alleged "That the said * * * on the 9th day of April, 1885, at the City of Elmira, in the County of Chemung, with force and arms, unlawfully and feloniously, did remove the dead body of a human being, to wit: that of William Irvine, from a grave or place where the same had been buried, without authority of law, for the purpose of dissection, for procuring the reward for the return of the same, and for motives of malice and wantonness, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided."

The defendant was tried separately and convicted, and on appeal to the general term the conviction and judgment entered thereon was affirmed.

HARDIN, P. J., dissenting, stated the facts as follows:

"General Irvine died in the City of San Francisco on the night of November 12, 1882, suddenly, having during the day been out gunning, returning to his home during the evening, after partaking of a light repast, consisting of tea, eggs, cold meat and bread and butter, prepared by his wife, Phœbe, who with their daughter, Mrs. Merkle, were occupying apartments together. Soon after partaking of the refreshments he became distressed and made complaints of internal pains. The daughter left for a physician and upon returning they found that death had taken place. The remains were taken that night to the rooms of an undertaker and they were subsequantly embalmed and on the 4th of December were conveyed by the widow and daughter to the City of Elmira, where they were interred in Woodlawn Cemetery.

"About a year after the death inquiry was instituted as to the cause thereof and the defendant employed a detective named Nealson, who visited the City of Elmira, and returned to San Francisco and made a report to the defendant, who then applied to the undertaker who embalmed the body, and to Dr. Wooster, the decedent's intimate friend and physician, who had viewed the body, and they gave affidavits of certain facts within their knowledge.

"In the affidavit of Dr. Wooster, subscribed March 11, 1885, in connection with the statement of facts he adds, 'In my opinion he was first poisoned in his food or drink, and then when in agony from the effects of the dose, he was struck on the head to stop his contortions and groans.'

"Porter, the undertaker, stated in the affidavit subscribed by him the condition of the remains when he received them, and that sundry persons viewed the remains, 'among others Dr. Wooster, who remarked that to him it looked as having been poisoned.'

"With these papers in her possession the defendant visited the City of Elmira, where she met the detective Nealson. She sought legal counsel as to the method to be pursued, in order to investigate whether General Irvine died a natural or unnatural death. She consulted an attorney, who advised her that the coroner of the County of Chemung, had jurisdiction to hold an inquest over the remains, and that the 'papers upon their face authorized him (the coroner) or were sufficient, upon which he might exercise his discretion in the matter.'

"The defendant and Nealson visited the office of Dr. Reilly, the Coroner of the County of Chemung, and held a conversation in regard to the circumstances attending the death of the deceased. The affidavits of Porter and Dr. Wooster were presented to the coroner, and the defendant asked Dr. Reilly 'to do his duty as a coroner; to examine and see if the proofs were sufficient to authorize him in proceedings' and 'that she wished the body to be taken up and the stomach or some part of it to be analyzed to see if there was any trace of poison there. She made the request that the evidence should be produced if it was there.'

"After that interview Coroner Reilly determined to proceed in the premises. He visited Nathan Baker, Superintendent of Woodlawn Cemetery at his house and said to him, viz.: 'That he had evidence to satisfy him that a wrong had been perpetrated, or sufficient to warrant him in making an examination of the body of General Irvine. * * * That he had sufficient grounds of acting, and he asked Baker, the superintendent, to act,' showing him one of the affidavits and stating that he had others. Thereupon the superintendent determined to act in the premises and facilitate the proceedings in behalf of the coroner. Thereupon directions were given Abbott, the sexton, to open the grave and remove the remains to the vault in the cemetery for the purpose of an examination.

"Reilly, the coroner, also applied to Dr. Wey to become one of two physicians to make the examination; and on the evening of the 8th of April. Reilly visited the office of Wey, with Nealson, avowing that he had full authority in the premises 'to conduct an examination and have an examination made by the physicians.' The hour was fixed for an examination at ten the next morning, and Reilly informed Wey that he would 'notify Dr. Squires * * * and we might expect to meet at the receiving vault in Woodlawn Cemetery' at ten the next morning. Accordingly they met the next morning at the receiving vault in Woodlawn Cemetery, where the physicians found Coroner Reilly, and Nealson, Baker and Abbott. The body was found lying in a coffin or casket on the floor of the receiving vault. The coroner made a minute of the nature of the covering of the coffin and its handles and the plate and the descriptions of every other matter connected therewith. Drs. Wey and Squires raised the head and shoulders of the body and after carefully scrutinizing the face and the coroner making a minute thereof, a careful examination was made of the head, and the stomach and duodenum and certain other parts of the body were removed and delivered to Dr. Reilly, who placed them in a vessel he had prepared for that purpose.

"After the examination the coroner went over to the house of Abbott, the sexton, in the cemetery grounds, where Baker suggested the propriety of having a coroner's jury and Wey replied, 'It is too late for such a proceeding.'

"Baker testified that he was present at the request of the coroner to identify the remains, and that he did so identify them, and that he was sworn upon that point by the coroner; that while at the vault he had a conversation with Dr. Reilly, the coroner, and he adds, viz.: 'Dr. Reilly and myself conversed for a few minutes about having a jury and I said to Dr. Reilly there was enough within the bounds of the cemetery to make up a jury; and he asked if I would have them all come to the house, and I so ordered, and they came. I think there were five men that came off the cemetery. I think there were nine men there then. When I had sent for the men I went back to the house and did not go in the vault again. About that time Dr. Wey came over to the house.'

"He also testifies that he held a conversation with Dr. Wey and stated as follows, viz.: 'Dr. Reilly has seemed to think it advisable to have a jury. There are men enough here to have a jury without delaying, they are already here; and Dr. Wey said it was of no use; that if there was anything found to show that this man died from any causes other than natural causes the whole procedure would have to go to California, and this jury would never be heard of again. I stepped out of doors, and Reilly was coming over from the vault, and he had not yet come in the house; and I said, Dr. Wey thinks it is entirely useless to have a jury, and I don't wish to urge this matter one way or the other, Doctor; and Dr. Wey came out and he repeated to Dr. Reilly what he had said to me in the house, that it was no use to have a jury and he gave his reasons as I have stated.'

"No jury was, in fact, sworn to hold an inquest. The remains were recoffined and returned to the grave, except the parts removed therefrom as already stated."

Mr. Jacob Schwartz, for appellant:

Any coroner of Chemung County had jurisdiction to hold an inquest over the body of General Irvine.

Smith, Coroners, 620.

Whenever information comes to a coroner that a person has died suddenly under such circumstances as to afford a reasonable ground that the death was occasioned by criminal means, the law makes it the duty of that coroner to go to the place where the body is and investigate the cause of death.

Code Crim. Proc. § 773.

There are two distinct elements necessary to be established to constitute this crime, viz.: first, the body must be removed from the place where it is buried, without authority of law; second, such removal must be effected with either of the following purposes, viz.: 1, to sell the body; 2, to dissect it; 3, to procure a reward for its return; 4, from wantonness or malice.

3 R. S. 5th ed. 968, 969; Penal Code, § 311.

The coroner is the sole judge as to the propriety and necessity of holding an inquest. There is no exception to his will; there is no appeal from his determination.

Smith, Coroners, 620.

The statute prescribes the manner in which the inquest shall be held, but it does not say how the removal of the body shall be effected. It has no legal bearing on this case, that the inquest was improperly held. It has no legal bearing on this case that no inquest at all has been held. The removal of the body is no part of the inquest; and this court has gone so far as to hold that the post mortem itself is no part of the inquest, and that not even the jurors have a right to witness the examination.

Crisfield v. Perine, 15 Hun, 200; affirmed, 81 N. Y. 622.

Mr. John B. Stanchfield, for respondents:

The death of Irvine having taken place in the State of California, the interment of the body in the County of Chemung in the State of New York, gave no jurisdiction to a coroner of that county to act in the premises.

Reg. v. Great Western R. Co. 3 Q. B. 333; Code Crim. Proc. § 773.

The failure of the coroner to proceed in the manner required by the Code of Criminal Procedure was a jurisdictional defect, and made him, and all interested with him, whether present or absent, trespassers and criminally amenable to the law ab initio.

Code Crim. Proc. §§ 773–775.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The facts of this extraordinary case are fully stated in the dissenting opinion of Hardin, J., at general term. We should content ourselves with concurring in that opinion were it not that it simply orders a new trial for errors in the charge and for refusal to charge, while we think that it should have gone further, and have held that the facts of the case did not establish a crime punishable under the statute against body stealing (Penal Code, § 311) under which the prisoner was indicted and convicted, and which is in the following words:

"Sec. 311. A person who removes the dead body of a human being, or any part thereof, from a grave, vault or other place where the same has been buried, or from a place where the same has been deposited while awaiting burial, without authority of law, with intent to steal the same, or for the purpose of dissection, or for the purpose of procuring a reward for the return of the same, or from malice or wantonness, is punishable by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or both."

This statute describes every kind of "body stealing" known to the law. The addition inserted in the Penal Code, "or for the purpose of obtaining a reward for the same," was the only substantial change made since the Revised Statutes in the definition of this heinous crime.

The intent of the statute is manifest. It certainly was not intended to apply to exhumations made by legally constituted public authorities, for the purpose of ascertaining whether crime has been committed in producing the death of the person whose body is exhumed.

When the exhumation is made, not secretly, but publicly, on open application to the officer of justice charged with the duty of inquiring into the cause of death of any person whose body is brought within his jurisdiction, it is a total misapplication of the statute against body stealing to use it for the purpose of imposing its punishment on all persons concerned in the exhumation in case any proceedings of the officer, under whose direction it was made, should be found to be irregular.

The irregularity alleged in this case in the conduct of the coroner is that he did not empanel a jury before he ordered the post mortem examination to be made by the physicians whom he summoned for the purpose. A sufficient number of persons to form a jury was assembled by direction of the coroner, but the jury was not sworn and empaneled. I refer to the opinion of Judge Hardin as correctly stating the facts which we have verified by an examination of the testimony.

The point of law is debatable whether a post mortem should take place before the coroner has empaneled a jury. But it is settled that the post mortem should not be in the presence of the jury, and that they are to be instructed by the testimony of the physicians who are designated by the coroner to make it. The dissection by order of the coroner is expressly authorized. Penal Code, § 308; Crisfield v. Perine, 15 Hun, 202; affirmed, 81 N. Y. 622.

If, as in England at one time, the findings of the coroner's jury were to stand as an indictment by a grand jury, some point might be made on behalf of the accused as to the validity of the inquest in such a case as this. But to resort to those questions for the purpose of supporting an indictment for body stealing, under the circumstances of this case, is quite unreasonable.

In the present case the defendant communicated to the coroner in the form of affidavits, whether legally authenticated or not is immaterial, information which should have induced any magistrate, not neglectful of his duty, to believe that he ought to investigate the matter presented to him. Those affidavits made a strong case to lead the coroner to believe that a murder had been committed, and that an examination of the body, which was within his jurisdiction, would disclose the fact.

The defendant sought an examination of the body. She asked the coroner to do his duty, and to examine the body. Whatever motives may have influenced her, no one can suppose that, however unfounded her belief might have been, there was not sufficient in the papers she presented to the coroner to justify his action, and there is no pretense that the affidavit of Doctor Wooster, which she produced, had been in any manner influenced by her. Her silence during several years after the death of General Irvine is the main argument against the bona fides of her charge, and it is said that her desire was not so much for the punishment of crime as to obtain some pecuniary advantage for herself by making defamatory charges.

However this may be, if she committed a wrong it was not the crime of body stealing, and on this ground the conviction, and the judgment of the General Term affirming it, should be reversed and the prisoner discharged.

All concur.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Westchester Circuit on a verdict for plaintiff of $1,420 damages in an action for injuries occasioned by a fall on an icy sidewalk in defendant city. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Joseph F. Daly, for appellant.

Mr. John F. Brennan, for respondent.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was submitted to the jury under instructions that a municipal corporation is bound to keep its sidewalks safe and convenient for the passage of the public, so far as reasonable diligence and the possession of adequate resources will allow; and the application of this rule to conditions resulting from the rigors and changes of a northern winter, and to two emergencies which frequently occur, was very fairly and justly discussed and limited.

It often happens that in a single day or night every street and sidewalk in a city or village is covered with a heavy fall of snow. It is not expected and cannot be required that the corporation shall itself forthwith employ laborers to clean all the walks and so accomplish the object by a slow and expensive process when the result may be effected more swiftly and easily by imposing that duty upon the citizens. Each can promptly and without unreasonable burden clean the snow from his own premises; and the authorities may justly and lawfully require that to be done, under the jurisdiction conferred by their charters.

But although the municipality makes the necessary regulation it is not thereby relieved from responsibility. The duty remains, and it must therefore see to it that its ordinance is obeyed. It is entitled, however, to a reasonable time within which to perform the duty in the manner permitted, and is not guilty of negligence if, observing that the work is being generally done, it awaits for a reasonable period the action of the citizens. But when such reasonable time has been given, the corporation must compel the adjoining owners or occupants to act, or do the work itself; and if it suffers the obstruction to remain thereafter with notice, actual or constructive, of its existence, it may become responsible for injuries resulting.

Another and different emergency sometimes occurs and was referred to in the charge to the jury. When the streets have been wholly or partially cleaned it often happens that a fall of rain or the melting of adjoining snow is suddenly followed by severe cold which covers everything with a film or layer of ice and makes the walks slippery and dangerous. This frozen surface it is practically impossible to remove until a thaw comes which remedies the evil. The municipality is not negligent for awaiting that result. It may and should require householders, when the danger is great, to sprinkle upon the surface ashes or sand or the like, as a measure of prudence and precaution, but is not responsible for their omission. It is no more bound to put upon the ice (which it cannot reasonably remove) such foreign material than to cover it with boards. The emergency is one which is common to every street in the village or city, and which the corporation is powerless to combat. Usually it lasts but a few days, and the corporate authorities may await without negligence a change of temperature which will remove the danger.

Both of these emergencies are shown to have existed in the present case, and as to both the learned trial judge gave to the defendant the full benefit of the rule as we have stated it. But there were further facts: the sidewalk along Buena Vista Avenue, where it passed an unoccupied lot, was bounded on its inner line by an unprotected bank of earth. For two years the action of rain and frost had thrown upon the walk sand, gravel and stones from the bank, until the flagging was entirely covered by it, and a new and sloping grade substituted for the one adopted. The sand on the inner line was about eight inches in depth, growing less toward the curb, where it was about one inch. Mixed in with this were stones, some of which were as large as apples. When the winter came this walk was covered with snow which was never removed. Before the accident the snow fall had been heavy, but it was evidently not recent, for upon this walk it had been trampled down by travel, and by freezing and thawing converted into ice.

These facts tended to establish negligence on the part of the City. If the slope of the walk was not dangerous in the summer weather, it might become so when coated with ice in the winter; and those having the care of the highway were very blind if they did not foresee the possible danger. No one, however, appears to have been injured by it when simply in this condition, for the reason probably that sand was continually washed upon it from the adjoining bank. But this protection disappeared before the plaintiff was injured. On the night preceding, rain fell which washed the sand from the ice, and then froze, covering everything with a new surface, and making the whole city slippery and dangerous for travelers. That was just as true of walks cleaned as of those not cleaned; and it may even be the fact that the latter, when paved, became by reason of their smoothness, the most dangerous of all. That such was the situation was very strongly shown by the conduct of plaintiff himself. He boarded in a house adjoining the vacant lot of which we have spoken, and standing so far above the grade of the street that ten steps led down to the sidewalk in front. On coming out in the morning with a companion, and observing the situation, he hesitated to come down his own steps to the sidewalk although clear of snow as we may fairly assume; and chose rather as a measure of safety to take another route. He went through the picket fence at the side, and on to the vacant lot which was covered with snow, and thence down to the sidewalk, which he essayed to cross, intending to go to his work through the middle of the street and on the roadway.

His conduct pictures the situation perfectly, He stepped on the new ice surface, just formed, and for the existence of which the City was in no respect responsible. Had that been the whole of the case, a recovery would have been impossible. But this new ice formed on a slope, having a fall toward the curb of six or seven inches in ten feet, which the City had negligently suffered to remain. If that slope was one concurring cause of the fall, without which the accident would not have happened, the City is liable.

We have stated the rule to be that "When two causes combine to produce an injury to a traveler upon a highway, both of which are in their nature proximate, the one being a culpable defect in a highway and the other some occurrence for which neither party is responsible, the municipality is liable, provided the injury would not have been sustained but for such defect." Ring v. Cohoes, 77 N. Y. 88.

Now the jury were plainly charged that the new ice recently formed furnished no ground of negligence on the part of the city; and it necessarily followed that the jury found the slope of the walk to have been a concurrent cause without which the accident would not have happened.

The only remaining inquiry is whether there were any facts which permitted that inference or whether there were none; and the conclusion was mere guess and speculation. The fact proved was that the plaintiff slipped on the ice lying on a slope. The inference, it is claimed, is natural and logical and sustained by common observation and experience—that both of the conditions entered into the accident as proximate causes. But no one can say that if the new ice had spread over a level the plaintiff would not have fallen; and there is nothing in the case pointing to the slope as a concurrent cause, beyond the bare fact that it existed, and so nothing to redeem the inference sought from the domain of mere guess and speculation. The question involved has been quite earnestly debated in other States, where it arose under statutes requiring towns to keep the streets safe and convenient.

In Maine and Massachusetts it is held that if besides the defect in the way there is also another proximate cause of the injury contributing directly to the result, for which neither of the parties is in fault, the town is not liable. Moore v. Abbott, 32 Maine, 46; Moulton v. Sanford, 51 Maine, 127; Marble v. Worcester, 4 Gray, 395; Billings v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 329.

These rulings are based largely upon two grounds: that the town is liable for the defect alone, and that the proportion of injury due to that cause is impossible to be ascertained. A contrary rule is held in Vermont and New Hampshire. Hunt v. Pownal, 9 Vt. 411; Winship v. Enfield, 42 N. H. 197.

We have already stated the rule to be in this State that the defect, even when a concurring cause, must be such that without its operation the accident would not have happened. Where the defect is the sole explanation of the injury there is no difficulty; but where there is also another for which no one is responsible we have held that "The plaintiff must fail if his evidence does not show that the damage was produced by the former cause;" Searles v. Manhattan R. Co. (N. Y.) 2 Cent. Rep. 442, 101 N. Y. 661; and we added that he must fail also if it is just as probable that the injury came from one cause as the other, because he is bound to make out his case by a preponderance of evidence; and the jury must not be left to a mere conjecture or to act upon a bare possibility.

In this case that rule was violated. The plaintiff slipped upon the ice. That by itself was a sufficient, certain and operating cause of the fall. No other explanation is needed to account for what happened. It is possible that the slope of the walk had something to do with it. It is equally possible that it did not. There is not a particle of proof that it did. To affirm it is a pure guess and an absolute speculation. Are we to send it to a jury for them to imagine what might have been? The great balance of probability is that the ice was the efficient cause; there is no probability not wholly speculative that the slope was also such. Its descent was slight, not quite an inch in a foot, and not more than constantly occurs in the streets of a city. No knowledge or intelligence can determine or ascertain that such a slope had any part or share in the injury, and to send the question to the jury is simply to let them guess at it and then upon that guess to sustain a verdict for damages. I am quite willing to hold cities and villages to a reasonable performance of duties; but I am not willing to make them practically insurers by founding their liability upon mere possibilities.

For these reasons I think the plaintiff should fail and the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted.

Judgment reversed; new trial granted; costs to abide event.

Re Petition of KINGS COUNTY ELEVATED R. CO. to Acquire Title to Lands of Ernest Nathan.*

Same, Re Lands of John O'Brien.

Same, Re Lands of Mary Duane.

1. The application for the appointment of commissioners to determine the routes of a contemplated railway, under the Rapid Transit Act (Laws 1875, chap. 606), need not be verified by all the subscribers thereto; the requirements of the statute are satisfied if the application is proved by a single witness upon oath to have been signed by the persons whose names are thereto appended.
2. Held, upon the facts, that, upon filing the certificate and articles of association required by said Act of 1875, on January 6, 1879, the petitioner, the Kings County Elevated R. Co. then became, and that it now is, a corporation.
3. Held, that a condition affixed by the common council of Brooklyn to its consent to the construction of petitioner's proposed roads, to the effect that the company should enter into a bond to pay into the city treasury semi-annually, for the benefit of the city, 2 per cent of its gross receipts, was (even if the common council had power to affix any conditions to its consent), a condition which could not be performed until after the road should be constructed, and did not prevent the consent of the common council (in connection with that of property owners) being effective to give the company power to appropriate interests in land for the construction of its roads.
4. Other conditions, affixed to such consent by the common council, requiring the company to consent that the city assessors should arbitrate all damages caused to property owners by the construction of the road, and that portions of the road should be completed at certain dates specified (being different from the dates fixed by the commissioners)—held, to be beyond the power of the common council and in conflict with the statute.
5. The articles of association prepared by the commissioners provided that the time unavoidably consumed by legal proceedings, etc., "or otherwise," should not be deemed a part of the period limited for the completion of the road. Held, that the time intervening between the date of the resolution of the commissioners limiting the time for the completion of the road and the date of the incorporation of the company should not be counted against the company; nor should the time unavoidably consumed by the impossibility of obtaining the consent of property owners, or its equivalent, or the consent of the local authorities, be counted.

6. The forfeiture to the county supervisors of the corporate rights of a company organized under the Act of 1875, prescribed by that Act in case the railway shall not be completed within the time fixed by the articles of association, is not worked by the mere default, without the intervention of the courts or action on the part of the State or of the county.

7. The commissioners having located fifteen different routes, fixed (in the articles of association under which the petitioner was organized) the time within which five only of such routes should be completed, and omitted to determine any period within which the remaining ten should be finished. Held, that this omission was not fatal to the whole scheme; that the different routes being distinct and the provisions in respect to them being severable, the right of the petitioner to the routes, the time for the completion of which had been properly limited, was not affected by such omissions in respect to other routes; but such other routes, for which no time was fixed, were for that reason not legally designated for any railway, and the streets included in them are open to occupation by another company.

APPEAL by the Kings County Elevated Railway Company from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming an order of the Kings Special Term denying a petition for the appointment of commissioners of appraisal. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

A clause of forfeiture upon nonperformance of a condition, does not per se disturb the right which is the subject of the grant of gift but is, in judgment of law, merely the justification for an entry and taking of possession, or for a judicial proceeding to ascertain and enforce such forfeiture.

Jackson v. Topping, 1 Wend. 388; Hasbrook v. Paddock, 1 Barb. 635; Linden v. Hepburn, 3 Sandf. Ch. 668.

Conceding the power of the Legislature to provide that a corporation may lose its life without the intervention of the courts, each case depends upon the construction of the language used. Two cases are found where this court has held that the forfeiture became complete per se on the happening of the thing provided against.

Re Brooklyn R. R. Co. 72 N. Y. 245; Brooklyn Steam Transit Co. v. Brooklyn, 78 N. Y. 524.

In the former case the provision was: "Its corporate existence and powers cease." In the latter case it was: "This Act and all the powers, rights and franchises herein and hereby granted shall be deemed forfeited and terminated." Both these cases recognize the general doctrine that the omission to perform a duty imposed on a corporation does not ipso facto destroy the corporate character or existence. It was only by a peculiar and pointed wording of the statute in those cases that the result obtained.

Re N. Y. Elevated R. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 327; Denike v. N. Y. etc. Cement Co. 80 N. Y. 599; Bank of Niagara v. Johnson, 8 Wend. 645; People v. Manhattan Co. 9 Wend. 351; Mickles v. Rochester City Bank, 11 Paige, 118.

But further; the statute provides that on default the rights acquired by the company shall be transferred to the Supervisors of Kings County. Under that language the corporate character and powers of the company not only are not lost ipso facto on default, but the cause of forfeiture, if any, exists only in favor of the supervisors; and until they assert their rights and make an entry the title of the company is not devested, and cannot be questioned by a third person.

There has been no default amounting to a cause of forfeiture of the charter. The consent of the property holders were conditions precedent to the right to go ahead.

Constitution, art. 3, § 18; Laws 1875, chap. 606, § 4.

Without them the Company could not build. The limitation of time in the Act can only refer to the time elapsing after the Company had power to go ahead. No statute of limitation begins to run until the right of action accrues. Any other construction involves an absurdity.

Angell, Limitations, § 42.

The provision as to the time, in the consent of the municipality of 1879, is from its very nature a condition subsequent within all the authorities. Furthermore, it was a condition which became impossible of performance because contrary to law. It was unlawful to build without the consent of the property owners, which we absolutely were unable to obtain. In such a case the law is well settled that the consent itself attaches to it as a valid execution of a power, and the conditions fall. Such conditions are strictly construed.

The rule which prevents the existence of a corporation being questioned collaterally does not apply where a corporation is attempting to condemn land under the power of eminent domain. In such a case the owner can attack its existence.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant by proceedings instituted April 8, 1886, sought to have an easement or interest appurtenant to certain lands abutting on Fulton Street, in the City of Booklyn, appropriated to its use for railway purposes; and to that end applied by petition to the court at special term for the appointment of commissioners of appraisal. It was there denied, not in the exercise of discretion, but upon the ground as stated in the order, "that the petitioner had never obtained the consent of the local authorities of the City of Brooklyn to the construction of its road in Fulton Street."

Upon appeal to the general term, the order appears to have been affirmed upon the further ground that by reason of certain defaults on its part, or noncompliance with conditions imposed by its articles of association, the petitioner had lost its corporate powers, including the right to take proceedings for the condemnation of private property for public use.

The petitioner was organized as a railway company under chapter 606 of the Laws of 1875, which provides for the construction and operation of a steam railway or railways in the counties of this State, and on the performance of certain conditions imposed by that Act, is permitted to exercise the power of eminent domain over lands, or any interest therein necessary for the construction or operation of its road, in the manner or by the special proceedings prescribed thereby. Sec. 17.

For that purpose there must be a company duly incorporated, and which, having complied with the conditions named in the Act, has the power and the intention in good faith to construct and finish a railroad to and from the places named in its articles of association; § 18; and unless these facts are alleged, and upon hearing found to exist, the petition cannot be maintained.

It is not denied that the petition at the bottom of these proceedings was in the form, and set out all the facts, made essential by statute; but the question raised by the answer to the petition in each case, and now relied upon by the learned counsel for the respondent, includes not only those on which the special and general terms of the court below put their decision, but one going to the very existence of the petitioner.

So we have before us three material propositions: 1, that the company never acquired a corporate existence; 2, that it never performed the conditions imposed by the Act of 1875 (supra), and therefore lost its franchises; 3, that it never obtained the consent of the local authorities having control of that portion of Fulton Street upon which it was proposed to construct the railway.

First. The Act relating to the formation of these corporations (Laws of 1875, supra) prescribes that whenever it shall be made to appear to the supervisors of the county or the mayor of the city as the case may be, by the application of fifty reputable householders and taxpayers, verified upon oath before a justice of the supreme court, that there is need in their county of a steam railway, commissioners shall be appointed who, if they find such railway necessary, shall fix and determine its route or routes, "Provided, That the consent of the owners of one half the property bounded on (or in lieu thereof, the consent of commissioners appointed by the supreme court), and the consent also of the local authorities having the control of that portion of a street or highway upon which it is proposed to construct or operate such railway, be first obtained." Secs. 1, 5.

In this case the application on which commissioners were appointed to determine the necessity of the proposed road is conceded to have been signed by the requisite number of qualified persons and to have been sufficient in form. But it was verified by one of the subscribers only; and therefore it is contended by the learned counsel for the respondents that it was insufficient to give jurisdiction to the mayor to entertain and pass upon the application, his claim being that each subscriber should have made oath.

We think the statute was satisfied. It requires only that the application shall be verified upon oath, before a supreme court judge, that is by a witness upon oath before him to have been really signed by the persons whose names are thereto appended. Sixty names appear upon the application. One affiant stated that he knew each of the persons represented by those names, save five, and saw them sign it; another said the same as to four of these five; and a supreme court judge certified that these statements were sworn to before him.

The application was therefore duly verified, and the order appointing the commissioners justified. It was made on the 23d of March, 1878, and it is conceded that the persons thus appointed, duly qualified as required by law (§ 4), and entered upon and executed their duties. They, thereupon, by public notice, invited plans for construction and operation of such railway "upon the route or routes, and in the locations theretofore determined by them" (§ 5), and many other things relating to the running of the road and the amount of capital stock of "the company to be formed for the purpose of constructing, maintaining and operating such railway." Sec. 6.

It is by the Act (supra) made the duty of the commissioners to prepare articles of association for a company to be formed, and to set forth therein the particulars, requirements and conditions imposed by the commissioners, pursuant to the sections above referred to, and which the statute says "shall provide for the release and forfeiture to the supervisors of the county, of all rights and franchises acquired by such corporation, in case such railway or railways shall not be completed within the time and upon the conditions therein provided. Sec. 7.

It should be observed that up to this time no company was in existence to profit by the necessity which had been declared to exist for a steam railway, or which could claim the right to construct or maintain it. The next statutory step is in that direction, and the scheme was completed when, after notice, capital stock had been subscribed for and the subscribers met for organization and the election of directors. Secs. 8, 9.

The commissioners were then required to deliver to the directors a certificate, setting forth the articles of association, theretofore prepared by them, and the organization of the Company, which when filed with an affidavit, showing the subscription and payment in of stock, and "that it is intended in good faith to construct, maintain and operate the railway or railways in such articles of association mentioned," constituted the persons who had subscribed them a corporation by the name specified therein, with the powers and privileges, and subject to the duties and restrictions of corporations (§ 9); and a copy of such certificate and affidavit duly certified is made "presumptive evidence of the incorporation of such company, and of the facts therein stated."

All these prescribed duties on the part of the commissioners and acts on the part of the directors were performed and a copy of their report, certificate and articles of association, and affidavit certified by the secretary of state, was in evidence. It showed that the originals were filed January 6, 1869, and thus it appeared that the Company on that day acquired the franchise of being and acting as a corporation.

Its right to build and operate a railway in the streets of Brooklyn was, however, limited, not only by the Constitution of the State, but as we have seen, by the Statute of 1875, supra, and also by the very terms of the articles of association. The routes over which it might construct and operate its road were, as fixed by the commissioners, fifteen in number, and among others, one on or through Fulton Street. They directed that certain specified portions of the railway should be constructed and ready for operation at specified times, one within one year from the first of August, 1878, two within three years of the first of August, 1878, one within one year and six months from the first of August, 1878, but at the same time provided, that the time, if any, unavoidably consumed by the pendency of legal proceedings or by the delay or interference of the public authorities in refusing or neglecting to give their consent to the use of the streets and avenues as required in section 4 of chapter 606 of the Laws of 1875, or otherwise, should not be deemed a part of any period of time within which the construction and completion of the railway or railways is required to be made, but be added to each of the periods otherwise limited for such construction and completion. And as they were authorized to do by statute (Laws 1875, § 7, supra) the commissioners declared that, in case the several portions of such railway or railways shall not be completed each within the time and upon the conditions hereinbefore; and as to such portions provided for, the rights and franchises acquired by such corporation shall be released and forfeited to the supervisors of the County of Kings.

The work through the route in question was not completed within the time mentioned, and so it is said that a forfeiture is incurred and the Company made incapable of going on. The right to do so under any circumstances was dependent upon the consent of a certain proportion of the abutting owners, or its equivalent, and the consent also of the local authorities. It appears that the necessary consent of property owners had been obtained before the institution of these proceedings, and various action had been taken on the part of the municipal authorities. The sufficiency of that action is a material and difficult question in the case.

On the 30th of June, 1879, the common council of the City of Brooklyn by resolution declared "that this common council do hereby consent to the construction and operation of an elevated railway or railways, over, along and through the following routes, fixed, determined and located by the rapid transit commissioners" (meaning the commissioners whose action has already been referred to), and describing the routes specified in the articles of association, and among others the one in question; following this resolution were two others, not important here. Then come these words: "Provided, That the consent of the common council is hereby given upon the following conditions: noncompliance on the part of the Company with all or any one of which shall render this consent void."

So far as the respondent deems them material as bearing upon this controversy, they are: 1, that the Company shall enter into good and sufficient bond to the city in the sum of $200,000, that it will pay into its treasury, semi-annually for the benefit of the city, 2 per cent of its gross receipts; 2, that it shall consent that the city assessors shall arbitrate all damages caused to property owners by the construction of the road; 3, that portions of the railway shall be completed at certain times specified, the latest of which is June 1, 1881.

On the part of the appellant the claim is made that the consent embodied in the first resolution became at once valid and effectual, and fixed the municipal authorities of Brooklyn so effectually that the Company must be deemed to have thereby met and satisfied the requirement of the Constitution and statute, and the exaction of the articles of association, each of which requires the consent of the public authorities to the use of the streets and avenues for railway purposes. In effect its contention is that all of the matter set forth in the resolution of June 30, 1879, save that consent was ultra vires the power of the common council; and therefore that the decision of the special term, in which a contrary conclusion was reached, should have been reversed.

On the other side it is insisted that a municipality whose consent is necessary to the construction of a railway in the public streets may impose such conditions as it thinks necessary in granting its consent, and that the company to which it is given cannot enjoy the benefit while it rejects the conditions. This claim treats the transaction as a contract between parties having full power to treat, assumes that the commissioners had no other power than to determine the character of the railway structure, and that it was left to the local authorities not only to decide whether they would consent to its erection in their streets, but if so, upon what terms. This seems to me to be a very imperfect view of the scheme formulated by the Act of 1875.

In pursuance of it, before the organization of any company was possible, it had been determined that a steam railway was necessary; and, acting under an exclusive power given to them, commissioners had fixed its route through the street in question, and determined the manner and time of its construction. All this was done because of the ascertained public necessity for such a railway; and after that it remained to find a company willing to build the road in the manner and at the time prescribed, and for the common council of the city by its consent, to enable them to do so. But neither the company when organized, nor the common council, could add to or take away from the terms or the conditions before provided and imposed by the commissioners. The company by its formation accepted them; the common council need not consent, but if it did, the company, so far as the city was concerned, could proceed with the undertaking according to the charter, which the State through its agents, the commissioners, had prepared for them.

I find nothing in the cases or the statutes cited by the respondents which calls for a different interpretation of the Act of 1875; and to hold otherwise would enable the common council to put itself in the place of the commissioners, and assume a function which had been delegated by the Legislature to the commissioners as independent public officers. It is, I think, a sufficient answer to say that such power of substitution is not within the language nor the intent of the statute; and to interpolate it would greatly weaken, if it did not altogether destroy, the utility and force of its provisions which have relation to the public necessity for means of transportation "for passengers, mails or freight."

The franchises conferred upon the city by the Legislature were public property, and remained subject to its control. It follows that the power contingently conferred by the Legislature to construct the railway became absolute, for the conditions imposed upon its exercise had both been performed. The abutting owners had consented, and so had the municipal authorities. To that extent the object, which the Legislature had declared to be one of public necessity, was accomplished.

Subsequent legislation is not without importance as throwing light upon this question. The Act of 1884, chap. 252, dispenses with the freeholders' petition, requires no determination as to the necessity for rapid transit, but, on the other hand, provides that the local authorities, before acting upon an application for their consent, shall give public notice thereof, and of the time and place where it will be considered; and when granted, it shall be upon the express condition that the conditions of the statute shall be complied with, or the local authorities at their option may provide for the sale of the franchise at public auction, subject to all the provisions of the Act as to construction, operation, etc., of the railway.

It then declares that every corporation formed under the provisions of that Act (1884), in cities having 250,000 inhabitants or more, shall pay annually into the city treasury a percentage, at first 5 per cent, and afterward of 3 per cent of its gross receipts, and that in other cities or villages the local authorities shall have the right to require, as a condition to their consent to the construction and operation of the road under that Act, the payment annually of such percentage of gross receipts, not exceeding 3 per cent, into their treasury, as they may deem proper. A failure on the part of the company to make payment of the sum prescribed involves a penalty of 5 per cent additional each month on such percentage, until it is paid. Sec. 8.

These provisions would have been entirely unnecessary if under an Act, that of 1875, which contains none of them, the local authorities could, at their pleasure, impose payment of such sum as they thought proper as a condition of giving consent. But if it be otherwise, if the common council can qualify their consent by such reasonable conditions as they think necessary for the protection of the interests and well being of the city (and we need not and do not decide that they cannot) and that such condition as the one I have considered is of that character, it is nevertheless a condition which could not be performed until after the road was constructed and in running order; and it is not required that the bond for its payment should be given before the company had acquired the right of way.

But however it may be with this condition, the others are neither reasonable nor lawful, They relate to matters over which the Legislature and the commissioners have entire control. The statute determines how the damages of the land owner shall be ascertained, and confers upon the commissioners sole power and jurisdiction to determine when the various portions of the road shall be completed. Their action is as the action of the Legislature, and can neither be superseded nor in any way affected by that of any other body. But here the resolution of the common council is wholly repugnant to the statute in one case, and to the condition imposed by the commissioners in the other. The statute requires the appointment by the supreme court of commissioners of appraisal, defines the mode of procedure, and gives effect to their decision, both as respects the company and the land owner. The common council requires the company to consent, at the option of the land owner, to have his damages ascertained by the assessors for the city, and to abide by their decision as to damage or injury, including depreciation in value to any property abutting upon and along the line of the road.

These two schemes are inconsistent and cannot stand together. The resolution of the common council, if effectual, nullifies the statute. As to the other condition, the statute (§ 6), requires the commissioners, within ninety days after their organization as a board, to fix and determine the time within which "the railway or railways, or portions of the same, shall be constructed and ready for operation," and this was done, as we have seen, before the plan was submitted to the public as one to be carried out by such company as might be formed.

They prescribed for one portion the first of August, 1879, subject to an enlargement by reason of certain named contingencies hereinafter referred to. The common council for the same portion fixed the arbitrary time of the first of June, 1879. For another portion the commissioners subject to the same contingencies, fixed August 1, 1881. The common council named December 1, 1880, with no allowance in either case for the delays allowed for by the commissioners.

Again; it may be observed of these conditions imposed by the local authorities, or accompanying their consent, as was said of the other and much more obvious terms, that they are in no sense conditions precedent, to be performed before the consent takes effect, and so become a component part of the scheme, but are conditions subsequent, the nonperformance of which in the future shall, in the language of the resolution, "render the consent void." The power to recall a consent is not given by the Act of 1875; neither can it by the operation of any cause set on foot by the local authorities, when once given, be annulled.

It is claimed, however, by the respondents that the time fixed in the articles of association, for the completion of that portion of the railway which includes Fulton Street, expired before the commencement of these proceedings, and that, therefore, the petitioner's corporate existence has been terminated. This raises a very different question. As the Legislature is the final judge as to what the public interest required to be done, so it could declare the consequences of a default. It could itself fix the time for completing the railway, or leave that matter to be determined by the commissioners. Both events were provided for in the articles of association, and it is necessarily conceded by the appellant that the date specifically named for the completion of the work had passed before these proceedings were commenced (it expired August 1, 1881), but the contention is that this period of limitation was extended by the proviso above set out, which suspends the running of time during the pendency of legal proceedings, or delays or interference of the public authorities, "or otherwise."

The charter provision must have a reasonable construction; and it is plain that the time during which, and without fault on its part, the Company had no legal ability to commence or carry on the work should not be deemed to form any part of the allotted period. It appears, by article 7 of the articles of association, that the resolution of the commissioners limiting the time for the completion of the work in question, was adopted on the 30th of June, 1878, and fixed the time as August 1, 1879, or thirteen months from the adoption of the resolution. But the work of the commissioners was not completed until the articles were filed; nor was there until that event any company with corporate existence, to carry out their direction.

It may properly be held, therefore, that the time intervening between the date of the resolution, June 30, 1878, and the incorporation of the company, should not be counted against it. For that delay the Company was not chargeable; and the intention of the resolution in consideration of the object in view, and the language even of the statute (§ 6, supra), which gave authority to the commissioners in this respect, must be deemed to give a certain length of time after the Company received its charter, in which that object should be accomplished. It had no power or being even, until January 6, 1879. Immediately after that date it made efforts to obtain consent of the property owners, and failing in that, applied to the supreme court under section 4 of the Act of 1875 (supra), for the appointment of commissioners, whose determination, if in favor of the construction of the railway, after confirmation by the supreme court, "should," the statute says "be taken in lieu of the consent of the property owners." The report of the commissioners was made on the 26th of April, 1879.

It was favorable to the road, and on the same day an application was made for its confirmation. It was opposed, and remained undecided until February 10, 1880, when confirmation was refused. In different courts the controversy between the Company and its opposers continued until September, 1880, when it ended in a decision adverse to the Company. Since that time the affidavits show continuous efforts on the part of the Company, among other things, to obtain the necessary consents of property owners, which was accomplished December 2, 1885. It appears, therefore, that without fault on the part of the Company, the intervening time was unavoidably consumed in part by legal proceedings, but also by the impossibility of obtaining the consent of the property owners, or its equivalent; and that time may, therefore, be added to the specified period named in the articles of association for the completion of so much of the road as is now in question. This effect should be given to the word "otherwise," as it stands in the article already quoted (art. 7, § 6).

Whether we look at the general scheme of the Act which has regard to an undertaking promoted by the law-making power of the State because of an ascertained public necessity for its completion, or at the rights of the parties who accepted the proposition of the commissioners appointed to carry out the scheme, as those rights are regulated by the statute, we are required to give effect to this general clause by which the scheme is regulated. In doing this we must take into account the conditions upon which alone the work could proceed. First, the consent of the citizens, property owners; and second, the consent of the local authorities.

Until the consent of each was obtained nothing could be done by way of construction; and the time necessarily and in good faith employed in obtaining either may properly be deemed to have been unavoidably consumed. The commissioners anticipated that some time would be so consumed, and enumerated certain causes calculated to have that effect, as the pendency of legal proceedings, the delay or interference of the public authorities; but to those words they add "or otherwise," apparently having relation to the danger guarded against in the untimely expiration of the period limited. The word might indeed be applied to some act or interference on the part of the public authorities other than those mentioned, but it is not necessarily so limited; and as the manifest intention of the provisions of the sentence was to secure to the Company the full time before specified for the completion of the work, it should be deemed to relate to both of these conditions and include any time "unavoidably consumed" in an effort to obtain either, and so make it legally possible to commence the work which was to be completed at a given period, after the time began to run. This construction would not excuse a delay not involuntary, nor an incapacity to proceed caused by the Company itself, and would satisfy the rule which requires a court to be "guided by the intent of the Legislature * * * taken according to the necessity of the matter and to that which is consonant to reason and good discretion;" Stradling v. Morgan, Plowden, 204, and which makes it necessary to construe a statute in accordance with the circumstances to which the Act was intended to apply.

That the commissioners did not exceed their authority by providing for these contingencies, and that notwithstanding the qualifications, the time within which the railways should be constructed was fixed and determined by them as required by statute, was in effect held by us in the matter of the Cable Railway, decided December 17, 1886 [ante, 56], and requires no further discussion.

The appellant claims also that by various Acts of the Legislature the time for the construction of the railway has been extended; chap. 350, Laws 1879; chap. 405, Laws 1882; but the views already expressed make it unnecessary to consider the argument by which it is enforced. If correct, they answer also the position of the respondents, that the franchises of the Corporation have been lost. That contention has no other basis than the assumption that the time given the Company to construct its road expired before the present proceedings were commenced.

I have endeavored to show that upon the papers before us the fact is otherwise. But if mistaken in this, it would not follow that the appeal should for that reason fail. Section 7 of the Act of 1875 (supra) provides that the commissioners shall, in the articles of association, "provide for the release and forfeiture to the supervisors of the county, of all rights and franchises acquired by such corporation, in case such railway or railways shall not be completed within the time and upon the conditions therein provided."

This, as we have seen, was done in the very language of the Act; and, assuming with the respondent that the default existed, we are to inquire whether the property right or franchise then in the Company was by that circumstance and without further act done by anyone, or judgment of any court, transferred to the supervisors of Kings County, or at least diverted from the Company. It is certainly well settled that a nonperformance of the conditions of an Act of incorporation will forfeit the grant, even at common law; and like effect is given to such omission by the statute under which the petitioner came into existence; but I am not aware of any case holding that such default does of itself work a forfeiture, or that it can take effect except upon some proceeding where the question is brought directly before the court, unless the statute otherwise provides.

The principal cases relied upon by the respondent were within this exception. Re Brooklyn etc. R. Co. 72 N.Y. 245; 75 N.Y. 335. The Company then before the court was organized under an Act which declared that upon omission to do the thing in question, "its corporate existence and powers shall cease."

And in Brooklyn Steam Transit Co. v. Brooklyn, 78 N. Y. 524, the charter then before the court provided that upon such omission, "This Act and all the powers, rights and franchises herein and hereby granted shall be deemed forfeited and terminated." In the last case the other two were reviewed; but the same principle was said to apply to each.

The general rule to which I have adverted was recognized; but the court held that the Legislature had the power to provide that a corporation might lose its corporate existence without the intervention of the courts; and whether it had intended so to provide must depend upon the construction of the language used. In those cases the statute defined a single act and used unmistakable language. It was held that it executed itself. In the case before us, whether the omission has occurred depends upon a variety of circumstances, any one or all of which must be determined as matters of fact before a forfeiture could be found. It would be easy to say that the road was not completed at the end of thirteen months, or other fixed period, but whether in the meantime there had been delays from causes unavoidable, leading to loss of time, and to what extent, could be answered only upon an issue and after inquiry. Moreover, if there is a forfeiture, it is to the supervisors.

The Company remains a corporation, and the property right or franchise of building this particular portion of railway, or receiving whatever the Company has lost, goes to the supervisors. They have not claimed it, nor does it appear that they require or will accept it. If there is a cause of forfeiture, then there is no reason apparent why they may not waive it. But this point need not be decided. The Legislature has not annulled or dissolved the incorporation of the petitioner, as they might have done; § 34, Act of 1875; nor has judgment of forfeiture been rendered in any suit. We think nothing has yet passed from the Company, and that it is entitled, so far as any question before us is concerned, to proceed with the work for which it is organized.

Such was our conclusion upon all the points presented upon the argument, or embodied in the brief then submitted; but afterwards the case of The New York Cable Railroad Company was decided; and a new point suggested by it has been presented in behalf of the respondent as a conclusive answer to this appeal. It is argued that the organization of the Company is not complete, because the commissioners, having located fifteen different routes, fixed the time within which five only of such routes should be completed, and omitted to determine any period within which the remaining ten should be finished. As a matter of fact the premises are truly stated.

Is then the omission of a prescribed time as to the completion of some routes fatal to the whole scheme? This question did not arise in the Cable Co. Case. The articles of organization of that company provided for the completion of the routes named; but the time within which it should be done was to begin to run only when the necessary consents should be obtained; and as no time was limited for obtaining them, it was contended by the opponents of the company that there was no actual limitation of the time within which the roads were to be constructed; but the court held that the commissioners substantially complied in this respect with the statute, and that the objection to the organization of the company, in the respect insisted upon, was not well taken. The effect of prescribing the time for the completion of some routes, and altogether omitting to do so as to others, was not discussed. If it be conceded that as to those latter routes the company had no power or right of construction, then we are to see whether the authority given in legal form as to certain routes is avoided because the same charter includes other routes not so authorized. The general rule is that when the illegal part of a contract cannot be separated from the legal, the whole is void; but when they can be separated, the bad part may be rejected and the good upheld.

This is the case here. The routes to which no time has been affixed may be conceded not to have been legally designated for any railway, and the streets or avenues included in them to be open to occupation by another company. Sec. 4, Act of 1875, supra.

As to those then the appellant cannot be said to have acquired any right or franchise; and the terms and intent of section 7, which requires the articles to provide for the release and forfeiture to the supervisors of the county, in case the railway or railways shall not be completed within the time therein provided, can be fully satisfied. The letter and intent of the Act has been complied with; and upon default of the Company, all its rights and franchises are to be released and forfeited to the supervisors.

In the Cable Co. Case it was held that under a necessary construction of the charter, that company was required to suffer no penalty, except the forfeitures of "the franchise of constructing the routes which they elected to abandon," and was therefore not in compliance with the statute. It that case moreover the company was left at liberty to choose which of the twenty-nine routes covered by the articles it would complete, and for an indefinite number of years hold the privilege granted by franchise, to the exclusion of other organizations, neither building necessary roads themselves, nor permitting others to construct them. Such an option was to the public prejudice.

A different conclusion is required by the terms of the articles before us. The Company is not at liberty to select their routes, and the omission in the articles of a fixed time for the completion of the railway over certain routes is not chargeable to the Corporation, but to the commissioners, who as to these routes may be said to have failed to act. The effort to designate those routes was futile, and the evil pointed out in the Cable Case could not arise in this.

In conclusion we are of opinion that the petitioner upon filing the certificate and articles as required by statute (Laws 1875, supra, § 9), became, and that it now is a corporation. So far, therefore, as any question has been raised by the respondents, the appeal should prevail.

To that end the orders of the Special and General Terms should be reversed, and the case remitted to the Supreme Court for the appointment of commissioners.

(Decided March 1, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, reversing a judgment of the Kings Circuit dismissing the complaint in an action to recover for injuries alleged to have been caused by the defective condition of a highway. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. William Sullivan, for appellant:

The sidewalk and slope as they existed when the accident happened having been built according to an adopted plan, the Town would not be liable, even if the improvement had been constructed by its own officers acting as its agents, and if its obligation to keep its highways in repair were coextensive with that of an incorporated city or village.

But the improvement was constructed, not by its agents but by independent public officers for whose acts or omissions in reference thereto the Town is not responsible. The construction of the street, so far as the highway commissioners were concerned, was completed when they took charge of it, and therefore the duty imposed on them by the Act (chap. 364, Laws 1878, § 9) to keep it in repair related to the street as constructed by such public officers.

They are not required to do anything more than to keep such street in the same condition in which it was then committed to their charge.

In this respect also, the case at bar differs from Hubbell v. Yonkers, 6 Cent. Rep. 499.

Laws 1869, chap. 670, Laws 1878, chap. 364, §§ 1, 2, 5, 9; Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 974; Maxmilian v. Mayor, 62 N. Y. 160; Tone v. Mayor, 70 N. Y. 158, 165, 166; Ham v. Mayor, 70 N. In this State the obligation and liability of towns in respect of their highways, under chapter 700, Laws 1881, are prospective and only coextensive with those of highway commissioners.

Frasier v. Town of Tompkins, 30 Hun, 168; Eveleigh v. Town of Hounsfield, 34 Hun, 140.

If the obligation to repair Eighty-Sixth Street includes the erection of fences, it must be conceded that the obligation to repair all of the other highways also embraces similar acts.

There was no specific appropriation for the fencing of any of the highways of the Town. But the sum of $2,500 was annually appropriated for the repair of all the bridges and highways of the Town for one year; and the duty of the highway commissioners was to expend the same during the year as they deemed necessary in repairing the roads and bridges of the Town. As the annual appropriation was limited to this sum, which was actually expended by the highway commissioners in repairing the roads and bridges of the Town, but which was insufficient for the repair of all of them, exclusive of fencing, which alone would have exhausted the appropriation, they were not liable for not repairing all of them, and for not erecting fences at exposed places.

Under such circumstances the selection of the places to be repaired or fenced was referred to their discretion; and for the exercise of that discretion neither they nor the Town can be made responsible in a civil action.

Mr. A. Simis, Jr, with Mr. George B. Ackerly, for respondent:

It was the duty of the highway commissioners of the Town to keep the highways in repair, and the Town is made liable for all damages to person or property by reason of defective highways, Laws 1881, chap. 700. The highway in question was laid out as provided by chap. 364, Laws of 1878; and by section 9 of said Act, the highway commissioners of said Town were directed to keep it in repair.

"It would appear to be sufficiently obvious that the duty of keeping a bridge or highway in repair extended not merely to the floor of the bridge or the road bed of a highway, but to proper guards or railings on their sides or borders when necessary for the safety or protection of the public."

Municipalities owe an absolute duty to all travelers to keep their highways in a reasonably safe condition for travel.

Ring v. Cohoes, 77 N. Y. 88; Gillespie v. Newburgh, 54 N. Y. 468.

"Where a rail or barrier is necessary for the proper security of travelers at places on the road, which from their nature would be otherwise unsafe, and the maintenance of which would have prevented the happening of injury, it is negligent not to construct and properly maintain such a barrier."

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 391; Hubbell v. Yonkers, 35 Hun, 349.

The duty to keep the highway in repair is ministerial; and for a negligent omission to perform this duty an action lies by the party injured.

Hines v. Lockport, 50 N. Y. 238.

Want of funds is not a good defense.

Warren v. Clement, 24 Hun, 474; Robinson v. Chamberlain, 34 N. Y. 395.

"The issue being the fact of negligence, the motive or good faith of the commissioners was entirely immaterial."

Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N. Y. 113; Robinson v. Chamberlain, 34 N. Y. 389; Olmsted v. Dennis, 77 N. Y. 382.

The supervisors of the several towns, as commissioners to lay out such roads, performed and completed their quasi judicial power by the building of the road; as such commissioners they had only to do with the road bed. After its completion their power was spent, and its future care devolves upon the highway commissioners. The duty of keeping it in repair so as to prevent its being dangerous to the public is ministerial, and for a negligent omission to perform it an action by the party injured will lie.

Hines v. Lockport, 50 N. Y. 286; Urquhart v. Ogdensburg, 91 N. Y. 71; Hubbell v. Yonkers, 35 Hun, 349.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages occasioned to the plaintiff, by falling down a slope or declivity adjoining the road known as Eighty-Sixth Street, in the Town of New Utrecht, Kings County.

This slope descended from the northerly exterior line of the sidewalk thirty feet, at an angle of about thirty degrees, and was intercepted near the middle by a fence running parallel with the road. The road was built about the year 1874, and was laid out with a road bed sixty feet wide, flanked on either side by sidewalks eleven feet wide, raised about one foot above the level of the road, and bordered near the gutters with rows of trees. It was located partly in the Town of New Utrecht and partly in Gravesend, and extended from the Village of Bath to Fort Hamilton, both lying on or near the sea shore, about two miles apart.

The accident occurred about 10 o'clock in the evening, at a point nearly half way between the two villages, the plaintiff walking off the sidewalk and rolling down the embankment on the north side of the road, whereby he sustained bodily injuries.

The negligence complained of was the omission of the defendant to erect a railing or fence at the top of the bank sufficient to prevent persons using the highway from walking or falling down the declivity.

We are of the opinion that the Town owed no duty to the traveling public to erect such fence, and that it was not negligence on its part, or that of its highway commissioners, to omit to do so. The alleged defect was incident to the plan of the road, and was created by the elevation of the road above the level of the adjacent land. Such irregularities are not at all uncommon in rural highways, and are not supposed to present any danger to the traveling public when using ordinary care in the use of the road.

The Town had furnished a safe and sufficient road way of unusual width, whose boundaries were indicated on either side by a gutter and elevated sidewalk bordered by rows of trees, and was under no obligation to erect barriers to prevent travelers from wandering into the adjoining fields. No possible difficulty existed in this case, to prevent a traveler from following either the road or sidewalk by marks which could both be seen and felt; and it would be imposing a burden beyond all precedent to require a town to remove irregularities in the surface of the land outside of the road for fear that some traveler might wander there and thus sustain injury.

Neither at common law nor by the statute were towns under any legal liability to respond in damages even to persons injured by defects in the highways until after the enactment of chapter 700 of the Laws of 1881.

A manifest difference, in this respect, arising out of charter provisions and the obvious requirements of the situation exists between village and municipal corporations and country towns in respect to such obligations. Hyatt v. Trustees of Rondout, 44 Barb. 385.

It was held in People v. Town Auditors, 74 N. Y. 315, that "Under our system no corporate duty is imposed upon towns in respect to the care, superintendence or regulation of highways within their limits." "Commissioners of highways have by the statute the care and superintendence of highways;" and "They are responsible in a civil action for any injury resulting from their neglect to repair a highway (if provided with means for that purpose) whereby an individual sustains damages."

On the other hand the Town in its corporate character has no control over the highways. It cannot lay out a highway or discontinue one. It is not liable for failure to keep highways in repair, and has but limited corporate duties to perform in respect thereto. People v. Supervisors, 93 N. Y. 397.

By the Act of 1881, however, it was provided that towns should thereafter be liable for such injuries in cases where the "commissioner or commissioners of highways of said towns are now by law liable therefor."

It is seen that the liability of the towns is thus made coextensive with that of commissioners of highways in towns.

No absolute liability for such injuries was ever imposed by law upon such officers, but only a limited responsibility arising out of their negligence, to the extent only that they were possessed of, or had power to obtain means to make necessary repairs. Hines v. Lockport, 50 N. Y. 238; Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N Y. 113.

It does not affirmatively appear in what manner the commissioners of the Town of New Utrecht were supplied with funds for the repair of its roads and bridges; but it is shown by the evidence of one of its commissioners that he received $2,500 during the year 1882, for such purposes.

It was testified to that such sum was all expended in that year for the ordinary repairs of the roads and bridges and was not entirely sufficient for that purpose.

The proof showed that from sixty-five to seventy miles of road were within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, and required care, expense and repair, and to have guarded the several places along said roads, where banks or declivities existed, would have required the erection of two or three miles of barriers in addition to the expense for legitimate repair of the road beds.

Under such circumstances it was confided to the discretion of the commissioners to apply the fund in their hands in making such repairs as in their judgment were most urgently needed; and they were not responsible for an error of judgment in doing so. Garlinghouse v. Jacobs, 29 N. Y. 297; Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N. Y. 118.

It was therefore error for the court below to charge the jury that if they found "'that the great necessity was to keep the actual bed of the road way safe, they were right in spending it in that way. But if you say it was of more importance to guard this highway, then they were wrong."

The direct effect of this instruction was to authorize the jury to find the defendant liable for an error in judgment on the part of its highway commissioners in a case where they were unable from want of means to repair all of the defective places in the highways of the Town.

There was not the slightest evidence in the case as to the respective needs of the various places in the highways requiring repairs; and no ground exists upon the evidence for imputing an error in judgment to them in expending the funds in their lands.

The exception to the charge was well taken. We are also of the opinion that under the method in force for laying out and building public roads in the County of Kings, the defect, if any, in the road in question arose from an error in the plan of the road, and was not chargeable to the officers of the Town.

It is provided by chapter 670 of the Laws of 1869 that roads and streets in the towns of Kings County shall be made by certain commissioners consisting of the respective supervisors of the Towns of New Lots, Flatbush, Flatlands, New Utrecht, and Gravesend, and the chairman of the board of supervisors of Kings County. They are to have exclusive power to lay out such streets, avenues, and public places, of such width, extent and direction as they shall decide; and after the adoption of such permanent plan no street or avenue shall be laid out in such towns, except in accordance with said plan; and all streets or avenues afterwards opened shall be made to conform to such permanent plan and the lines thereof. Such plan is required to be filed in the clerk's office of the county.

By chapter 364 of the Laws of 1873 these commissioners were directed to lay out and place upon their map Eighty-Sixth Street in accordance with certain conditions therein specified for its direction and location, and this street was afterwards laid out and entered by said commissioners in conformity thereto.

It was further provided in the same Act that upon the application of any freeholder whose land should be taken for such road, the County Court of Kings County or a special term of the supreme court therein should appoint three freeholders of New Utrecht and Gravesend to appraise and award damages to the several persons whose land was required for such road, and should also assess such persons and all others owning land within 100 feet on either side of such road for the aggregate amount of such awards and the expense of making such awards and assessments. Appropriate provisions were also made to enforce and collect such assessments and awards.

Upon the confirmation of the report of such commissioners by the court it was further provided that three other commissioners should be appointed by the said courts, or one of them, in the same manner as the previous commissioners had been appointed, to regulate and grade for public travel such street, and to plant trees along the sidewalks, and erect suitable signs with the names of any intersecting streets or avenues thereon, and assess the expense thereof upon the premises lying on either side of said street within 100 feet thereof.

After the grading of said street should be completed it was provided that the owners of the adjoining premises on either side might fence their lots along the street; and it was then further enacted that the said street so "laid out and mapped should be a public highway, and the portions thereof situate within the Towns of New Utrecht and Gravesend respectively shall be kept in repair by the commissioners of highways of those towns, respectively."

We have thus stated all of the statutory provisions applying to the subject, upon which the defendant's liability, if any, must be predicated.

No complaint is made that the commissioners of highways of the defendant have not kept the road bed and sidewalks of Eighty-Sixth Street in perfect repair since they came under their charge, or that the road was not constructed in every respect, according to the plan laid down by the commissioners charged with the duty of making it.

The charge is that a grade laid out and designed by the street plan outside of the roadway and not apparently dangerous to persons traveling thereon was not rendered inaccessible to persons from the sidewalk by a fence or railing.

We are unable to see any duty resting upon the Town to make such fence. The entire duty of laying out, constructing and grading this road as a finished highway was expressly imposed upon the commissioners named in the statutes; and no duty except that of keeping the street (when completed) in repair was confided to or imposed upon the town authorities.

The statutory commissioners were clothed with power and funds to make a safe and complete road way, finished in all respects; and they undoubtedly supposed that they had done so when they turned it over to the Town.

All questions as to the feasibility and safety of the route selected and of the security of the plans of structure to be adopted, were devolved by statute upon the commissioners charged with the work of making such plans; and the duty of determining these questions was clearly judicial in its nature, dependent upon the judgment and discretion of the body authorized to perform it.

The commissioners were called upon, in constructing a plan, to decide upon the safety of the route adopted and the dangers thereby to be encountered, and if safeguards were necessary to protect travelers in passing dangerous places, to provide them; and if they failed to do so, it constituted simply a defect in the plan of the work, arising from an error in judgment as to its necessities. For such errors it is well settled that no liability arises. Urquhart v. Ogdensburg, 91 N. Y. 67; S. C. 97 N. Y. 238.

We also think that the order of the trial judge granting a nonsuit was supported by the lack of proof showing the plaintiff free from contributory negligence.

The evidence showed him to be the inmate of an inebriate asylum, and that on the day of the accident he had leave of absence for a day, under a pledge that he would abstain from intoxicating drinks during that time. Although he denies that he became intoxicated, he admits that he spent the entire day in going from one saloon or tavern to another, taking beer and other refreshments at each. He is described by every disinterested witness in the case as much intoxicated.

When the circumstances of the accident are considered it is rendered quite clear that it could have happened only by gross carelessness. It occurred on a clear starlit night, soon after he had been placed in the middle of a straight, wide road, upon which there was a streetcar track. The road itself was bordered by trees, gutter, and a sidewalk. He was directed to his destination by a person who had guided him half of the way and told to follow the car track. Objects could be seen plainly for 200 feet; and no reasonable excuse for his walking off this road seems to exist, except the plaintiff's intoxicated condition.

We think the order of the General Term should be reversed, and the judgment of nonsuit affirmed, with costs.

The footings of the last inventory taken by the plaintiffs a few days before the fire, and entered on an old Bennett and Bean inventory were inadmissible. There is no evidence that these papers were ever compared by anybody. No one testifies to their accuracy. No witness is asked to give the amount of stock on hand after looking at these figures. Mr. Joel L. Walker, for respondents.

Per Curiam:

The principal errors alleged relate to the admission in evidence against the objection of the defendant, first, of the inventory made in November, 1872, about ten months before the fire, on the sale made by Bennett and Bean to the plaintiff, Isaac B. Ellsworth, of the stock of goods and fixtures of Bennett & Bean, and second, of the footings of the inventory made by Ellsworth & Son, September 10, 1873, a few days before the fire, of the stock then on hand. The admissibility of this evidence is to be determined in view of the circumstances. Upon the issues as found it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs to show the amount and value of the goods burned.

---

*See digested citations at end of case in Lawyers' edition. [ED.]

The plaintiffs, after the purchase from Bennett & Bean, continued the business to the time of the fire, selling from the stock purchased of that firm, and from new stock purchased from time to time, which was mingled with the old stock.

The Bennett & Bean inventory was taken by the members of that firm, assisted by the plaintiffs and one Bowie, and was entered in a book, the articles being stated in detail, with the cost price. The sale to Ellsworth was made upon this inventory, for the net cost, $7,740.07. The book containing the inventory was delivered to and kept by the plaintiffs in the safe in the store. The inventory of September 10, 1873, was entered in pass books, the goods being classified, and the cost of each article in each class was given, and footings of the aggregate cost of each class was made. These footings, aggregating $6,325.25, were transferred by the plaintiffs and entered in the inventory book containing the Bennett & Bean inventory. The pass books and the bills of purchase were kept in a desk and were with other books and papers destroyed by the fire. The inventory book kept in the safe was not burned. The trial occurred nine years after the fire.

The plaintiffs were severally sworn as witnesses in their own behalf, and testified as to the particulars of the loss, so far as they could recall them. It appeared from their testimony that many of the goods purchased of Bennett & Bean, and specified in the inventory of 1872, were in the stock at the time of the fire, and they enumerated a large number of articles bought of Bennett & Bean, then on hand. But they were unable to specify the exact quantities, or the exact cost from recollection. The same is true as to the new goods. Under these circumstances the court admitted the Bennett & Bean inventory in evidence, as bearing upon the value of the classes of goods embraced therein, which were in the stock and were burned at the time of the fire; and the court also admitted the footings of the inventory of September 10, 1873, to be read from the Bennett & Bean inventory book. The admission of the Bennett & Bean inventory was not, at the time it was admitted, restricted in terms to the purpose named; but it was so limited in the charge. We think both this inventory and the footings of the second inventory were properly admitted.

The plaintiffs labored under great embarrassment in making out their case, owing to the burning of papers and memoranda, and the lapse of time, and seem to have given the best evidence bearing upon the issue at their command. The Bennett & Bean inventory showed what goods were purchased by Ellsworth and their cost to Bennett & Bean, and also the prices paid by Ellsworth; matters as to which the plaintiffs had no certain specific recollection. The price paid ten months before the fire, for goods burned, was some evidence of their value at the time of the fire. The footings of the inventory of September 10, 1873, were authenticated by the testimony of both the plaintiffs as correct footings of the inventory contained in the pass books; and they testified that they represented the cost of the goods. It is true that the evidence as to the quality or value of the goods burned, was not very satisfactory, and the jury, as their verdict indicates, were of this opinion; but we think the rules of evidence were not violated.

There are no other questions requiring special notice.

The order appealed from should be affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. E. L. Fursman, for appellant:

Mr. R. A. Parmenter, for respondent:

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court;

This action was commenced to recover for injuries caused to the plaintiff by the defendant carelessly running an engine over him upon its road. It denies that it was guilty of any negligence or fault causing the injury, and alleges that there was negligence on the part of the plaintiff's mother, a widow, which exposed him to the injury which he sustained.

The accident happened on the 4th day of September, 1877, and the action was commenced on the second day of February, 1880, and was brought to trial on the 21st day of May, 1884.

At the time of the accident the plaintiff was a nursing infant, seventeen months old, and in consequence of his injuries one of his fingers was amputated and also one of his legs above the ankle. The verdict of the jury was for $8,000.

The presence of the plaintiff, unattended, upon the railroad would, under the circumstances, if unexplained, have been conclusive proof of carelessness and inattention on the part of the mother; and hence it became important for him to show that he strayed upon the railroad track without any culpable neglect on her part.

At the place of the accident the railroad runs in a northerly and southerly direction and was crossed at right angles by Carey Avenue in a sparsely populated portion of the Village of Hoosac Falls. The plaintiff resided with his mother on the north side of that avenue, about eighty feet easterly of the railroad, in a house which stood about twelve feet northerly from the line of the avenue. He had been able to walk for only about two months, was fat and chubby, and just before the accident had been playing in the yard in front of the house. His mother, as a witness, for the purpose of exculpating herself from the charge of negligence, gave the following statement of what then took place:

She took him up and held him in her lap sitting on the front door steps of the house. Finding that he was sleepy she went into the house and sitting in a rocking chair nursed him. Seeing that he was inclined to sleep, she laid him down upon the floor and saw that he was still, and she then put a chair across the open door way while she went into another room to fix his cradle. She was gone eight or ten minutes and when she came back he was gone. The chair across the door way was undisturbed so that he must have crawled over the chair or through it in some way and passed down the steps to the front gate, which was fastened; under the gate there was a space of about six inches through which he must have crawled and then he must have passed into the street eighty feet to the railroad where he was hit by the engine and injured.

All this transpired during the eight or ten minutes she was in the adjoining room. When she came out of that room and commenced looking for him she saw him on the railroad and saw the train coming. He had never gone to that place before, and was never known before to crawl under the gate.

The counsel for the defendant contends that this story that this child was just able to walk, after being to sleep as sound as comes to a tired, well fed infant, woke up, got through or over the chair, down the steps, under the gate and down to the railroad track, all within eight or ten minutes, is so incredible, unnatural and contrary to human experience that the jury could not rely upon it as sufficient to show such care of the child on the part of his mother as the law exacts.

While this evidence is liable to much of the criticism in which the defendant's counsel indulges, we cannot say that the story, in its essential features, is so impossible or improbable that as matter of law the jury could not believe it and rely upon it. We have no power to weigh the evidence. The general term, however, having power to set aside verdicts which are contrary to the evidence, should not allow one to stand which is based simply upon evidence which may possibly be true.

But we are of opinion that the evidence failed to show any negligence on the part of the defendant. There is no charge that its road bed or engine, or any of the appliances upon its train were out of repair, defective or insufficient; nor is there any claim that there was any omission to give the proper signals for this crossing, or that the train was run at an improper rate of speed. The sole negligence charged, as we understand it, is that the engineer ought sooner to have discovered the plaintiff upon the track and stopped the train before it reached him.

This is the first case that has come before this court and, so far as we know, before any court in this State, wherein must be defined the responsibilities of a steam railroad company, not otherwise in fault, to one lawfully upon its track, for not seeing him and stopping its train in time to avoid injuring him.

It was in evidence, by a witness produced by the plaintiff, that the plaintiff could be seen upon the track at a point about 500 feet from where he was injured. From the evidence of the defendant's engineer it appears that when he was about forty rods from the avenue he saw a little girl upon the crossing about eight or nine years old, and that she ran from the track, and that then for the first time he saw the plaintiff. He immediately gave the signal for the brakes to be applied and reversed his engine, and the evidence shows that everything was then done that could be done to arrest the speed of the train, and that only two of the small wheels of the engine passed over the plaintiff's leg before it was entirely stopped.

There was evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending to show that there was no little girl upon the crossing just previous to the accident as testified to by the engineer, and it may be assumed that he, testifying a long time after the accident, was mistaken. But his evidence was not necessarily in conflict with that of the other witnesses upon whose memory time may also have done its work. The little girl may have come upon the track and passed off undiscovered by the other witnesses, and the plaintiff may have come upon the track soon after and may have been seen by the engineer immediately after he came upon the track and after the girl had passed off. The facts testified to by the plaintiff's mother showed that he must just have reached the track, and could have been there but a very brief time before the accident. It cannot be inferred that the engineer ought to have seen or could have seen him any sooner than he did. It is not probable, and there is no evidence to show that he was upon the track at the time the train left the depot, about 1,500 feet from the avenue; nor is there any evidence from which it could be found that he was upon the track and therefore visible to the engineer at any time before the train came within forty rods of him.

Witnesses testifying after the great lapse of time might be mistaken as to the speed of the train, the distance at which the child was first discovered upon the track, and the place where the engine was reversed. But there can be no doubt, upon this evidence, that after the engineer discovered that the child was in peril he did all he could to arrest the motion of his train. That he willfully or recklessly ran upon him after he discovered that he was in peril is inconceivable, and certainly cannot be assumed.

An engineer is not bound to stop his train the moment he sees some living object upon the track. He has the right, in broad daylight, when his train is perfectly visible and its approach must be heard and known, at least in the first instance, to assume that the object, whatever it is, will leave the track in time to escape injury. He is not bound to expect helpless infants upon the track, without sufficient knowledge or ability to escape when warned of danger. He could not know when he first saw the plaintiff that he was too young to be conscious of the danger to which he was exposed; and without the imputation of negligence, he could run on until he discovered that he was heedless of the danger. Reasonable care in the management of trains which must make their time between stations and have the right of way does not require more.

The defendant is not responsible for any error of judgment, if there was any, on the part of the engineer, as to the speed of his train, the distance, age and peril of the child, and his ability to stop the train in time to protect him. All the engineer was bound to do after the discovery of the peril was to use reasonable diligence and care to avert it, and there was no evidence which authorized the jury to find that he did not do this.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide event.

All concur (Peckham, J., on the ground that the evidence exculpating plaintiff's mother from negligence is so wholly incredible in its nature as not to be sufficient in law to be submitted to a jury) except Danforth and Andrews, JJ., who dissent.

(Decided March 22, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of Sessions of Kings County on conviction of defendant of selling oleomargarine. Affirmed.

Defendant has been twice tried on the same indictment. The first trial resulted in a conviction and judgment thereon which, after affirmance by the general term, was reversed on appeal to this court and a new trial granted, for error in the charge to the jury. See 4 Cent. Rep. 542.

The second trial resulted in a conviction and judgment, which was affirmed by the general term; and defendant appealed to this court.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Messrs. Frederick R. Coudert, Wheeler H. Peckham and John N. Lewis, for appellant:

I. The prohibition of the statute is subversive of the constitutional rights of liberty and the enjoyment of property.

The statute under which the defendant was convicted can be sustained, if at all, only upon the ground that it is a constitutional exercise of the police power of the Legislature.

Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98–108, 110.

The statute in question is entitled "An Act to Prevent Deception in the Sale of Dairy Products, and to Preserve the Public Health."

(a.) As a health law. Nowhere in the section under consideration, nor elsewhere in the Act, is there even an intimation that there is anything detrimental to the health of a consumer, or, what is more to the point, to the public health, in the manufacture, sale and consumption of the article in question, nor was there any evidence offered to prove such a contention. On the contrary it is an established fact that it is a useful and wholesome article of food, and the courts should take judicial notice of such fact.

(b.) As a law for the prevention of fraud and deception. It will not be questioned that such a purpose lies within the scope of the police power; but "The police power is not without limitations, and in its exercise the Legislature must respect the great fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution. If this were otherwise, the power of the Legislature would be practically without limitation. Under the mere guise of Acts to protect against fraud, the Legislature cannot arbitrarily strike down private rights, invade personal freedom or confiscate private property."

Re Jacobs, supra.

To hold that a confessedly wholesome article of food may be prohibited because unscrupulous dealers may, at some time or under some circumstances, sell it for what it is not (such deception not being of a character to imperil the public health) is to establish a rule absolutely unlimited in its capacity for mischief.

True, the occasion might arise which would make it necessary that the police power should lay its hands upon any industry whatever. The individual right must give way to the public welfare. But there must be a necessity; there must be no other alternative.

Re Ryers, 72 N. Y. 1; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98–108, 110.

The prohibition is unnecessary. The citizen cannot be deprived of his property or restrained of his liberty, except in case of real, imperative necessity. It is not enough that fraud may be perpetrated, that deception may be made easy, nor that individuals may be imposed upon. There must be imminent danger that the general public will suffer, as the legitimate and natural consequence of the act prohibited.

The Legislature may absolutely prohibit the sale of adulterated or simulated substance, when the adulteration or simulation is harmful, and has frequently done so in such case. But this product is neither adulterated, simulated nor deleterious. It may punish as a criminal the ignorant seller of an adulterated or forbidden article, but only as a police measure, necessary to the protection of the public health. And such has been the expressed basis for the decision in each of the authorities on this question.

II. It is destructive of the constitutional guarantee of the equal protection of the laws.

People v. Marx, 99 N. Y. 377–385.

III. It is opposed to progress in science and the useful arts. This is not an imitation. Neither is it a "simulated substance," nor an "adulteration." Chemically and practically oleomargarine butter is identical with dairy butter; in other words it is butter, produced in a different way, the same product of different processes and, in the main, derived from the same source. This cannot be disputed here under our offer to prove; and being the thing itself it cannot be termed an "imitation," a "simulation" or an "adulteration."

Messrs. Edward B. Thomas and William P. Quin, with Mr. James W. Ridgway, Dist. Atty., for the People, respondents—

Presented substantially the same points as are set forth in the report of the former appeal, 4 Central Reporter, 548.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The offense for which the appellant was indicted and of which he was convicted was that at, etc., he "did unlawfully, willfully and knowingly have in his possession for sale, keep for sale, offer for sale, and cause and procure to be sold to certain persons," etc., "a number of pounds of a certain article and product, made and manufactured in semblance and imitation of natural butter; that is to say, butter made and produced from pure, unadulterated milk, and cream from the same," etc., the same not being then and there natural butter, as he the said Lipman Arensberg then and there well knew, against the form of the statute," etc.

The statute which the defendant was accused of violating was section 7 of chapter 183 of the Laws of 1885, entitled "An Act to Prevent Deception in the Sale of Dairy Products," etc.

That section prohibits: first, the manufacture out of any animal fat, or animal or vegetable oils, not produced from unadulterated milk, or cream from the same, of any product in imitation or semblance or designed to take the place of natural butter produced from milk, etc.; second, mixing, compounding with or adding to milk, cream or butter, any acids or other deleterious substances, or animal fats, etc., with design or intent to produce any article in imitation or semblance of natural butter; third, selling, or keeping, or offering for sale any article manufactured in violation of the provisions of the section.

The indictment contained three counts: the first charging the defendant with manufacturing the prohibited article; the second, with mixing with milk, cream and butter the prohibited substances; and the third with selling the prohibited article. He was acquitted on the first and second counts and convicted on the third.

The defendant contends that the provisions of the seventh section are in violation of the Constitution of this State, and subversive of his constitutional rights of liberty and the enjoyment of property; and he relies upon the decisions of this court in Re Jacobs, 98 N.Y. 98, and People v. Marx, 99 N.Y. 377.

The Case of Jacobs arose under a different statute and related to a different subject, viz.: the manufacture of cigars in tenement houses. It has no bearing upon the present cast, except in so far as it declares general principles which are sought to be applied to the statute now in question.

The case of People v. Marx has a more direct application, as it arose under the Act of which the one now under consideration is an amendment or supplement. The section under which the defendant in that case was indicted, was section 6 of chapter 202 of the Laws of 1884. That section provided as follows:

"Sec. 6. No person shall manufacture out of any oleaginous substance or any compound of the same, other than that produced from unadulterated milk, or of cream from the same, any article designed to take the place of butter or cheese produced from pure unadulterated milk, or cream of the same, or shall sell or offer to sell the same as an article of food."

That section was held to be unconstitutional, for the reason that the prohibition was not confined to unwholesome or simulated substances, but absolutely prohibited the manufacture or sale of any compound designed to be used as a substitute for butter or cheese, however wholesome or valuable, or however openly and fairly the character of the substance might be avowed and published; that the Act could not therefore be regarded as a health law, nor as intended to prevent deception by the sale of a simulated article as genuine; and stress was laid in the opinion upon the fact that the prohibition was not of the manufacture or sale of an article designed as an imitation of dairy butter, but of any article designed to take the place of dairy butter, however dissimilar in color or appearance the artificial product might be to ordinary dairy butter.

Other statutory provisions, aimed at the imitation of dairy butter, were referred to without criticism, and without intimating any doubt of their validity. Among those were the provisions of chapter 215 of the Laws of 1882, which prohibit the introduction of any substance into imitation butter or cheese for the purpose of imparting thereto a color resembling that of yellow butter or cheese.

Assuming, as is claimed, that butter made from animal fat or oil is as wholesome, nutritious and suitable for food as dairy butter; that it is composed of the same elements and is substantially the same article, except as regards its origin, and that it is cheaper, and that it would be a violation of the constitutional rights and liberties of the people to prohibit them from manufacturing or dealing in it, for the mere purpose of protecting the producers of dairy butter against competition, yet it cannot be claimed that producers of butter made from animal fats or oils have any constitutional right to resort to devices for the purpose of making their product resemble in appearance the more expensive article known as dairy butter, or that it is beyond the power of the Legislature to enact such laws as they may deem necessary to prevent the simulated article being put upon the market in such a form and manner as to be calculated to deceive. If it possesses the merits which are claimed for it, and is innocuous, those making and dealing in it should be protected in the enjoyment of liberty in those respects; but they may legally be required to sell it for and as what it actually is, and upon its own merits, and are not entitled to the benefit of any additional market value which may be imparted to it by resorting to artificial means to make it resemble dairy butter in appearance. It may be butter, but it is not butter made from cream, and the difference in cost or market value, if no other, would make it a fraud to pass off one article for the other.

It is claimed on the part of the defense that the substance known as oleomargarine is composed of the same ingredients as dairy butter, with the exception only that the dairy butter naturally contains a small percentage, about 5 per cent or more of butyrine, which is not to be found in the fats or oils used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, and has to be added by mingling some milk, cream or butter with the oils, and when this is done that oleomargarine and dairy butter are identical in substance, with the exception only that the former necessarily containty a smaller percentage of butyrine; that consequently oleomargarine must resemble butter, and if the manufacture of any article made in imitation or semblance of butter is prohibited, the manufacture of oleomargarine is made unlawful.

We do not think that this result follows. The statutory prohibition is aimed at a designed and intentional imitation of dairy butter in manufacturing the new product, and not a resemblance in qualities, inherent in the articles themselves and common to both. If in their essential ingredients or elements, the two articles were so identical that they must necessarily present the same appearance, without resort to any artificial means to produce the resemblance, it is argued on the part of the prosecution that in that case it would be competent for the Legislature to require that some means be resorted to by the manufacturers, to distinguish the new article from the old; that the Legislature has attempted to do this by requiring that the packages in which oleomargarine is sold be distinctly marked, and by other means; but that if all these precautions fail to prevent deception of consumers, then it is lawful to require that in the manufacture of the substance itself, some measure should be adopted to make it distinguishable in appearance from the ordinary dairy butter, such as by giving to it a different color, or some other device.

We do not deem it necessary now to pass upon this point, for in the evidence in this case there was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that the oleomargarine sold by the defendant, and that which he had in his store exposed for sale, had, by artificial means, not essential or incident to the manufacture of the article, but resorted to for the mere purpose of imitation, been made to resemble dairy butter; that it was yellow in appearance and looked like butter. It was known to the defendant to be oleomargarine and was sold and offered for sale by him as such.

There was evidence to the effect that the natural color of dairy butter was yellow, except when made in winter when the cows were not grazing; that then it would sometimes be white or pearly, but that was exceptional. The oleomargarine purchased of the defendant was analyzed by a chemist employed by the State Dairy Association, and he testified positively that it had a coloring substance in it and that it was an added color; that a jar of it produced at the trial was delivered to him in June, 1885, about eighteen months before the trial, and was then in the condition it was at the time he testified, except it was then full of a yellow preparation and sealed up; that the article was then a much deeper yellow than at the time of the trial; that it could have been made without that color; that it was a golden yellow color, which was the color of natural butter and that the natural color of oleomargarine fat was pure white.

Another witness for the prosecution, a chemist who stated that he was familiar with butter and with oleomargarine, testified that the natural color of oleomargarine was a pearly white or creamy white, and that without any artificial coloring it did not resemble butter.

Professor Chandler, called by the defense, testified that oleomargarine butter was produced by churning oleomargarine oil with milk, and that if you desired to have a dark colored butter, a certain quantity of coloring matter was added, either carrot or annotto; that generally annotto was used; that it was the same coloring matter that was used for coloring cheese and butter in the dairies and on the farms.

Being asked on cross examination whether annotto and carrots were essential ingredients in the manfacture of oleomargarine butter, he testified that they could be left out or put in; that the only object of using them was to color the butter, also that they were not essential elements of dairy butter. He also stated that oleomargarine, without any color added, had about the same yellow as butter, white or a little shade of yellow, practically white. But it is evident that he referred to winter butter, for afterwards he stated that he had observed hundreds of specimens of winter butter and they were nearly all white, about as white as oleomagarine before any coloring is put into it.

Professor Morton, another witness called for the defense, disputed the efficacy of the tests by which the witness on the part of the prosecution claimed to have ascertained that the oleomargarine sold by the defendant was artificially colored. He testified that the constituent elements of oleomargarine were precisely the same as those found in dairy butter, the difference being only in the proportions of some of them; that dairy butter when exposed to the sun would bleach white like chalk and become tallow; that the color of oleomargarine oil was a rich cream color and looked like melted butter; that annotto or carrot, or any of the coloring matters used in oleomargarine butter, were not at all essential to the manufacture of that article, any more than in the making of butter from cream; and the object of using them in making oleomargarine was to give it a pleasing color and make it an acceptable article, just as it was used in dairy butter when essential to make it a pleasing color; that people liked to see yellow butter; that the natural deep yellow color of butter did not indicate the richness of the butter, but that the public accepted it as a summer butter as distinguished from winter butter; that summer butter was valued more and brought a higher price, and when coloring matter was used in genuine butter the object was to make it resemble a rich flavored and more marketable butter, and the use of annotto and carrot in oleomargarine gave it a yellow color, and whatever value a yellow color gives ordinary butter.

Another witness on the part of the defense testified on cross examination that the color of butter was yellow, and varying in shade, and that of oleomargarine yellowish; that the color imparted to it was not essential to the article itself, and the object of coloring it was to make it more palatable in appearance and marketable—to give it the appearance of butter—and he did not think it would meet with a ready sale if it had no color, and that the same rule would apply to dairy butter.

The judge, in submitting the case to the jury on the third count, instructed them that they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did sell the article called oleomargarine; that it was not made from pure unadulterated milk, or cream of the same; and they must further be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the article so sold was in imitation and semblance of butter and calculated to deceive, and that if they found either of these facts in the negative it was their duty to acquit.

He further charged that it was not necessary to show that the article sold was calculated to deceive the person who bought it in this instance, but that it was in imitation and semblance of butter and calculated to deceive any person who might buy it.

Exceptions were duly taken to the charge, raising the question of the constitutionality of the Act under which the defendant was indicted; and also to refusals of the court to charge, raising the points made on the part of the defense that it was necessary that the purchaser from the defendant should have been deceived; that if the article sold was substantially identical with butter, they must acquit, and that the words "imitation or semblance" meant a fraudulent imitation or semblance as to which the court charged that the words meant an imitation or semblance likely to deceive.

The jury having found the defendant guilty, the court sentenced him to pay a fine of $100.

We think that the evidence justified the court in submitting to the jury the question whether the article sold was an imitation calculated to deceive. It was sufficient to authorize a finding that it had been artificially colored so as to imitate the most valuable kind of dairy butter; that such coloring was not essential or necessarily incident to its manufacture, and that its only object was to make it resemble dairy butter and increase its market value. There may have been some conflict in the evidence on these points, but in the main they were established.

At all events the evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury to find those facts; and we are of opinion that such artificial coloring of oleomargarine, for the mere purpose of making it resemble dairy butter, comes within the statutory prohibition against imitation, and that such prohibition is within the power of the Legislature, and rests upon the same principle which would sustain a prohibition of coloring winter dairy butter for the purpose of enhancing its market price by making it resemble summer dairy butter, should the Legislature deem such a prohibition necessary or expedient.

We have examined the various exceptions taken to the charge and refusals to charge, and to rulings on questions of evidence on the trial, and find none which requires a reversal of the judgment. An application of the general conclusions which we have reached will substantially answer them without going over them in detail.

The judgment of the General Term should be affirmed.

MOTION for reargument of appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming an order of the State Comptroller refusing to cancel a State tax sale. Denied.

The original opinion dismissing the appeal is reported in 2 Cent. Rep. 467.

The facts appear from the opinion.

Mr. W. B. Van Rensselaer, for appellant.

Mr. D. O'Brien, Atty-Gen., for respondent.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On November 11, 1884, the relator, by petition, represented to the Comptroller that in December, 1871, he became the sole owner of certain lots of land, numbered 18, 20, and 34, in the north half of Arthurboro Patent, in the Town of Morehouse, Hamilton County; that in 1877 they were sold for the taxes of 1870, and Nos. 18 and 20, conveyed to Ballou, and lot 34 to Peck; that the sale was void because:

"1. The corrected assessment roll for the Town of Morehouse (being the township in which said lots are situated), for the year 1870, as delivered by the Supervisor of the Town of Morehouse to the town clerk thereof, is incomplete and defective, because: a, there is no oath of the assessors on said assessment roll or attached thereto; b, that these lots belong to nonresidents, and that the number of acres of each lot is not given; c, that the values of the above lots are not given; d, that there is no fifth column at all; e, that there are no figures set down to show the respective sums, in dollars and cents, to be paid as a tax on said lots. 1 R. S. 395, §§ 33, 35.

2. That it does not appear from any statement in the collector's return and affidavit thereto, or the county treasurer's certificate, that the taxes for the year 1870, remaining unpaid, were assessed upon the lands of nonresidents;" and prayed, therefore, that in pursuance of the authority conferred upon the Comptroller by section 85 of chapter 427 of the Laws of the State of New York, passed in the year 1855; that the tax sale of 1877, so far as the same relates to lots numbered 18, 20 and 34, in the north half of the Arthurboro' Patent, in Hamilton County, and State of New York, be canceled, and that any conveyance delivered by virtue of said sale of the said lots be set aside and discharged of record.

The Comptroller, after hearing, denied the application. The relator by certiorari sought to review that decision. Upon return made the supreme court affirmed it. The relator appealed to this court. Upon the argument the learned counsel for the relator repeated upon his points the statement of the petitioner, that "The application, made by the relator on November 11, 1884, to the Comptroller to cancel such tax sale, was made under the authority of sections 83, 84 and 85, of chapter 427 of the Session Laws of 1855;" and in reply thereto the learned Attorney-General, for the respondent, submitted as a distinct proposition that there is no statute authority for the demand made by the relator upon the Comptroller, to cancel the sale; that the sections above named and cited by the appellant were enacted for the benefit only of purchasers who had paid their money on the strength of the title of the State, and gave no right to an owner of the lots, either to make the demand that the Comptroller cancel the sale, or, upon his refusal to review that determination.

This position was not answered by the relator, upon any authority, nor other statute than that of 1855, supra. We sustained the view of the Attorney-General, and, without passing upon the merits, dismissed the appeal, March 2, 1886. 2 Cent. Rep. 467.

A motion for a reargument is now made by the relator, upon affidavit of his counsel, showing that the point made by the Attorney-General as to the limitation of the Statute of 1855, was not taken in the supreme court, nor anticipated by the relator as one which might be made in this court, and therefore that he failed to cite decisions and statutes bearing upon, if not controlling the question, viz.: Laws 1878, chap. 120; Laws 1885, chap. 448; Clark v. Davenport, 95 N. Y. 477.

The beginning of this remedial legislation may be found in chapter CCLXII., 262, of the Laws of 1823, which enacted, § 52, "That if the comptroller shall discover at any time before he conveys lands sold for taxes that the sale was for any cause whatever, improper, he shall not convey the land so improperly sold, but shall pay the purchasers of such lands the sum which they would be entitled to, if such land had been regularly redeemed by the owner; and the sum so to be paid shall be a charge against the county from which the return of the tax was made, if the cause why such sale was improper originated with the county."

By 1 Revised Statutes, p. 413, § 89, this provision was re-enacted so as to read "Whenever the comptroller shall discover, prior to the conveyance of any lands sold for taxes, that the sale was, for any cause whatever, invalid and ineffectual to give title to the lands sold, he shall not convey the lands so improperly sold, but shall forthwith cause the purchase money and interest thereon to be refunded out of the treasury, to the purchaser, his representatives or assigns."

And by section 91 it was provided that "If the discovery that the sale was invalid shall not be made until after a conveyance shall have been executed by the comptroller for the lands sold, it shall be the duty of the comptroller, on receiving satisfactory evidence thereof, to refund out of the treasury, to the purchaser, his representatives or assigns, the purchase money and interest thereon, and to recharge the county from which the tax was returned, with the amount of tax and interest at the rate of 7 per cent, from the time interest was charged thereon by him; and such county shall cause the same to be levied and paid as provided in the last section."

It is obvious that these provisions concern no one but the purchaser, the State, and the county or town from which the tax was returned. The Act of 1850, chap. 298, §§ 102, 104, contains the same provisions with slight verbal alterations, among others directing that after such discovery, the comptroller shall cancel the sale. This was evidently for no other purpose than to preserve the regularity of the proceedings in the refunding and recharging process, and concerned only the State on one side, and the town or county, as the case might be, on the other. These provisions reappear in 1855, as sections 83 and 85. Laws 1855, chap. 427.

It should be noticed that in no case is the comptroller authorized to recall a conveyance made by him, nor by his decision, avoid or cancel it, except as the cancellation of the sale might, by vitiating the precedent steps, destroy the regularity of the proceedings. The cancellation of the sale affected the purchaser by impairing his title in one case, and in another restored the purchase price of an ineffectual grant; it affected the town or county by compelling it to bear the burden of retaxation.

The power to cancel might be exercised upon misapprehension or misinformation; and perhaps for that reason it was enacted in 1878 (Laws 1878, chap. 120), that the comptroller should have power to set aside any cancellation of sale made by him under the Act of 1885 (supra) in either of three cases: "First, whenever such cancellation was procured by fraud or misrepresentation; second, whenever such cancellation was procured by the suppression of any material fact bearing upon the case; third, whenever the cancellation was made under a mistake of fact."

This also could concern only the rights or interests of the same parties.

The Act of 1885 (Laws 1885, chap. 448.) can have no direct application to the case at bar, for it was enacted after these proceedings were commenced, and after the decision of the comptroller. The statute also limits its operation by declaring that it shall not effect a proceeding pending at the time of its passage. It amends section 65 of the Act of 1855 (supra), by giving conclusive effect to the comptroller's conveyances after a specified time, but declares that "Such conveyances and certificates, and the taxes and tax sales on which they are based, shall be subject to cancellation, as now provided by law, on a direct application to the comptroller or an action brought before a competent court therefor, by reason of the legal payment of such taxes, or by reason of the levying of such taxes by a town or ward having no legal right to assess the land on which they are laid."

Neither its validity nor construction is before us, except as it may bear by implication upon the power and duty of the comptroller under the Act of 1855. It gives no new power. The comptroller had been given none to cancel conveyances, neither his own deed, nor that of a remote grantor. He might cancel a tax sale. The court in a proper case had power to do that also, and such other acts as were essential to the protection of those affected by them, whether an owner, or mortgagee, or one otherwise interested.

The statutory power of the comptroller, when exercised, is for the benefit of the purchaser; and, for reasons briefly stated in my opinion on the first argument, cannot be invoked in any legal sense by the owner. He may, indeed, as might any other person, put the comptroller in the way to "discover" errors in the sale; but he cannot compel an investigation, nor, if one is had, review his decision.

In Clark v. Davenport, 95 N. Y. 477, the learned judge, in denying the right of the appellant to the relief sought, referred incidentally to the Statute of 1855, as giving a remedy in certain cases by the action of the comptroller under §§ 83, 85 (supra), and says: "No reason appears why the proceedings might not be reviewed by certiorari, or an application made by mandamus to compel him to do so," i. e., to set aside the sale by reason of the irregularity and invalidity in imposing the taxes for which the sale was made."

We were not there called upon to interpret the statute; and the remark made was suggestive merely, and not the resolution of the court upon any point to be determined, nor a direct opinion even, of the learned judge by whom it was written, but rather a side blow put by way of argument. It was not necessary to the judgment rendered, nor was it put forth as ground or reason for it.

The office of comptroller was created and his powers and duties are defined by statute. As between the purchaser at a tax sale and the State, under whose authority he acted, he may decide the questions of regularity relating thereto. He has no judicial power to determine a controversy between other parties, but to "discover" a fact which, when found, is to determine his own conduct. People v. Fairchild, 67 N. Y. 334.

Looking at the case, therefore, in the light of the argument for a rehearing, we find no reason for a decision differing from that before made.

The motion for a reargument must be denied, with costs.

1. A general assignment for the benefit of creditors, of all the property of the assignor, is not void as matter of law because it confers power upon the assignee to compound, compromise and release debts owing to the assignor, nor because it confers power upon the assignee to execute, acknowledge and deliver in the name of the assignor, for such consideration in money, or other thing, as he may deem sufficient, all such deeds, bills of sale or other conveyances in writing and all such releases, contracts and other instruments, as, in his discretion, may from time to time be necessary to carry into effect the intent and purpose of the instrument.
2. Such latter power, construed with the whole context, does not confer authority to sell the assigned property on credit or to exchange it for other property.
3. To authorize the judge to take from the jury the question of fraudulent intent arising upon the extrinsic facts and direct a verdict, the evidence must be undisputed, or so certain and convincing that no reasonable mind could come to any but one conclusion; if there is ground for opposite ineferences and a conclusion either way would not shock the sense of a reasonable man, the case is for the jury, although the judge may entertain a clear and decided conviction that the truth is on this or that side of the controversy.
4. Although the assignment transferred all the property of the assignor, it may, nevertheless, have been a fraudulent contrivance to embarrass or delay creditors; but this was a question for the jury.

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of New York City, denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial on exceptions directed to be heard at the General Term in the first instance and directing a judgment for defendant on a verdict in an action by an assignee for the benefit of creditors to recover the value of property of the assignor, sold by defendant sheriff. Reversed.

Plaintiff claimed such property as assignee under a general assignment made by Joseph Dart February 3, 1882, of the partnership property of the firm of Swezey & Dart and of the individual property of Joseph Dart.

*See People, ex rel. Equitable Life Ins. Co. v. Chapin, 4 Cent. Rep. 183.

The failure of the firm was caused by forgeries of Swezey to a large amount, for which an attachment was placed on the firm property. Swezey absconded January 29, 1881, and Dart made the assignment both for himself and the partnership.

Certain creditors, in disregard of the assignment, caused part of the firm property to be seized and sold by the defendant in this action, the Sheriff of New York County, under attachment and execution against the partners; and plaintiff brought this action to recover the value of such property.

The defendants set up as a defense that the assignment was void on its face and also void for fraud.

It appeared at the trial that ninety-six bales of sewing twine, the property of the firm, were not intended by the assignor Dart to be conveyed to the assignee, and were not inserted in the schedule of assets, nor referred to in the lists of the assets made out by Dart and furnished to his creditors. It was at the time claimed by Dart that the bales had been consigned to the partnership and were the property of the Wilton Company of New Hampshire.

It appeared further that the Wilton Company had brought an action of replevin to recover such goods, in which it failed to show title to them. It also appeared that a trade mark belonging to the firm, of acknowledged value, called the "Peerless," was also omitted from the lists of assets and schedules, under the claim that it had been assigned on January 27 to one Reynolds in consideration of a check for $1,500, signed by him. This check has never been paid or presented for payment; and the trade mark is being used by a manufacturing corporation of which Dart, his lawyer and Reynolds are corporators and in whose employment Dart now is.

Further facts appear from the opinion.

Mr. Edwin B. Smith, for appellant:

Where an assignment does not in express terms authorize or require an illegal act to be done by the assignee the legal inference is that the assignor did not intend to authorize any such act.

The assignment was such in terms as to pass everything which was in law and in fact the property of the assignors, "of every name and nature, not exempt from attachment by law, wheresoever situate, and by whatsoever muniments of title evidenced;" and the claim that the assignment was invalidated, because, as alleged, Dart did not intend to assign the ninety-six bales of twine and the "Peerless" trade mark, and that they were not included in the inventory, is without foundation.

Had there been aught ambiguous about the conduct of the parties, tending to show an assignment, good upon its face, to have been made with a fraudulent intent, the existence or nonexistence of such intention was a fact the determination of which should have been left to the jury.

Mr. Dart was advised by reputable counsel that the trade mark was not property which in its nature was subject to attachment and to sale upon execution; therefore fraud cannot be predicated of a failure to transfer it, even had it remained in the hands of the assignors to the date of assignment.

The advice so given seemed then to be based upon, or a fair inference from, authority.

Any cause which could be legitimately set up by the assignee as a justification for a course of conduct (in regard to the assigned property) in any respect different from that which the law would direct, of necessity, vitiates the assignment.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The trial judge directed a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the assignment of February 3, 1881, made by Dart, one of the firm of Swezey & Dart, to the plaintiff, was void, as having been made with the intent to hinder, delay and defraud creditors.

The assignment in form was a general assignment for the benefit of the creditors of the firm of Swezey & Dart, and individual creditors of Dart, and was executed by Dart in the firm name and also as an individual. It purported to transfer and assign to the plaintiff all the property of the firm, "real, personal and mixed, not exempt from attachment by law," for the benefit of the firm creditors, and also the individual property of Dart for the benefit of his individual creditors.

The general term affirmed the judgment and the sole point now presented is whether the question of fraud should have been submitted to the jury.

In support of the judgment it is claimed that the assignment was void on its face; but it is also insisted that the evidence of fraud extrinsic to the instrument was so conclusive that the court was justified in withholding the case from the jury, and in ruling as matter of law that fraud in fact was established.

The provisions in the instrument of assignment, upon which the defendant relies to establish its invalidity, relate to the powers conferred upon the assignee: first, "to compound, compromise and release" debts owing the assignor; and second, to "execute, acknowledge and deliver in the name of the said parties of the first part (assignors) as such copartners, or in the name of the said Joseph Dart individually, for such consideration in money, or other thing, as he may deem sufficient, all such deeds, bills of sale or other conveyances, in writing under seal or otherwise, and all such releases, contracts and other instruments in writing or under seal, as in his discretion may from time to time be necessary to carry into effect the intent and purpose of this instrument."

The validity of a provision in the general assignment for the benefit of creditors, authorizing the assignee to compound or compromise debts owing to the assignor, has been recently affirmed in this court, and is no longer an open question. Coyne v. Weaver, 84 N. Y. 386.

The stress of the argument against the validity of the instrument of assignment is placed on the clause conferring upon the assignee the power to execute deeds, bills of sale, or other conveyances in writing "for such consideration in money or other thing" as he may deem sufficient. This clause it is insisted authorizes the assignee to sell or dispose of the assigned property upon credit, or upon any consideration whether in money or property. If this is the true construction of the provision, there can be no doubt of its invalidity.

The law justifies and upholds trusts created by insolvent debtors of their property, through general assignments for the benefit of their creditors, only when they provide for the immediate and unconditional surrender and application of the assigned property to the payment of their debts; and any attempt to confer upon the assignee the power to delay the collection and conversion of the assets into money is held to be unlawful, and to vitiate the assignment. It has therefore been held that an authority contained in the assignment, to sell the assigned property on "credit," or for "cash or upon credit" as in the judgment of the assignee may appear best, or to convert the property into "money or available means," renders the assignment fraudulent and void. Nicholson v. Leavitt, and Burdick v. Post, 6 N. Y. 510, 522; Brigham v. Tillinghast, 13 N. Y. 215.

Construing the clause in question in view of the general rule of construction of written instruments, viz.: that a construction will be preferred which will uphold, rather than one which will destroy them (a rule applicable as well to insolvent assignments as to other instruments), and the further rule that in construing a particular clause, the whole context may be considered, we are of opinion that the clause in question should not be deemed to confer authority to sell the assigned property on credit, or to exchange it for other property.

The language of the whole paragraph seems more appropriate to a mere power of attorney than to an instrument of transfer or conveyance. It authorizes the assignee to execute deeds, bills of sale, etc., "in the name of the parties of the first part" (the assignors) a power which they would very rarely, if ever, find it necessary to exercise. But the power is in express terms limited to instruments which the assignee may deem necessary or requisite "to carry into effect the intent and purposes of this instrument."

Looking at the preceding parts of the assignment it is found that the granting clause is followed by a declaration of the trusts upon which the assignee is to take the property, the first of which is to take possession of and sell the same at public or private sale, and convert the same into money, "and next to apply the proceeds thereof" after deducting necessary costs, charges and expenses, to the payment of the debts of the assignors, in the order specified.

This explicit authority and direction to sell the assigned property, and convert the same into money, cannot be reconciled with the subsequent power to execute, in the names of the assignees, deeds, bills of sale and other conveyances "for such consideration in money or other thing" as the assignee may deem sufficient, provided the latter clause, as is claimed by the defendant, authorizes the assignee to dispose of the assigned property on credit or to exchange it.

But we are of opinion that the supposed inconsistency does not in fact exist. It is not difficult to imagine cases where, in the adjustment of property interests held in common by the assignors and third persons, mutual releases, transfers and might become necessary, setting apart in severalty to each owner his interest in the common property, or where, in the process of conversion it might become necessary for the assignee to execute instruments, upon a consideration other than the payment of money, affecting the assigned estate, but not involving any sale or exchange.

It is not improbable that the draftsman inserted this clause without any very definite purpose, following some former precedent. But however this may be, the provision is quite too vague to overcome the explicit direction in the prior clause, requiring in substance that the property should be sold for money; and especially in view of the expressed purpose of the latter clause, that the power thereby given was "to carry into effect the intent and purpose" of the instrument.

Two extraneous matters are relied upon to establish the existence of fraud in fact: first, that the assignor, Dart, intended to withhold from the assignee and the creditors ninety-six bales of twine owned by the firm of Swezey & Dart, upon the false and fraudulent pretense that they belonged to the Wilton Company, of which his mother-in-law was the proprietor; and second, the matter of the "Peerless" trade mark, belonging to the firm, used to designate warps manufactured for and sold by the firm.

The question whether the judge was authorized to take from the jury the question of fraudulent intent, arising upon the extrinsic facts, is to be determined in view of the settled rule that to justify the court in directing a verdict in any case upon the facts, the evidence must be undisputed or so certain and convincing that no reasonable mind could come to any but one conclusion. If there is ground for opposite inferences, and a conclusion either way would not shock the sense of a reasonable man, then the case is for the jury, although the judge may entertain a clear and decided conviction that the truth is on this or that side of the controversy.

The trial court or the general term is authorized to set aside a verdict and direct the issue to be retried before another jury, if in its judgment the verdict is against the weight or preponderance of evidence; but in a case which of right is triable by jury the court cannot take from that tribunal the ultimate decision of the fact, unless the fact is either uncontradicted, or the contradiction is illusory, or where, to use a current phrase, the answering evidence is a "scintilla" merely.

It is claimed on the part of the defendant that the ninety-six bales of twine were clearly and uncontrovertibly the property of Swezey & Dart, and not of the Wilton Company. It was conceded on the trial that they were the property of the firm; and it appears that the fact was so found by a jury in an action of replevin brought by the Wilton Company, against the sheriff, after the assignment.

The goods are not mentioned in the schedule of assets made by the assignee and verified by Dart, April 9, 1881. Dart was sworn as a witness on the trial. He testified that he did not intend to transfer those goods by the assignment, and the assignee had no information in respect to them until weeks after the assignment was made. The twine was manufactured by the Wilton Company, under some arrangement with Swezey & Dart, the particulars of which do not distinctly appear.

There is much evidence tending to show, and which would justify a jury in finding that Swezey & Dart owned the goods at the time of the assignment, and that Dart so understood and believed. Dart, however, testified that when the assignment was made he believed that the twine belonged to the Wilton Company, and that Swezey & Dart held it for sale only for the Wilton Company on commission, and that it was not until the decision of the replevin suit that he became satisfied that the title to the twine was in Swezey & Dart.

The relations between the Wilton Company. and Swezey & Dart were somewhat peculiar and are not clearly disclosed. Without going into further detail it is sufficient for our present purpose to say that whatever may be our view as to the preponderance of evidence we think the evidence is not of so conclusive a character as to preclude a jury from finding that the intent of Dart to withhold the ninety-six bales of twine from the asignee and the creditors was the result of an honest conviction that they belonged to the Wilton Company, and not to the assignor.

The matter of the trade mark was also, we think; for the consideration of the jury. The assignment of the trade mark to Reynolds purports to have been made for the consideration of $1,500, on the second of February, 1881, the day before the execution of the general assignment. There are certainly suspicious circumstances connected with the transaction. The consideration has never been paid.

The trade mark was transferred by Reynolds to a corporation organized a few days after the general assignment was made, of which Reynolds and Dart were two of the corporators. Reynolds, the nominal purchaser, is named in the schedule of Swezey & Dart's indebtedness, made in April, 1881, as a preferred creditor in the sum of $1,597.80, when it is clear upon the evidence that he was then indebted to the firm, after allowing all offsets, in the sum of about $1,400.

It does not affirmatively appear that Dart was cognizant of the insertion of this debt in the schedule. The circumstances in respect to the transaction with Reynolds are attempted to be explained by Dart. It is not for us to say whether the explanation is satisfactory. Reynolds was not preferred in any specific amount in the assignment itself, but generally for any claim which might be established by him against Swezey & Dart.

The assignment transferred all the property of the assignors, whatever may have been their secret intention. The assignment may, nevertheless, have been a fraudulent contrivance to embarrass and delay creditors. Shultz v. Hoagland, 85 N. Y. 465.

But this we think was a question for the jury.

The judgment should, therefore, be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

CROSS appeals from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Special Term in favor of plaintiff on the second trial of an action to set aside and cancel a deed executed by plaintiff, on the ground of fraudulent representations. Reversed on defendant's appeal. Plaintiff's appeal dismissed.

Reported below, 38 Hun, 560.

On the first trial of this action the court held that plaintiff was an incompetent witness to prove fraudulent representations, under the Code, § 829, and excluded her testimony and dismissed the complaint. On appeal to the general term this judgment was reversed and a new trial granted. On the new trial, on the strength of plaintiff's testimony, the court found in her favor and directed a referee to take an account, etc.

Before the account was taken, defendant appealed to the general term, where the judgment was modified, excluding from the accounting certain property, but in other respects it was affirmed. Subsequently other proceedings were had and several judgments and orders were entered in this action in reference to such accounting, some of which were favorable and others adverse to plaintiff's interest, and all of which are immaterial to the decision on this appeal. From the final judgment of the general term, affirming the proceedings, orders and judgments herein, both parties appealed to this court.

Further facts appear from the opinion.

Messrs. John E. Burrill and George Zabriskie, for plaintiff:

The plaintiff was not an incompetent witness under section 829 of the Code, because the title or interest to be affected by the action was not derived by defendant from plaintiff's husband, but from plaintiff.

Section 829 of the Code, in using the words "title or interest from, through or under a deceased person" intended to refer only to the title or interest sought to be affected by the action.

Cary v. White, 59 N. Y. 336–341.

This action does not affect the title acquired by the defendant from plaintiff's husband, but leaves the deed unaffected, so far as it respects her husband and the grantee.

Plaintiff's dower right was not revived by the defendant from or through the husband of the plaintiff. On the contrary, such right of dower, when inchoate, cannot be affected by any act of the husband; and when it has become vested the widow takes it, not as the representative of her husband, nor by descent, but as a contingent remainderman whose estate attaches as of the time of the seisin of the husband and becomes vested at his death.

The inchoate right of dower of the wife is as much entitled to protection as the perfected or vested right of the widow.

Mills v. Van Voorhies, 20 N. Y. 412; Matthews v. Duryee, 4 Keyes, 525.

Such inchoate right is a subsisting and valuable interest, to protect and preserve which she has a right of action.

Simar v. Canaday, supra.

Mr. Lewis Sanders, for defendant:

The plaintiff was an incompetent witness.

See Sanford v. Ellithorp, 95 N. Y. 48.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the plaintiff as the widow of Rudolph A. Witthaus, to cancel and annul a deed of several parcels of land in the City of New York, so far as it affected her right of dower in the parcels lying below Fifty-Ninth Street, upon the ground that her signature thereto had been obtained by the false and fraudulent representations of her husband.

The proof showed that on December 28, 1876, Rudolph A. Witthaus and the plaintiff executed and duly acknowledged a deed of ten separate parcels of real estate situate in the City of New York (lying partly above and partly below Fifty-Ninth Street) to Frederick Schack, the defendant, in fee to secure the payment of certain debts owing by Witthaus to the several persons named in the deed. It was stated therein that it was upon trust to sell and convey the land, to produce the best price that could be realized from the same and apply the moneys realized to the payment of said debts, pro rata according to their respective amounts.

The proof further showed that the deed was delivered to the defendant on the same day, and that he immediately entered upon the possession of the property and continued to sell, convey and rent the same until the commencement of this action in January, 1879. Rudolph A. Witthaus died by his own hand on March 19, 1877.

Upon the trial the plaintiff was herself offered as a witness to prove the fraudulent representations alleged, and upon the faith of which she claims that she was induced to sign and acknowledge the deed in question. Upon being asked to relate the conversation occurring between herself and her husband in which the representations occurred, the defendant's counsel objected to the competency of her evidence, upon the ground that it constituted personal communications between the defendant's deceased grantor and the witness, which were inadmissible under the Code. The objection was overruled by the trial judge and the defendant excepted. The witness thereupon gave evidence tending to show that on the morning of December 23, her husband requested her to join him in a deed of so much of his property in the City of New York as was situated north of Fifty-Ninth Street, to Schack, the defendant, for the purpose of securing several persons to whom he was indebted. She assented to this proposition, and further testified that when later in the day the deed was presented to her for execution and acknowledgment, her husband said that it was prepared in accordance with the agreement made between them in the morning. The evidence thus given by the plaintiff was the only proof offered as to the fraudulent representations alleged by the plaintiff.

The only question which we consider it necessary to discuss relates to the competency of this evidence under the Code of Civil Procedure. The provision of the Code, so far as it is applicable to the question in hand, may be abbreviated as follows: "Section 829. Upon the trial of an action * * * a party or person interested in the event * * * shall not be examined as a witness in his own behalf or interest * * * against * * * a person deriving his title or interest from, through, or under a deceased person, by assignment or otherwise; concerning a personal transaction or communication between the witness and the deceased person."

It is not disputed that the plaintiff is a party and interested in the event of the action, or that the subject of the inquiry related to a personal communication between the deceased person and the witness; but it is claimed, as stated in plaintiff's points, that "the plaintiff was not an incompetent witness under section 829 of the Code, because the title or interest to be affected by the action was not derived by defendant from plaintiff's husband, but from plaintiff."

The plaintiff thus seeks to stand upon the letter of the statute, and to claim exemption from its provisions by reason of the alleged creation of a contingent estate, intermediate the seisin of the husband and the execution of the deed, which it is claimed suspended the husband's title to a part of his property and created a new estate, transferable only by a conveyance from the wife.

The error in this proposition consists in the assumption that the wife has an estate in the lands of her husband during his life, which she can convey to another.

The settled theory of the law, as to the nature of an inchoate right of dower, is that it is not an estate or interest in land at all, but is a contingent claim arising not out of contract, but as an institution of law, constituting a mere chose in action, incapable of transfer by grant or conveyance but susceptible only during its inchoate state of extinguishment.

By force of the statute this is effected by the act of the wife in joining with her husband in the execution of a deed of the land. Such deed, so far as the wife is concerned, operates as a release or satisfaction of the interest and not as a conveyance, and removes an incumbrance instead of transferring an interest or estate. Her right may also be forfeited by her adultery, and thus extinguished, and barred by jointure or pecuniary provision.

It was said by Judge Gardiner, in Lawrence v. Miller, 2 N. Y. 245, that "Before assignment the widow has no estate in the lands of her husband; her right is a mere chose in action which cannot be sold upon execution at law; until that time it is strictly a claim." Affirmed in Lawrence v. Brown, 5 N. Y. 394.

The same learned judge said in Moore v. New York, 8 N. Y. 112: "Before assignment of dower the widow has no estate but a mere right in action, or claim which cannot be sold on execution." Citing 2 N. Y. 254; Greenl. Cruise, Dig. title, Dower, chap. 3, § 1; Gooch v. Atkins, 14 Mass. 378.

If this is the true character of the right of the widow prior to the assignment, that of a wife must be a right to a claim for dower, contingent upon her surviving her husband. Such a possibility may be released; but it is not, it is believed, the subject of grant or assignment; nor is it in any sense an interest in real estate. "The estate of the widow after assignment of dower is a continuation of the estate of her deceased husband."

It was held in Marvin v. Smith, 46 N. Y. 574, that "An inchoate right of dower may be released to the grantee of the husband by a proper conveyance, executed and acknowledged in the form prescribed by statute; but the right cannot be transferred to a stranger or to one to whom the wife does not stand in privity."

It was further held that the husband having previously conveyed the premises upon certain specified trusts, a mortgage upon the same subsequently executed by the husband and wife was ineffectual to bar her right of dower, the court saying: "If therefore the husband had no interest which was subject to the mortgage and passed by means of it, the mortgagee took no title to the dower right. That could only be released by a deed of her husband, conveying the estate to which it was incidental, in which she shall unite."

In Elwood v. Klock, 13 Barb. 50, it was held that where "the widow of the first tenant releases her dower before the same has been assigned to her, her release will operate, not as an assignment of dower to the widow, nor as a conveyance of it to the grantee, but as an extinguishment of her right of dower; and such release will not affect the claim to dower of the widow of a subsequent grantee of the premises."

The case of Elmendorf v. Lockwood, 57 N. Y. 322, seems in point upon the question in this case. In discussing the nature of the act of the wife in joining her husband in the execution of a deed, Earl, C., said: "When she has united in the conveyance, her dower is said to be barred, relinquished, extinguished, removed. Such is the language of Kent and other legal writers. Judge Willard, in his work on Real Estate, p. 6, says: 'The inchoate right to dower is, in this State, an incumbrance upon the estate of her husband which is usually removed by her uniting with him in the deed and acknowledging the execution thereof.' And at p. 64: 'The object of uniting the wife with the husband in his conveyance of land to a third person is to extinguish her incohate right of dower.'" Continuing, Judge Earl further says: "When the wife unites with her husband in a conveyance properly executed by her, which is effectual and operative against her husband, and which is not superseded or set aside as against him or his grantee, her right of dower is forever barred and extinguished, for all purposes, and as to all persons."

Dwight, C., writing in the same case and considering the nature of a fine in the English law, for which our system of private acknowledgments is a substitute, says: "A fine levied by a person who has no title but who afterward becomes heir will be an estoppel to his claim as heir, and yet, a release by deed would not have barred his title. The principle seems to be that the fine accompanies the estate and becomes a muniment of title, and may be resorted to by anyone who happens to be in possession of the estate. These views would prevail in the case of dower while it is still inchoate. The argument would be yet stronger after the husband's death. The estoppel would then work a transfer of the estate to the vendee under the husband's conveyance. Lampet's Case, 5 Coke, part 10, 46 b; Helps v. Hereford, 2 Barn. & Ald, 242."

It was also held in Aikman v. Harsell, 98 N. Y. 191, that "The right of a widow to dower, until it is assigned, is a mere chose in action which is not the subject of a sale upon execution at law, and before assignment or admeasurement is only a claim."

So, too, it is said by Andrews, J., in Hinchcliffe v. Shea (N. Y.), 4 Cent. Rep. 214, 103 N. Y. 155: "The joinder by a married woman with her husband in a deed or mortgage of his lands does not operate, as to her, by way of passing an estate, but inures simply as a release to the grantee of the husband, of her future contingent right of dower in the granted or mortgaged premises, in aid of the title or interest conveyed by his deed or mortgage. Her release attends the title derived from the husband and concludes her from afterwards claiming dower in the premises as against the grantee or mortgagee, so long as there remains a subsisting title or interest created by his conveyance." See also Sanford v. Ellithorp, 95 N. Y. 50.

It would seem clear, from the authorities, that the act of the wife in joining her husband in the execution of a deed of his lands does not constitute her a grantor of the premises, or vest in the grantee any greater or other estate than such as he derives from the conveyance of the husband. Its effect is merely to extinguish a contingent claim existing as a possible incumbrance, and ceasing to exist by reason of the execution of the husband's deed, and to be revived only by the subsequent cancellation or annulment of his conveyance.

It is also obvious that the grantee in such deed takes title to the whole premises, solely by virtue of the title and estate of the husband, and therefore in the fullest sense derives his title "through, from and under" such grantor.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the defendant took the title to the entire premises in dispute from Rudolph A. Witthaus, and that his wife was not a competent witness to testify to personal transactions and communications occurring between herself and her husband in reference to such deed. The defendant is, therefore, within the letter as well as the spirit of section 829 of the Code.

It follows as matter of course, from these views, that the several appeals of the plaintiff, which constitute incidents to the judgment, must fall with the reversal of the judgment.

Such appeals are, therefore, dismissed, without costs to either party.

The judgment of the courts below should be reversed upon the defendant's appeal, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

All concur.

Re Application of NEW YORK, LACKAWANNA & WESTERN R. CO. to Acquire Real Estate of Minnie Van Zandt et al.

1. Where there is a devise to one person in fee, and, in case of his death, to another, the contingency referred to is the death of the first named devisee during the lifetime of the testator, and if such devisee survives the testator he takes an absolute fee.
2. The same rule of construction is to be applied where the alternative devise is made to depend upon the death of the first named devisee "without issue," or "without children," etc.
3. But this rule applies only when the context of the will is silent and affords no indication of intention other than that disclosed by words of absolute gift, followed by a gift over in case of death or of death without issue; and the tendency is to lay hold of slight circumstances in the will to vary the construction and give effect to the language according to its natural import.

4. When the testatrix devised real estate to her daughter, without words of inheritance, and then directed that in case the daughter should die without issue, the estate, real and personal, should be possessed and enjoyed by the husband, sister and brothers of the testatrix, the addition at the end of the clause, "the devise over to my husband, sister and brothers to depend upon the contingency of my daughter dying without issue," indicated an intention by the testatrix that in the event of her daughter's dying without issue, her husband, sister and brothers should enjoy the property, without reference to any other contingency; and such construction is strengthened by the fact that the daughter was only about six years of age at the death of the testatrix.
5. Held, further, that the daughter took, under her mother's will, a base or conditional fee, defeasible by her dying without leaving issue at the time of her death; that her issue, should she leave any, would take by inheritance from her, but a conveyance by her in her lifetime would be effectual as against them, and that an indefeasible title in fee could be conveyed and the contingent, expectant estate, limited to the husband, sister and brothers of the testatrix in the event of the daughter dying without issue, cut off by their joining with her in a conveyance.

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming an order of the Monroe Special Term directing the disposal of moneys paid into court as compensation for land taken by a railroad. Affirmed.

The special term directed the moneys to be paid into the hands of the Treasurer of Livingston County and the interest paid to Minnie Van Zandt during her life, and after her death the principal to be paid to the persons entitled under the will of Ellen M. Wisner.

The provisions of the will and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. W. H. McMath, for Minnie Van Zandt, appellant:

The construction for which we contend is this: that by the words "In case my daughter Minnie should die without" and the words "My daughter Minnie dying without issue," testatrix intended, dying before her (testatrix's) death without issue. Testatrix intended to make an alternative devise, to be substituted in case the estate given to Minnie never vested.

We maintain that testatrix has plainly expressed this intention in the terms used in her will. By the second clause of the will, although no words of inheritance are used, an absolute fee in the real estate is given to Minnie, subject only to the legacies amounting to $1,600, unless the intent to pass a less estate or interest appears by express terms, or is necessarily implied in the terms of the will.

3 R. S. 7th ed. p. 2205, § 1.

No implication that an estate less than an absolute fee was intended can be successfully claimed on account of the absence of the word "heirs."

Kirk v. Richardson,, 32 Hun, 434.

The testatrix must be considered as speaking with reference to the time of her death; and the use of the word "should" instead of the future auxiliary "shall" clearly indicates that testatrix intended that the contingency was to happen prior to her death. Note the last sentence of the third paragraph of the will:

"The devise over to my husband, sister and brothers to depend upon the contingency of my daughter Minnie dying without issue."

A devise is a disposition of property. Testatrix does not say that the possession or the vesting of the estate in the husband, etc., is to depend, but that the devise is to depend, etc. The estate given to the husband, etc., whether vested or contingent, commenced, if at all, at the death of testatrix. Where an expectant estate is created by devise, the death of testator shall be deemed the time of the creation of the estate.

3 R. S. 7th ed. 2179, § 41.

The contingency was attached to the estate given to the husband, sister and brothers, and was to be a condition precedent thereto. It must have happened before their estates could have commenced, and the words "dying without issue," therefore, if in themselves indefinite as to time, are made certain.

The contingency did not happen before their estates were created and they were defeated.

Wolfe v. Van Nostrand, 2 N. Y. 440.

It is to be presumed that testatrix has made a will valid in all its provisions. And the court will give such a construction, if possible, as will give some effect to every expression, rather than such as will render any of the expressions inoperative.

Trustees Auburn Seminary v. Kellogg, 16 N. Y. 86; 1 Jarm. Wills, last ed. 475; Redf. Sur. Pr. 2d ed. 245.

Our construction is in accord with, and the only construction that is in accord with, all the rules, as laid down by the courts.

Minnie was the sole heir of testatrix. Every presumption is in her favor.

1 Jarm. Wills, last ed. 532; Lynes v. Townsend, 33 N. Y. 570.

The fact that testatrix made the legacies chargeable upon the estate given to Minnie is evidence of an intention to give her an absolute fee.

2 Jarm. Wills, last ed. 268, 271.

The party to take, under a will, should, if possible and consistent with the terms of the will, be determined at death of testator.

Converse v. Kellogg, 7 Barb. 593.

The court will not favor a construction which will have the effect of devesting an estate.

Clason v. Clason, 6 Paige, 541.

Where an estate is given in one part of an instrument in clear and decisive terms, such estate cannot be taken away or cut down by raising a doubt upon the extent or meaning or application of a subsequent clause, nor by inference therefrom, nor by any subsequent words that are not as clear and decisive as the words of the clause giving that estate.

Roseboom v. Roseboom, 81 N. Y. 359; 1 Jarm. Wills, 480; Freeman v. Coit, 96 N. Y. 63.

A bequest or devise in terms which ordinarily pass an absolute interest, should never be cut down into a gift for life, except where such qualifications are necessary to make the whole will consistent.

1 Redf. Wills, 3d ed. 433, 434; Briggs v. Shaw, 9 Allen, 516; 1 Jarm. Wills, 474.

It requires very strong words to defeat a prior vested gift.

2 Jarm. Wills, last ed. 824.

Where a will in terms grants a fee, and a later clause qualifies it by some limitation, it is a settled and invariable rule not to disturb the prior devise, further than is absolutely necessary for the purpose of giving effect to the posterior qualifying clause.

1 Jarm. Wills, last ed. 474; 3 Barb. 64.

A clause of substitution is generally referable to the death of testator.

Maberly v. Strode, 3 Ves. 450; 1 Jarm. Wills, 478; 2 Jarm. Wills, 785.

The following are some of the cases in which wills containing terms similar to this were before the courts for construction:

Livingston v. Greene, 53 N. Y. 124; Kelly v. Kelly, 61 N. Y. 47; Embury v. Sheldon, 68 N.Y. 239; McLoughlin v. Maher, 17 Hun, 215; Briggs v. Shaw, 9 Allen, 517; Clayton v. Lowe, 7 E. C. L. 218; Schenk v. Agnew, 4 Kay & J. 405; Miller v. McBlain, 98 N.Y. 517; Leonard v. Kingsland, 67 How. Pr. 481; Re Tallmage, 20 N. Y. Week. Dig. 69; Waugh's App. 78 Pa. 436; Mickley's App. 92 Pa. 514.

Mr. Charles J. Bissell, for certain persons named in the will of Ellen M. Wisner, respondents:

It is submitted that the devise over to the husband, brothers and sister of the testatrix, is a valid devise as a contingent limitation, and will take effect upon the death of Minnie Van Zandt without issue.

At common law the devise over would probably have been held to be void, as importing an indefinite failure of issue; but by the Revised Statutes the language used is held to mean issue living at the death of the first taker, and hence a valid executory devise.

1 R. S. part 2, chap. 1, title 2, art. 1, § 19.

The absolute power of alienation is only suspended during the life of Minnie Van Zandt; upon her death without issue the estate absolutely vests in the persons named in the will, subject to the life estate in Reuben P. Wisner and Delia Fisk. The remaindermen and the life tenants could by joining in a conveyance at any time, convey the fee.

1 R. S. P. 2, chap. 1, title 2, art. 1, § 14; 5 R. S. Edmonds' ed. p. 307, Reviser's notes.

Possibly by the terms of section 19 of the same title and chapter, one of the life estates would be rejected and the remainder vest in possession on the death of Minnie Van Zandt, and the first named life tenant. This would not avoid the remainder.

Woodruff v. Cook, 47 Barb. 305; S. C. affirmed 61 N. Y. 638.

There are many cases in this State, where executory devises, such as the one under consideration, have been held good, and to vest an interest in the executory devisees upon the death of the first taker, without issue, long after the death of the testator.

Emmons v. Cairns, 3 Barb. 243; Hill v. Hill, 4 Barb. 419; Pond v. Bergh, 10 Paige, 140; Heard v. Horton,* 1 Denio, 165; Anderson v. Jackson, 16 Johns. 382; Dumond v. Stringham, 26 Barb. 104; Norris v. Beyea, 13 N. Y. 273.

In none of these cases does the question appear to have been raised whether the death without issue meant a death during the lifetime of the testator; but it is assumed by counsel and the court that it meant in each case a death without issue at any time.

In 2 Jarman on Wills, 5th Am. ed. chap. 48, the various cases arising under wills where there is a limitation over, in case of the death of the first taker, are fully discussed. The general rule appears to be that when the only contingency is the death of the first taker, the will is construed to mean a death occurring in the lifetime of the testator; for the reasons that death is a certain event, and that the testator must have intended the limitation over to take effect only in the event of the death of the first taker, prior to that of the testator, else he would have provided for a life estate in the usual way.

Kelly v. Kelly, 61 N. Y. 47.

But when some other contingency is annexed to the death of the first taker, not certain in itself, such as "dying without issue," the general rule appears to be (unless controlled by the context of the will) that the limitation over will take effect upon the happening of the event at any time.

2 Jarm. Wills, chap. 49, p. 783, et seq. and cases cited; Nellis v. Nellis, 1 Cent. Rep. 296, 99 N. Y. 505; Buel v. Southwick, 70 N. Y. 581.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It may be regarded as a settled rule of construction that where there is a devise to one person in fee, and in case of his death to another, the contingency referred to is the death of the first named devisee during the lifetime of the testator, and that if such devisee survives the testator he takes an absolute fee; that the words of contingency do not create a remainder over to take effect upon the death, at any time, of the first taker, or an executory devise, but are merely substitutionary and used for the purpose of preventing a lapse in case the devisee first named should not be living at the time of the death of the testator.

This construction is uniformly adopted, unless there is some language in the will indicative of a different intention on the part of the testator. The reason assigned for this construction has been that as death is a certain event, and the time only is contingent, the words of contingency in a devise of this description can only be satisfied by referring them to a death before some particular period; and no other being mentioned, the time referred to must be presumed to have been the testator's own death. It is also founded upon the principle that, in construing wills, effect should be given, if possible, to all the words used by the testator, and that any other construction than the one which has been adopted would in every case reduce the estate of the first named devisee to an estate for life; for his death at some time is certain; and the words of inheritance at tached to the devise to him would in every case be inoperative.

Nevertheless, it has been held that the same rule of construction is to be applied where the alternative devise is made to depend upon the death of the first named devisee "without issue" or "without children," etc. This question is thoroughly discussed in the opinion of Andrews, J., in the case of Vanderzee v. Slingerland, 103 N.Y. 47, Sub nom. Vanderzee v. Haswell, 4 Cent. Rep. 176, and the learned judge comes to the conclusion that although the reason upon which the rule adopted in the first mentioned class of cases was founded, does not exist in the second, yet that it is established by precedent.

It would be useless now to go through the cases. They are very numerous, and not all reconcilable, and many of them contain special features. It is sufficient for present purposes to refer to a few of the cases.

In Gee v. Mayor etc. of Manchester, 17 Adol. & Ell. 737, the testator devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to be divided equally among his children as follows, viz.: "I will and bequeath to my eldest son A. one seventh share of my property, to his heirs, executors and administrators." Then followed similar devises and bequests to each of the testator's six other children, and afterward a general provision in these words: "And in case any of my sons and daughters die without issue that their share returns to my sons and daughters equally among them; and in case any of my sons and daughters die and leaving issue, that they take their deceased parent's share."

It was held that the death referred to was a death in the lifetime of the testator, and that all his children having survived him, they each took a fee simple in one seventh of his realty.

It must be observed that unless that construction was adopted, the words of inheritance attached to the devise to each of the testator's children must in every event be rejected.

It was certain that each of the children would die, either with or without issue. Construing the death referred to by the testator as a death at any time, the result would be that upon the death of either of the testator's sons, for instance, without issue, his share would go to his brothers and sisters, not as his heirs but as purchasers by virtue of the limitation over to them. If he died leaving issue, such issue would take in like manner, not as his heirs, but as purchasers. He would have no estate of inheritance in any event, and could make no disposition of the fee in the realty in his lifetime, or by will. The words of the testator, purporting to give him an estate in fee, would thus be wholly rejected, and his estate, under all circumstances, cut down to a life estate.

It was on these grounds that Lord Campbell, in delivering the judgment of the court, held that the only mode of giving effect to all the words of the testator was by treating the words in the last clause of the will as words of substitution only, in case of a lapse, and referring the death there contemplated to a death in the lifetime of the testator.

In Clayton v. Lowe, 5 Barn. & Ald. 636, the devise was in the same form as in the case last cited. The estate was given to the testator's three grandchildren, forever. If either of them should die without lawful child or children, the share of the one so dying was was to be divided among the survivors, but if either should die leaving lawful child or children, such child or children should take the share of the parent. It is obvious that unless the death referred to was a death in the lifetime of the testator, the first named devisees could in no event take a fee.

Doe v. Sparrow, 13 East, 359, was a case of the same description with additional significant words, expressly referring to the testator's own death.

Woodburne v. Woodburne, 23 L. J. Eq. 336, was the same as Gee v. Mayor of Manchester, and was decided the same way.

The cases I have referred to rest on principles, and are founded on reasons, which are easily comprehended; but there are other cases in which the words "die without issue" are construed as referring to a death in the lifetime of the testator, where those principles are inapplicable, and the reasons do not exist; and of such cases Andrews, J., in the case of Vanderzee v. Slingerland, says that they stand more upon authority than upon reason.

It is stated in Jarman on Wills (5th Am. ed. p. 783) that the general rule is that where the context is silent, the words referring to the death of the prior legatee, in connection with some collateral event, apply to the contingency happening as well after as before the death of the testator.

In O'Mahoney v. Burdett, L. R. 7 H. L. Eng. & Irish App. 388, 393, it was held that a bequest to A., and if she should die unmarried or without children, to B., was an absolute gift to A., defeasible by an executory gift over in the event of A., dying at any time, unmarried or without children, and that this construction could only be effected by a context which rendered a different meaning necessary.

And in Britton v. Thornton, 112 U. S. 536 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 820], it was held that under a devise to one person in fee and in case he should die under age and without children, to another in fee, the devise over would take effect upon the death, at any time, of the first devisee under age and without children.

To the same effect is Edwards v. Edwards, 15 Beav. 357; and see Doe v. Webber, 1 Barn. & Ald. 713, and Anderson v. Jackson, 16 Johns. 382.

But it cannot be disputed that there are several cases holding that where there is simply a devise to A. in fee, and in the event of his dying without issue, then to B., the death referred to is a death in the lifetime of the testator; and if A. survives him, he takes an absolute and indefeasable estate in fee.

See Home v. Pillans, 2 Myl. & K. 15, 19, and cases cited; Ware v. Watson 7 D. E. G. M. & G. 248.

Such appears to be the rule in Pennsylvania; Mickley's App. 92 Pa. 514; and the same rule has been adopted in this court; Quackenbos v. Kingsland, 2 Cent. Rep. 918, 102 N. Y. 128, and was recognized in Vanderzee v. Slingerland, 103 N. Y. 47, 4 Cent. Rep. 176, before referred to. But in that case the learned judge writing the opinion (Andrews, J.) says that the rule established by the court, applies only when the context of the will is silent and affords no indication of intention other than that disclosed by word of absolute gift, followed by a gift over in case of death, or of death without issue; and that indeed the tendency is to lay hold of slight circumstances in the will, to vary the construction and give effect to the language according to its natural import; and in the will which the learned judge was then construing, he found such indications.

I think that similar indications exist in the will now before us. The testatrix does not charge the legacies upon her daughter Minnie personally, but upon the real estate devised, so they would be borne by whomsoever should become entitled to that real estate. She devises the real estate to her, without words of inheritance. She then directs that in case she should die without issue, her estate, real and personal, should be possessed and enjoyed by the others named in the will. Her death without issue is a contingent event; but by adopting the construction contended for, and claimed to be established by the authorities, the court would add another contingency not specified by the testatrix, that is that she died without issue during the lifetime of the testatrix.

As if to make her intentions clearer, and to indicate that no other contingency was contemplated than the one which she had expressed, the testatrix adds, at the end of the clause: "The devise over to my husband, sister and brothers to depend upon the contingency of my daughter Minnie dying without issue,"—this repetition, clearly defining the testatrix's intention that in the event of her daughter's dying without issue, her husband, sister and brothers should enjoy the property, without reference to any other contingency.

The daughter was an infant of about six years of age at the time of the testatrix; and it would be a very forced construction of the language of the will to hold that the testatrix had an unexpressed intention that if the child should die the next year, or at any other time, after the death of the testatrix, the devise over to her husband, sister and brothers should not take effect.

Our conclusion is that Minnie VanZandt took, under her mother's will, a base or conditional fee, defeasible by her dying without leaving issue living at the time of her death; 1 R. S. 724, § 22; that her issue, should she leave any, would take by inheritance from her, but a conveyance by her in her lifetime would be effectual as against them; and that an indefeasible title in fee could be conveyed and the contingent expectant estate limited to the husband, sister and brothers of the testatrix in the event of Minnie's dying without issue, cut off by their joining with her in a conveyance. See Emmons v. Cairns, 3 Barb. 243, 246, et seq.

For these reasons we think the order appealed from should be affirmed.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE CO., Appt.

1. In construing a contract between an insurance company and a policy holder, where it is capable of two constructions, one involving a forfeiture, and the other supporting the obligation of the policy against the insurer, that construction, if fair and reasonable, which does not involve the forfeiture, is preferred by the court.
2. This rule is applicable only where the words used in a policy leave the meaning in doubt; where there is no doubt as to the meaning of the language used, such meaning must prevail in the absence of fraud or mistake.
3. Where, after the premium was due upon a policy, the company, at the request of the policy holder, postponed its payment, upon the giving of his note by the latter, for the same, containing the condition that if he failed to pay the note at maturity he should thereby immediately forfeit all claims to further insurance, and the company gave its receipt with similar condition, held, that by failing to pay such note when due the forfeiture attached and the policy holder thereby lost the right to all further insurance under his policy.
4. Held further, that although the policy contained a promise by the company, that upon its surrender within thirty days after the unpaid premium should be due the company would in exchange issue a paid up policy for the amount of premium received upon it, and although the policy holder offered to pay the note twelve days after it became due, he could not compel the company to give a paid up policy for the amount of premiums paid by him previous to the time when the one fell due for which he gave the note.*
5. Punctuality in the payment of premiums in the case of a life insurance policy is the very essence of the contract; and when payment is not made at the time, the company has the right to forfeit if such was the contract.

Mr. James M. Fisk, for respondent:

Each note was an extension of the time of payment of the debt evidenced by it until the note matured.

76 N. Y. 521; 34 Hun, 100.

Under the terms of the policy plaintiff had thirty days after a premium, or in this case the note, became due to demand a paid up policy. This he did.

When a creditor accepts a bill or note from his debtor it will operate to suspend the right of action on the original debt until the bill or note becomes due or is dishonored.

Putnam v. Lewis, 8 Johns. 389; Smith v. Applegate, 1 Daly, 91.

In general, the taking by a creditor of a debtor's note for an existing indebtedness does not merge or extinguish the indebtedness; the note is simply evidence of the debt, and its operation is only to extend the time of payment; and so successive renewal notes are simply extensions from date to date of the time of, payment.

34 Hun, 102, citing Jagger Iron Co. v. Walker, 76 N. Y. 521.

The giving of the note was held not to be the making of a debt, but only the promise to pay the old one, and an extension of time for payment.

Parrott v. Colby, 71 N. Y. 597.

A forfeiture for nonpayment of premium is inserted in the contract for the benefit of the insurer. It may be waived by the company.

87 N. Y. 622.

A forfeiture is not favored, either in law or equity, and a provision for it in a contract will be strictly construed; and a waiver will be found on slight evidence, when the equity of the claim, as in this case, is (under the contract) in favor of the plaintiff.

Burleigh v. Gebhard Fire Ins. Co. 90 N. Y. 220.

When courts are compelled to choose between two constructions, the vigorous and hard, producing a forfeiture, and another natural and reasonable, and supporting the obligation, the latter construction will be preferred.

80 N. Y. 21; 90 N. Y. 220.

The policy of strict construction where forfeiture was involved, was reaffirmed in 1 Cent. Rep. 528, 100 N. Y. 421.

In such cases no other meaning will be given to the language used than a most rigid and literal interpretation will permit; and where the condition is a limitation of liability, it will not be extended by interpretation so as to include a case not clearly within the words. Id.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant insured the life of the plaintiff, August 16, 1870, in the sum of $5,000, on payment of a premium of $247 and a premium of the same amount thereafter payable on the 16th of August in each year. The policy was issued for the sole benefit of Charles F. Holly, Jr., and contained a clause of forfeiture if the premium were not paid at the time mentioned. It also contained a promise that if, after three annual payments of premiums were made, the assured should fail to make payment of any further premium when due, then upon a surrender of the policy within thirty days after such unpaid premium should be due, the Company would in exchange issue a paid up policy for the amount of even dollars of premium received by it on the policy. The plaintiff had thirty days after a premium became due in which to pay it. By subsequent agreement the payment of the premium was changed from annual to semi-annual periods, and as thus changed the premiums had been paid to February 16, 1877.

The plaintiff did not pay the premium which became due on the date last named, and had not paid it on the 14th of March following. On that day he called at the office of the Company in New York; and being, as he says, short of money he asked for an extension of time, which resulted finally in his giving a note for the payment of the premium which had fallen due on the 16th of the previous February, and the note was payable in three months from its date (March 14) and contained this condition: "This note is given in part payment of the annual premium on policy numbered as per margin, with the understanding that all claims to further insurance and all benefits whatever which full payment in cash of said premium would have secured shall become immediately void and be forfeited to said Company if this note is not paid at maturity."

Contemporaneous with this note and as part of one and the same transaction the defendant gave to the plaintiff the following receipt :

"Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.,
319 Broadway New York, March 14, 1877,
Note 3 mo. due June 14, 1877.
Chas. F. Holly.

Received from the owner of policy No. 9609, 128\frac{45}{100}$, which continues said policy in force until the 16th day of August, 1877, at noon, in accordance with its terms and conditions.

Not binding upon the Company until the premium is paid and this receipt signed by
Jno. R. Hegeman
(Prem. Receipt)
Vice President."

When this note became due the plaintiff, not desiring to pay it, asked for its renewal; and the result was that the plaintiff signed another note containing a condition precisely similar to that set forth in the first one, and payable August 14, 1877, and the defendant gave up the first note to the plaintiff. When the second note became due the plaintiff failed to pay it; and on the 25th or 26th of August thereafter called at the office of the Company and offered to pay the note, which payment was refused and the claim made that the policy was forfeited by the nonpayment of the note when due.

The plaintiff subsequently commenced this action to compel defendant to comply with its agreement and give a paid up policy for the amount of premiums paid by him (over $1,700) up to the time when he failed to pay the premium due August 16, 1877.

The plaintiff has succeeded thus far. In the argument of the case here for the plaintiff, much stress was laid upon the rules governing the court in construing contracts between insurance companies and policy holders, especially when any forfeiture is to be insisted upon by the former. A strict construction it is said must be insisted upon; and the contract resulting in a forfeiture cannot be extended beyond the strict and literal meaning of the words used.

This is undoubtedly true. In cases where the meaning is not entirely plain, and where it is capable of two constructions, one involving a forfeiture and the other being fair and reasonable and supporting the obligation of the policy against the insurer, that construction is preferred by the courts which does not involve the forfeiture; not only because it is not so harsh but also because if the language be doubtful, it is that employed by the insurer, and should be taken most strongly against him. As it is said by Finch, J., in delivering the opinion of this court:

"If a construction so literal and severe is intended by the insurer, he should at least say so by plain and appropriate language, and not ask the court to supply it by intendment." See Burleigh v. Gebhard Fire Ins. Co. 90 N. Y. 220.

This was said in relation to the construction to be given the words "Detached at least 100 feet" in a policy of insurance upon a lot of goods in a frame storehouse thus situated. The court held that a small office standing seventy-five feet away, which the trial court found was not an exposure and did not affect the risk, did not constitute a breach of the warranty.

But all the cases which use language of this nature as to the construction to be given words in a policy are cases where the words used leave the meaning in doubt. Where there is no doubt as to the meaning of the language used, such meaning must prevail with courts, for the simple reason that the parties have so contracted; and in the absence of fraud or mistake both must live up to their contracts or take the consequences. We entertain no doubt as to the meaning of this contract. On the 16th of February, 1877, a semi-annual payment of a premium became due from the plaintiff, which he was obliged to pay in order to keep his policy alive, or he could have made default in payment and demanded his paid up policy for the proper amount. He had thirty days from the 16th of February in which to pay the premium due that day or to make his demand for a paid up policy. He waited until the 14th of March before doing anything, and he went to the office of the defendant in New York to ask a favor, i. e.: the postponement of the cash payment for a short time.

This favor the Company granted, but only upon one condition which was put in writing and assented to and signed by the plaintiff. He thereby consented and agreed that if he failed to pay this note at maturity he should thereby among other things immediately forfeit all claims to further insurance.

The written receipt is to be read in connection with this note, and the whole transaction then appears to be and it was simply this: the Company asknowledged the receipt of the February premium and continued the policy in force to August 16, provided the note which was given instead of cash in payment of the premium was paid at maturity. If not, then the Company had the right to immediately forfeit the policy and all claims to further insurance, which right of forfeiture includes the very claim in suit.

When the first note became due it was renewed by the execution of another upon the same terms and conditions, due August 14, and the first note was then surrendered. By failing to pay this last note when due, the forfeiture provided for therein immediately attached, and the plaintiff thereby lost the right which he would otherwise have had to further insurance according to the tenor of his policy, but which he had agreed to give up on condition of obtaining an extension of the time in which to pay his premium, and by failing to pay it at the end of that time.

It is argued that taking the first note had the effect of designating a new period from which the default in payment of the premium should afterwards be measured, and that as the premium only became due under the final arrangement on the 16th of August, 1877, the plaintiff, by the policy, had the right to a paid up policy within thirty days after that time. This reasoning wholly ignores the condition contained in the note, and renders the language thereof meaningless. The note not only extended the time of payment of the premium, but it distinctly stated, not that failure to pay at maturity should be treated as a default, which perhaps might give the thirty days thereafter in which to surrender the policy and demand a paid up one, but the language used was entirely explicit and free from doubt, making an unambiguous agreement to absolutely and immediately forfeit all right to further insurance if the note were not paid at maturity.

To that extent it was an alteration of the terms of the policy giving thirty days after a default in which to surrender and make a demand; and instead thereof it plainly provided for a total and immediate forfeiture, if at maturity the note were not paid, If language as plain and unambiguous as this is not only to be twisted out of its natural meaning but is to be wholly ignored by courts of justice, it will be useless in the future for companies to make any effort to bind policy holders to perform their contracts. The use of language is to express ideas; and writing is resorted to in order to furnish conclusive proof of what language was used. Being certain of the language used, and the case being free from fraud or mistake, if such language is plain and susceptible of but one meaning, that meaning, even in cases of contracts regarding life insurance, must control, although a forfeiture should be the result.

Punctuality in the payment of premiums in the case of a life insurance policy is of the very essence of the contract; and when payment is not made at the time the company has the right to forfeit if such were the contract. Atty-Gen. v. North Am. Life Ins. 82 N. Y. 172–189; People v. Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co. 4 Cent. Rep. 783, 103 N. Y. 480; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Statham, 93 U. S. 24 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 789).

Here the plaintiff failed to pay his premium on the 16th of February, and was accorded the favor of a postponement until the maturity of the first note in June, and then on its failure the Company legally exercised its right of forfeiture. No stress is laid, and upon the evidence none can be laid, upon any alleged promise to renew or extend the payment of the second note. By plaintiff's own evidence there was no such promise.

The judgment must be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide event.

1. Prior to the passage of the Act to secure the payment of laborers, etc., and persons furnishing materials toward the performing of any public work in the cities of the State of New York, chapter 315, Laws of 1878, there was no law by which any lien could attach upon public buildings or upon the moneys due from a city to the contractor who did any work thereon.
2. The object of this Act is to give security to those who furnished supplies or did work for the contractor on public works in cities.
3. A contract between a person and the trustees of public schools in a ward of the City of New York, to do the mason work on a building to be erected for school purposes in such ward on a lot belonging to the city, is one made with said city, within the meaning of said Act.
4. Individuals who furnished materials to such contractor to enable him to complete such contract, which materials went into the construction of said schoolhouse, are entitled to the benefit of said Act and to the lien therein provided on moneys in the city treasury, due or to grow due under the contract.
5. The title of an Act may be regarded for the purpose of arriving at the real meaning of the Legislature.
6. It is not necessary that such school trustees should be a formal part of the city government, in order to act substantially and for the purpose of this Act as the agents of the city legally appointed, and as such executing such contract on behalf of the city.
7. The board of education was the department or bureau having charge of the work, and the comptroller of the city was the financial officer thereof; and a filing of a notice of the lien with the clerk of the board and with the comptroller was a fulfillment of the provisions of the second section of the Act.

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas of New York City, affirming a judgment entered upon report of a referee in favor of plaintiff, lienor, and such of the defendants as were also lienors, in an action to enforce a lien on certain moneys appropriated for the erection of a school building. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. David J. Dean, for appellants:

That the board of education and school trustees constitute an agency for the administration of public duty not pertaining to the corporate functions of the City, but administered in behalf of the people of the State; and that the board is therefore independent, capable of making its own contracts, liable to be called upon to respond to the liabilities which it incurs, has been repeatedly adjudged.

Ham v. Mayor, 70 N.Y. 459; Miller v. Mayor, 3 Hun, 35; Treadwell v. Mayor, 1 Daly 123; Gildersleeve v. Board of Education, 17 Abb. 201; Bell v. Vanderbilt, 67 How. Pr. 332.

It is, therefore, plain that when the notices in question were filed in 1880, they were void of effect, and the claimants acquired no lien thereunder, because the contract in question was not made with "an incorporated city."

The Amendment of 1881, incorporated into the Act of 1878, has no retroactive effect, but speaks only from the time of its enactment, and has no effect upon rights or remedies accruing prior to that time.

Ely v. Holton, 15 N.Y. 595; People v. Carnal, 6 N.Y. 463; Benton v. Wickwire, 54 N. Y. 226.

The notices filed in 1880 are insufficient to fulfill the requirements of the statute. It is required thereby that such notices shall be filed with a department or bureau of the city government. The board of education is not a department or bureau of the city government.

Ham v. Mayor, 70 N. Y. 459; Dannat v. Mayor, 66 N.Y. 585.

It is true, as argued by the respondent, that if the board of education be not the head of a department or a bureau, within the meaning of this Act, there is no head of department or bureau with whom the notice may be filed, and that the claimants must, therefore, by reason of the defect of the statute, fail to acquire a lien. This argument is, however, no answer to the claim of the appellant: that the respondent may not acquire a lien by the filing of a notice with the board of education. "It is not the office of the court to supply the defects of the law, or amend it by construction, or supply its functions."

McCluskey v. Cromwell, 11 N.Y. 593; Benton v. Wickwire, 54 N. Y. 226; Roberts v. Fowler, 3 E. D. Smith, 632; Mushlitt v. Silverman, 50 N.Y. 360.

The requisition of the board of education in the contractor's favor created a claim against the treasurer which could be enforced by mandamus or by action.

People v. Comptroller, 77 N. Y. 45; Dannat v. Mayor, 66 N.Y. 585.

The City paid the money before the passage of the Act which gave the appellants a right to a lien; and the City thus acquired a right to be free from any other claim or demand in respect thereto. The amendatory Act of 1881 will not be construed to devest the City of such right.

Dash v. VanKleeck, 7 Johns. 477; Jackson v. Van Zandt, 12 Johns. 169; Palmer v. Conly, 4 Denio, 374; Dwarris, Statutes, 677.

Mr. Joseph Fettretch, for respondent.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought against the defendants, the Mayor et al., to foreclose a lien upon certain moneys alleged to be in the hands of the comptroller of the City of New York, for the purpose of paying the amount due on a contract between the defendant Vanderbilt and the defendants Surland and others who were trustees of public schools in the twelfth ward of the City of New York, whereby Vanderbilt was to do the mason work on a building to be erected for school purposes in such ward. The other defendants were lienors who filed their claims upon the same moneys.

The plaintiff and the other lienors were individuals who furnished the materials to Vanderbilt to enable him to complete his contract above referred to, and such materials went into the construction of the school house.

Upon the view taken by us in this case the only question in it arises upon the construction of the Act (chap. 315, Laws of 1878) entitled "An Act to Secure the Payment of Laborers, Mechanics, Merchants, Traders and Persons Furnishing Material Towards the Performing of any Public Work in the Cities of the State of New York."

It is conceded that if that Act applies to this case the jugdment herein is right.

Prior to its passage,there was no law by which any lien could attach upon public buildings or upon the moneys due from a city to the contractor who did any work thereon. The courts had held that such great inconvenience might result from the sale of public buildings to satisfy a lien that express and clear provisions of the statute must be shown to permit it. Darlington v. Mayor,31 N.Y. 164; Poillon v. Mayor, 47 N. Y. 666; Leonard v. Brooklyn, 71 N. Y. 498.

To give some security to those who furnished supplies or did work for the contractor on public works in cities this Act was passed.

The counsel for the City challenges this contract as not being made with an incorporated city, as required by the provisions of the Act; for he says that the school trustees who signed it were part of the educational system of the State, and did not represent the City, or act in its behalf; and he cites the well known cases of Dannat v. Mayor, 66 N.Y. 585, and Ham v. Mayor, 70 N.Y. 459, and several others of like nature, to prove the correctness of his position.

The Dannat Case was where the contractor was to do the carpenter work on a school house in New York, bought lumber of plaintiff and gave him an order on the board of public instruction for his payment when the next installment under his contract should become due, and the order was presented to and left with the board. After the next installment became due the plaintiff presented his claim to the comptroller, and demanded its adjustment by him, which he neglected to make, and he also refused to pay the amount of the order.

This court held that the system of credits and payments of accounts provided by the Act of 1873, reorganizing the government of New York applied to all payments from the city treasurer, including payments from school moneys upon contracts of the board of education, and that the Act of 1851, relating to the common schools of the City, remained in force.

Thus to obtain payment upon a contract with the board of education it was necessary for the board to give its draft on the chamberlain, as prescribed in the Act of 1851; and this was to be delivered by the payee to the finance department as its voucher, and the other requisites of the Act of 1873 were to be complied with before the payment could be secured. This was not done in that case, and consequently the plaintiff was not successful in his action. The case is cited to show the separate and independent character of the board of education, and that it drew its own drafts and had its own system outside of the city government.

The Ham Case was that of an action brought against the City to recover damages for injuries alleged by the plaintiff to have been sustained by him to his property in a certain house because of the alleged negligent acts of some of the employees of the department of public instruction. The liability was sought to be placed upon the doctrine of respondeat superior, which rests upon the right of the employer to select his servants and to discharge them, and while in his service to direct and control them. All this was held to be lacking in that case, and that the department of public instruction, although formally constituted a part of the city government by the law as it stood in 1871 (subsequently, and in 1873, altered), yet it was charged with the performance of duties, not local or corporate, but relating and belonging to an administrative branch of the State Government, and that such board had exclusive authority as to the employment and control of subordinates and servants.

Both the cases may and should stand in full force; and still it can be held that this contract was made with an incorporated city, within the meaning of this Act of 1878.

In the first place there can be no reason given for intentionally excluding such a contract from the previsions of the Act.

The moneys to pay for services or materials, performed or furnished under all contracts of that nature, are raised by the taxation machinery of the City, and are paid into the city treasury, to be paid out in the same way as other city moneys, and by the same city comptroller. The lot upon which the building was to be erected was owned by the City and the building would be its property, but under the control, for school purposes, of the board of education. Such a contract is, therefore, within every reason that operates in that of a technical and formal contract with the City by its corporate title. Did the Legislature by the use of the words in the first section of the Act, " any contract made between any person or persons and any incorporated city in the State of New York," mean to include only such technical contracts as above referred to, or did it not also mean to include in its beneficent provisions a contract made by somebody acting under authority of law, yet in fact and substance for the City, in regard to a public work the title to which was in an incorporated city, and was to be paid for by the moneys in its treasury, raised by taxation and disbursed by its own officers?

The exact and literal wording of an Act may sometimes be rejected if, upon a survey of the whole Act and the purpose to be accomplished or the wrong to be remedied, it is plain that such exact or literal rendering of the words would not carry out the legislative intent. And the title of an Act may be regarded also for the same purpose of arriving at the real meaning of the Legislature. Smith v. People, 47 N. Y. 330; People v. Davenport, 91 N. Y. 574.

By the title the purpose of this Act is evident and would include just such a case as is now before us. And while, if the legislative meaning in the words used by it in the body of the Act were plain and free from any ambiguity, those words would control the title, yet such is not the case here.

The section speaks of a contract between a person and an incorporated city. Can it be contended that a lawful agent of the city could not make a contract in its behalf, within the scope of his authority and within the meaning of this section, although not in so many words using the corporate title of the city in the contract? And cannot an individual or even a body corporate be an agent of the City under this Act and to carry out its object, and yet for all other purposes be a separate and distinct entity?

The question is, What is a contract between one person and an incorporated city, within the meaning of this Act?

Is the answer so absolutely free from doubt as to preclude the reference to the title or the manifest purpose of the Act, and the condition of the subject before its passage? It is thought not.

It is seen that before its passage persons in the situation of the plaintiff had no lien upon buildings or moneys due or to grow due under the contract. The lien existed in all cases except in regard to public works. The reason for including such a contract as this is plainly just as strong as if the trustees of the school board had been a formal part of the city government. We think it was not necessary that they should be such formal part in order to act, substantially and for the purpose of this Act, as the agents of the city, legally appointed, and as such executing this contract on behalf of the City.

It is not of course very important; but it appears that this was the capacity in which the trustees of the school district themselves thought they were acting, for in the contract is this provision: "This contract shall inure to the benefit of the board of education, and of the Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New York, as well as the parties of the first part, either of whom shall have a right of action under the same, to maintain and prosecute any interest, right or power hereby reserved to or vested in the parties of the first part."

The City has recognized the agency of the school trustees, by payments made under the contract to the contractor, before the filing of any liens.

It is further urged, in amplification of the argument upon the part of the City, that there was in this case no head of a city department or bureau in which to file a notice of claim under the second section of the Act in question, because the board of education or the trustees of public schools of the twelfth ward formed no such department or bureau of the city government within the cases above cited. But having so construed the first section of the Act as to include a case of this kind, and holding that a contract such as this was a contract substantially and for the purpose of the Act, with an incorporated city, there is no difficulty in holding that for the same purpose the board of education was the department or bureau having charge of the work, and the comptroller of the City was the financial officer thereof, and that a filing of the notice of lien with the clerk of the board and with the comptroller was a fulfillment of the provision of that section of the Act.

Coming to these conclusions, it becomes unnecessary to consider the effect of the passage of the Act of 1881 or the giving of the bond of indemnity to the comptroller.

The judgment of the Common Pleas should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

MAYOR, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City OF NEW YORK, Respt.,
v.
Nathaniel SANDS, Appt.

1. Statutes containing grants of power should be so construed as to include the authority to do all things necessary to make the object of the grant effectual and to enable the donee of the power to accomplish the expressed purpose of the Act.
2. As incident to the duties imposed upon the comptroller of the City of New York by chapter 323 of Laws of 1871, in reference to the creation and issuing of "consolidated stock of the County of New York," he was impliedly authorized to contract with defendant for assistance in negotiating the loan and placing bonds on terms advantageous to the county, and was authorized to pay for such services a reasonable commission out of the premium realized on the bonds.
3. Hence, defendant having received by indorsement from the comptroller a check received by the comptroller in payment of a part of the premium on county bonds issued under said Act and negotiated by defendant, in payment of his services, is not liable to the county for the amount of such check, on the ground that such payment by the comptroller was in violation of chapter 590, Laws of 1857, and chapter 190, Laws of 1870, which require that all moneys drawn from the treasury by authority of the board of supervisors should be upon certain prescribed vouchers. These provisions were not applicable to the case.
4. The fact that defendant was, at the time of performing said service in placing the county loan, a tax commissioner of the City, did not bring him within the provision of section 115 of chapter 137 of Laws of 1870, prohibiting city officers from being interested in any contract or business the consideration for which was to be paid from the city treasury. It was competent for a city officer to render services to the county, and to charge and receive compensation therefor.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit on a verdict directed for plaintiff in an action to recover the value of a certain check alleged to have been misappropriated by a public officer and delivered to defendant. Reversed.

Reported below, 39 Hun, 519.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Messrs. Luther R. Marsh and Aaron J. Vanderpoel, for appellant:

The transaction complained of was a county transaction. The stock negotiated by Sands for sale was county stock. The money which Sands received for his successful negotiation, the $75,000, was for services rendered to the county. This is evidenced by the receipt given for such money from Belmont & Co.

The City of New York and the County of New York were, at that time, 1871, distinct and independent corporations in fact as well as in name.

People v. Ingersoll, 58 N. Y. 1, 25.

In 1874 the Consolidation Act was passed. Chap. 904 of the Laws of 1874.

If the two were one before, there was no necessity for the Act of union.

The defendant was not an officer of the County of New York, and had the same right to deal with it as any private citizen. The office the defendant held, "Commissioner of Taxes and Assessments for the City and County of New York," was a city and not a county office.

Act 1867, 1 Sess. Laws, 1867, p. 981; People v. Raymond, 37 N. Y. 428, 429; People v. Dunlap, 66 N. Y. 162, 168.

The defendant, then, being a city officer, and not a county one, was under no obligation to the county, either statutory or otherwise.

As an officer of the city he owed no duty to the county. He was as much at liberty to engage to render services to the County of New York for a compensation to be paid by it, as to any county of the State.

The subsequent merger of the county into the City, or vice versa, cannot retroact upon a transaction occurring three years before the merger.

Unless there is a statute prohibition, the defendant, even as a city officer, could have entered into a valid compact to render services to the City even, outside of the special duties of his office of tax commissioner. There is nothing wrong in such an agreement, unless it is made so by statute—and then it is merely a wrong prohibited, and a wrong because prohibited, and not a wrong in itself.

Mayor v. Muzzy, 33 Mich. 61; Jackson v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. 2 Thomp. & C. 653; affd. 58 N. Y. 623; McDonald v. Mayor, 32 Hun. 89; McAdam v. Mayor, 36 Hun, 340.

Certain statutes were relied on at the trial, as prohibiting the defendant from receiving the money paid him.

Section 110 of the city charter of 1870 (Sess. Laws, 1870, p. 393) does not apply for several reasons. 1. It is obvious that this section only prohibits any payment, in addition to the salary, for any services pertaining to the office. 2. The money paid to the defendant did not come from the "corporation or city treasury." It came from the County of New York.

Section 115 of the city charter has no application for the same reason.

Section 2 of chapter 57, Laws of 1843, is also inapplicable: 1. A city officer is not prevented by the mere fact of being a city officer from being interested in a contract made by him with a county, or other city or the State. 2. Here defendant had no interest in the purchase or in the sale. He had a mere compensation for service, and this service was not made by him in the discharge of his official duty. The duties of tax commissioner of the City, and the service of negotiating the sale of county bonds, were entirely distinct and unconnected.

Section 5 of chapter 583, Laws of 1872 does not apply: 1. The defendant is not seeking to hold the county liable for any indebtedness. The transaction was one in præsenti. The service was rendered and the payment made at the same time. 2. The presumption of law is that all acts of a public officer are legally done, until the contrary is proved.

Sistare v. Best, 88 N. Y. 534.

The comptroller had power, in his discretion, to make the contract with the defendant for the negotiation of the bonds: 1. Such power was conferred on him by the Act itself, for it was a necessary incident to carrying out the purposes of the Act. 2. The board of apportionment gave the comptroller this power.

On the question as to the discretion conferred upon a public officer, see People v. Van Nort, 64 Barb. 205; People v. Green, 2 Thomp. & C. 62; Baird v. Mayor, 96 N. Y. 570, 580.

The alleged cause of action set out in the complaint is not proved; nor is there any evidence upon it.

It is an action for fraud and deceit. That is the gist of the action; no other ground is alleged, nor, indeed, is any fact alleged, which, if true, would show a fraud. It is the allegation of a mere conclusion.

The plaintiff cannot abandon the fraud, and recover as on a contract for money had and received.

Ransom v. Wetmore, 39 Barb. 104; Whitcomb v. Hungerford, 42 Barb. 177; Saltus v. Genin, 3 Bosw. 250; Place v. Minster, 65 N. Y. 89, 102.

Mr. Charles P. Miller, for respondent:

Irrespective of the validity or invalidity of the agreement between Connolly and the defendant, the payment of the check to the defendant was illegal and void, and he obtained no title to it by such payment. Proof establishing the illegal payment justified the allegations of fraud in the complaint.

Y. 620; Supervisors of Richmond Co. v. Van Clief, 1 Hun, 454; People v. Fields, 58 N. Y. 504, 505.

This check for $75,000, when received by the comptroller in payment for county stock became the property of the county. The comptroller's duty was to deposit the check forthwith in the treasury, according to law, from which it could be taken only by authority of the board of supervisors acting in conformity with the statute.

People v. Ingersoll, 58 N. Y. 27.

The defendant, irrespective of his position as a public officer, is chargeable with knowledge of the illegality of the comptroller's conduct.

McDonald v. Mayor, 68 N. Y. 23; Supervisors of Richmond Co. v. Ellis and Supervisors of Richmond Co. v. Van Clief, supra.

The statements in the complaint that the money was paid and received willfully and corruptly, with intent to cheat and defraud, can be disregarded, and the action maintained as an action for moneys unlawfully paid and received, or as an action for wrongful conversion.

People v. Fields, 58 N. Y. 504, 505.

The pretended agreement between the defendant and Connolly was illegal and void by statutes prohibiting such contracts.

The defendant admits that he was a tax commissioner. He was therefere a city officer.

People v. Raymond, 37 N. Y. 428.

By sections 110, 115 of the Charter of 1870, Laws 1870, chap. 137, the defendant was prohibited from receiving, directly or indirectly, from the city treasury any compensation for any services other than those which he performed as a commissioner of taxes, no matter how great an advantage the City might derive from such other services.

Roosevelt v. Draper, 23 N. Y. 318; Mullaly v. Mayor, 3 Hun, 661; S. C. affirmed in 62 N. Y. 636; McAdam v. Mayor, 36 Hun, 340.

There is yet another statute prohibiting the alleged contract.

1 R. S. 7th ed. p. 858. See Smith v. Albany, 61 N. Y. 444.

The resolution of the board of apportionment does not validate the comptroller's employment of the defendant.

The powers of the board of apportionment were fixed by law. It had no authority to validate an invalid contract of employment.

Laws 1870, chap. 137, § 101, as amended by Laws 1871, chap. 574, § 8.

The pretended contract between the defendant and Connolly was illegal and void at common law. Sands was a public officer, an agent of the people, toward whom he stood in the position of a trustee. No rule is better settled than that which forbids a trustee to make any profit out of his trusteeship, other than what he is expressly allowed by law.

Smith v. Albany, 61 N. Y. 444; Mullaly v. Mayor, 3 Hun, 661; Collier v. Munn, 41 N. Y. 143.

The contract being illegal and void, Sand's receipt of the $75,000 was illegal and a fraud upon the county, and the plaintiff has a right to recover it.

The defendant, having moved for a nonsuit and made no request to go to the jury, cannot now claim that there were any questions of fact to be passed upon by the jury.

Bridge v. Pierson, 66 Barb. 514; Frantz v. Ireland, 66 Barb. 386; Ormes v. Dauchy, 82 N. Y. 443; Dillon v. Cockcroft, 90 N. Y. 649.

If, therefore, the evidence would have warranted a verdict for the plaintiff, the direction was proper.

McCall v. Sun Mutual Ins. Co. 66 N. Y. 506, 517.

The plaintiff was entitled to interest, and the defendant's exception to the allowance of interest was not well taken.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced about the year 1873, in the name of the Board of Supervisors of the County of New York to recover from the defendant the value of a certain check alleged to have been misappropriated by the Comptroller of New York and delivered to the defendant.

It was further alleged in the complaint that one Connolly was comptroller and the defendant commissioner of taxes for said city, and that Connolly, having received the check in question for the use and benefit of the county, willfully and corruptly, and with intent to cheat and defraud the county, indorsed and transferred it to the defendant, who wrongfully converted it to his own use, with like intent and purpose, and that after demand duly made upon said defendant for the same he neglected and refused to repay the moneys received thereon to the plaintiff.

The defendant, answering, denied all of the allegations of the complaint except those specifically admitted, and after admitting the official character of himself and Connolly and the receipt of the check, alleged that the same was duly indorsed and delivered to him by Connolly, in payment for services rendered to Connolly, as comptroller, in effecting a loan of money for the City and County of New York under a contract previously made between them.

The complaint did not allege any want of power in Connolly to make such contract, or to transfer the check, or any illegality in its delivery to defendant except such as might be inferred from the charge that it was corruptly and fraudulently done.

After the passage of chapter 904, of the Laws of 1874, consolidating the government of the City and County of New York, the Mayor and Commonalty of the City were substituted as plaintiff in the place of the board of supervisors.

On the trial a verdict was directed by the trial court for the plaintiff; but the grounds of the decision do not appear in the record. The defendant duly excepted to the ruling of the court. The general term affirmed the judgment, upon the ground that the act of the comptroller, in paying out the check, was contrary to the provisions of chapter 590 of the Laws of 1857, and chapter 190, of the Laws of 1870, which required that all moneys drawn from the treasury by authority of the board of supervisors should be upon vouchers, examined and allowed by the auditor and approved by the comptroller, and no money should be drawn therefrom except on a warrant drawn by the comptroller, countersigned by the Mayor and clerk of the board.

The court, assuming that the contract with Connolly was a lawful one, and that upon the performance of the services he was entitled to compensation, held that his claim was then nothing more or less than a claim against the county which should be ascertained, adjusted and paid in the mode required by law, and that the receipt and use of the check by defendant, with knowledge of its illegal use by Connolly, was a fraudulent misappropriation of the moneys represented by it which subjected him to an action to recover the same as for a fraudulent conversion thereof.

There was no attempt upon the trial to show any actual fraud intended, either by Connolly or the defendant; but the case was rested altogether upon a fraud inferable from the alleged illegality of the transaction. The undisputed evidence showed that the draft was paid to the defendant by Connolly in good faith, in satisfaction of a claim held by him against Connolly, as comptroller, for services rendered in effecting a loan of money for the county upon its bonds, to the amount of $15,000,000. The proof was undisputed that the defendant negotiated the loan, and that it was a favorable one; that the commission charged was fair and reasonable, and that the defendant was possessed of sufficient financial ability and influence to make his assistance valuable and enable him to obtain the loan upon terms advantageous to the county.

It was further shown that the services were rendered in pursuance of a contract previously made with the comptroller, to the effect that he should have one half of 1 per cent for effecting such loan, provided it was made upon favorable terms and without other expense to the county. The transaction between Connolly and the defendant sprang out of the effort of the former to execute the power conferred, and duty imposed upon him by chapter 323, of the Laws of 1871, which authorized and empowered the Comptroller of New York to create a public fund or stock, to be denominated "consolidated stock of the County of New York," and by which any holder of the present stock of the County of New York, or bonds of the said County of New York, was authorized to exchange the same for said consolidated stock, upon such terms and conditions as should be determined and offered by said comptroller. Such stock was also authorized to be issued to pay off and cancel any bonds or stock of said county falling due in the year 1871, and also to meet the requisitions on the County of New York by the State for the payment of the bounty debt in that year. Such stock was to be in the form designated by the comptroller, and signed by the comptroller and Mayor of the City and sealed with the seal of the board of supervisors of the county, and attested by the clerk of said board. All stock of the County of New York thereafter issued was to be known as "consolidated stock of the County of New York" and issued under the authority of that Act. In pursuance of the authority thus conferred the comptroller issued the bonds in question and procured them, through the assistance of the defendant, to be negotiated with A. Belmont & Co., at a premium of 4½ per cent.

No question is made as to the legality of this issue, or but that the whole proceeds of the bonds, including premiums, excepting the check in question, were applied to the purposes of the county or paid over to its treasurer by the comptroller.

It would be difficult to conceive of a grant of power conferred in broader or more comprehensive language, and which could be less restricted by conditions and limitations upon an agent's authority. No limit is imposed upon the amount of bonds to be issued, except that implied from the use to which they were to be devoted in the retirement and payment of existing obligations of the county; and no restriction as to the terms upon which they were to be disposed of, or the amount of the expenses to be incurred in their preparation, negotiation and transfer is found in the Act. The comptroller was broadly charged with the duty of creating a public fund or stock to be denominated "Consolidated stock of the County of New York," and whatever power was necessary to enable him to perform this duty was necessarily conferred upon him by the Act. Whether this was a wise or prudent grant of power, or whether in the careful exercise of it the comptroller was enabled to commit abuses or frauds upon the people of the county with impunity is not a subject for our consideration. We find the law upon the statute book, and it is subject to the same rules of construction as other statutes thus appearing. Citizens of the State, having occasion to deal with the comptroller in reference to the subject matter of the Act, had the right to rely upon its provisions and the authority apparently conferred upon him to bind the fund or principals represented by him.

It is obvious, from the language of the Act as well as the evidence in the case, that heavy liabilities of the county were becoming payable in the immediate future, and that large amounts would be required to meet its obligations, and that it was considered desirable not only to raise the money required without delay, but also that all the county's outstanding indebtedness should be funded at the same time and put upon a uniform basis as to the time of its redemption and its rate of interest.

The occasion was exceptional and extraordinary, and large and apparently almost unlimited power was therefore given to the comptroller to accomplish this object. Whenever money was required to satisfy the indebtedness of the county he was not only authorized but was charged with the duty of providing it by a sale of the bonds of the county; and whenever an exchange of the consolidated stock could be effected for the outstanding stock or bonds of the county, he was authorized to do it upon such terms and conditions as should be determined by himself. It was contemplated that enormous sums of money should pass into his hands; and its application and security were entrusted wholly to the judgment, discretion and integrity of the comptroller. In the performance of the duties cast upon him he was made independent of all other county authority or supervision, and was broadly charged with the responsibility of providing funds not only to meet the current and maturing debt of the county, but to fund all of its outstanding obligations. The moneys to be raised on the bonds, whether in premiums or principal, were undoubtedly the property of the county; and the comptroller's duty required him, except so far as they might be required for the legitimate purposes of the Act, to account to the treasurer of the county for the proceeds.

It is a matter of public history, of which courts will take judicial notice, that in the sale of bonds and negotiation for loans in behalf of States, municipalities and governments, the services of their own fiscal agents are usually, if not invariably, supplemented by the employment of bankers, brokers and other financial agencies, to aid in raising moneys for such public purposes. During the late war the Federal Government raised large sums by the issue and sale of treasury notes and bonds, which it would have been practically difficult if not impossible to do upon favorable terms but for the assistance rendered by extraneous financial agencies employed and paid by the secretary of the treasury. Most if not all of the Acts authorizing such loans, contemplated such services and authorized the secretary to pay for them, sometimes at a fixed rate, sometimes at rates not exceeding a certain limit, and often according to his judgment and discretion. Appropriations were sometimes but not always made in the Acts for the payment of these expenses. See 12 U. S. Stat. at L. p. 129, chap. 5, Laws 1861; p. 345, chap. 33, Laws 1862; p. 709, chap. 73, Laws 1863; vol. 15, p. 13, chap. 13, Laws 1864; p. 465, chap. 177, Laws 1865.

It is a matter of common knowledge that such loans in all countries of the world are usually negotiated through agencies outside of the regular financial authorities of the government making the loans. Whether their employment in the case in hand was wise and prudent, or perhaps even indispensable to the accomplishment of the object intended by the statute, cannot be determined as a question of law, for the statute gave the comptroller power to determine that question in his own discretion, subject only to the obligation to do so honestly and in good faith.

Under these circumstances the question is presented as to what were the duties of the comptroller and the extent of his power in carrying out the law.

It is a well established principle that statutes containing grants of power shall be construed so as to include the authority to do all things necessary to make the object of the grant effectual, and to enable the donee of the power to accomplish the expressed purpose of the Act.

Domat expresses the idea as follows: "All laws necessarily bear with them all the powers or incidents necessary to carry out their intention." Sedg. Stat. Law, p. 245.

Sedgwick says: "When a statute commands an act to be done it authorizes all that is necessary for its performance." Sedgwick, 228. Potter's Dwarris states the rule to be "In statutes incidents are always supplied by intendment; in other words, whenever a power is given by a statute, everything to the making of it effectual is given by implication; for the maxim is 'Quando lex aliquid concedit, concedere videtur et id per quod devenitur ad illud.'"

The rule stated has been frequently referred to and applied in the reports of this State. It was stated by Judge Ruggles in Stief v. Hart, 1 N. Y. 23, as follows: "Whenever the law requires an act to be done it authorizes the agent to do what is necessary to accomplish it in the mode pointed out for its performance." In this case power in the sheriff to take goods out of the hands of a pledgee, for the purpose of a sale on execution, was implied from the authority given him to levy upon and sell the interest of the pledgeor in such goods.

In People v. Hicks, 15 Barb. 160, it was held that a statute giving power to a magistrate to examine such witnesses as might be produced before him authorized him to issue subpenas for such witnesses and to compel their attendance by the usual process of the court. Judge Edwards, giving the opinion of the court, says: "In an anonymous case which is reported by Lord Coke (12 Coke, Rep. 130), he says that on a motion made by him before the Justices of the King's Bench, it was unanimously resolved 'that when the statute gave power to justices of the peace to require any person or persons to take the oath the law impliedly gave them power to make a warrant to have the body before them.'" Judge Roosevelt also says "That the grant of an express power carries with it, by necessary implication, every other power necessary and proper to the execution of the power expressly granted." 1 Kent, Com. 404.

The existence of the power in question is so indisputable that it is unnecessary to pursue the discussion of the question further; and it is material only upon this point to add a few observations in relation to the necessity of paying the necessary expenses of the loan to enable the comptroller to carry out the provisions of the law. Certainly the necessity of raising the money provided for by the Act to accomplish its purposes cannot be denied. The members of the Legislature were the sole judges of this necessity; and having themselves determined that question it was the duty of the comptroller to execute the mandate of the law. Whatever he judged it necessary in good faith to do in carrying out its purpose it was lawful for him to do, provided he did not transgress any positive provision of law or violate the purpose or spirit of the Act. The statute conferred upon him large discretionary powers in carrying out its provisions; and he could not be made liable for any errors of judgment or abuse of his powers, unless they were fraudulently or illegally performed.

The necessity of incurring some expenses in the negotiation of the loan and placing the bonds authorized to be issued is, in view of the universal practice in such cases, too plain to admit of dispute; and it is obvious that unless the comptroller was vested with power to pay them the whole purpose of the Act might be defeated at its outset.

The comptroller had no general authority to contract a debt for such purpose on behalf of the county, and no special authority except such as is inferable from the Act in question. It is also plain that if he could not obtain the assistance required or the services necessary by a pledge of the credit of the county, subjecting the financial agent to the risk of an unfavorable consideration of his claims by the board of supervisors or other auditing officers of the county, he would be obliged to adopt other means to accomplish the object intended. Can it be reasonably said that the power to pay expenses from the fund raised was any more detrimental to the interests of the county than the power to pledge its credit? If the possession of one power is to be inferred from the Act, is there not equal reason to say that if its exercise is required for the purposes of the law, the other power was equally inferable? They both rest upon the same principle and are governed by the same rule; and one power is as equally open to abuse as the other.

The comptroller was directed to create a public fund, and his power was commensurate with the requirements of the task imposed upon him. It is unreasonable to say that in imposing the duty of raising the money in question upon him the Legislature intended to hamper and restrict his performance of it by denying to him the means necessary to perform it, or that its scheme was subject to be defeated by the neglect or refusal of the county officers to provide means to execute its provisions. The Act contains no reference to the intervention or co-operation of any county officers in its execution; and it is repugnant to establish principles of construction to import into its provisions requirements of prior enactments not pertinent thereto and which would be plainly destructive of its purposes.

Such was the view taken of the Act by the board of apportionment organized under chapter 583, Laws 1871, as expressed in resolutions adopted May 9, 1871. Such board, in authorizing an issue of about $9,000,000 of the consolidated stock of the county under said Act, to meet a portion of its indebtedness, provided that "The expenses incurred in providing for the issue of said stock should be paid out of the premiums received for the same."

And in the same Act, in providing for a board of apportionment, whose general authority over the finances of the county was intended to supersede that of the board of supervisors, it expressly exempted the comptroller, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him by chapter 323 of the Act of 1871, from the authority and control of the board of apportionment, and from the prohibition therein contained against the incurring of any liability by any officers of the County of New York exceeding the appropriation made for such purposes. Laws 1871, sec. 10, chap. 585.

The statutes referred to in the opinion of the general term seem to us to have no application to the subject. They provide among other things that no moneys shall be drawn from the treasury except upon previous applications for that purpose, and in terms apply only to moneys already placed in the treasury of the county and disbursable in the regular and customary administration of its affairs upon the authority of the board of supervisors. The check in question never reached the treasury of the county; and, although it may have been the property of the county, it was still in the hands of Connolly, subject to the purposes of the Act by which he acquired its possession. He was by such Act made the agent of the county, with power to disburse so much of its funds in his hands as was necessary to carry out the purpose of the law by which he was appointed.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the courts below erred in holding that the comptroller had no authority to pay out the check; and we are further of the opinion that no cause of action was proved against the defendant. We think that no right of action exists against the defendant in respect to this transaction, except upon proof of collusion between him and Connolly to defraud the county of the money represented by the check.

We deem it unnecessary to refer at length to a contemporaneous Act, similar in form to the one under discussion, authorizing the comptroller to create a public fund or stock, to be denominated "Consolidated stock of the City of New York," as its introduction would tend only to complicate the questions discussed. The complaint alleges that the check was the property of the county; and the proof tends to establish that it was received in payment of a part of the premium due upon a loan to the county. The City could not, therefore, have had any legal interest in its disposition or recovery.

It is claimed by the respondent that, inasmuch as the contract between Connolly and Sands provided for the payment of the same commission for negotiating city as well as county bonds, the defendant came under the provision of section 115 of chapter 137 of the Laws of 1870, prohibiting city officers from being directly or indirectly interested in any contract, work or business, or the sale of any article the expense, price or consideration of which is paid from the city treasury. The proof fails to show that Sands rendered any services to the City or made any claim against it in respect to this check. If the contract, so far as it provided for payment of services rendered the City, was void, we think it was divisible and could be enforced so far as it was authorized by law. The parties in fact did separate it, and no performance was attempted except in relation to the county loan.

We think it was competent for a city officer to render services to the county or any other employer outside of the City, and charge and receive a compensation for such services.

We have examined other objections made to the right of Sands to retain the compensation in question, arising out of the fact that he was a city officer, but think the authorities upon which they are based too obviously inapplicable to call for special discussion.

There is no evidence in the case upon which the plaintiff showed any right to recover; and it was, therefore, error for the trial court to direct a verdict in its favor.

The judgments of the courts below should, therefore, be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the result.

BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF KINGS COUNTY, Respt.

The Board of Supervisors, by resolution, fixed the salaries of the district attorney, his chief clerk and other subordinates, at certain sums, but thereafter, by resolution, determined to raise by taxation and included in the budget for the then current fiscal year a sum for such salaries less than the aggregate of the amounts fixed by the first resolution. Held, that this action authorized the incoming district attorney to make such arrangements with his subordinates in the way of scaling down their salaries as would bring the aggregate within the sum to be raised by taxation, and that a chief clerk appointed under such arrangement and who accepted payment at such reduced rate had, after the termination of his employment, no claim upon the county for the larger salary fixed by the first resolution.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings Special Term in favor of defendant on a return to an alternative writ of mandamus to compel the auditing and payment of a claim. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. James Troy, for appellant:

The salary of the chief clerk in the office of the District Attorney of Kings County was fixed by resolution of August 7, 1887, at $3,000 per annum, chapter 432, Laws 1875, and was not changed by any resolution of the Board of Supervisors as to the amount of taxation to be raised for any specific purpose.

The Supervisors voted and raised a gross sum to cover the aggregate expenses of the district attorney's office for a year, regardless of the salaries fixed by law, "an entire amount for the office," and the district attorney, equally regardless of the law relating to salaries, so arranged the same that he "used up" just the sum "limited" "the entire amount fixed for the office."

The salary of the relator having been fixed by law at $3,000 per annum and its payment by the county treasurer having been directed under authority of the Act of 1875, he was entitled to be paid that sum; and the acceptance by him of a reduced amount, especially as such reduced amount was all the county treasurer had to pay, did not in any way affect or impair his right to receive the whole.

People v. Board of Police, 75 N. Y. 38; People v. French, 91 N. Y. 265; Kehn v. State, 93 N. Y. 291; Riley v. Mayor, 96 N. Y. 339.

Mr. William G. Cooke, for respondent:

By accepting $1,500 per year the relator expressly waived all claim to any higher rate of compensation.

The cases cited by his counsel have no application. They simply decide that where a salary is regulated by statute a person agreeing with an officer to work for less does not waive his legal rate of pay; or where the law has imposed upon one officer the duty of employing persons to render service to the public and has vested in another the power to fix their compensation, the functions of the latter cannot be assumed by the former; and his action in that respect would be a nullity.

Riley v. Mayor, 96 N. Y. 339.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The findings of fact made by the trial judge establish that the relator was appointed by Isaac S. Catlin, District Attorney of Kings County, whose term of office began on the first of January, 1878, chief clerk in the office of such district attorney, from the first of January, 1878, at a salary of $1,500 per annum; that the relator served under such appointment from January 1, 1878, until August 1, 1881, during the whole of which period he received from the treasurer of the county salary at the rate aforesaid, in equal monthly payments.

On the 17th of January, 1884, the relator presented to the Board of Supervisors a claim for upwards of $14,000, being the difference between the sum which he had received for salary and a salary at the rate of $5,000 per annum, to which he claimed to be entitled by law for the period during which he had served. This claim was rejected by the Board of Supervisors, and thereupon the relator sued out an alternative writ of mandamus requiring the Supervisors to audit and pay him the sum claimed, with interest, or show cause, etc.

The Supervisors having made return to the writ, the issue thus joined was tried at special term by the court, a jury having been waived, and the court rendered judgment dismissing the writ, on the ground that the relator had never presented his bill or claim to the Auditor of the County of Kings and that such auditor had never passed upon the same.

On appeal by the relator to the general term, the judgment rendered at special term was affirmed, the court holding that, upon the merits, the relator's claim was unfounded. The particular point on which the judgment of the special term was placed was not passed upon in the opinion at general term, and, without intimating any question of its correctness, we refrain from discussing it or other points of form which might be raised, as we fully concur in the conclusion of the general term, which finally disposes of the litigation.

The ground of the relator's claim is that his salary as chief clerk in the district attorney's office, was fixed by law, and that consequently the district attorney who appointed him had no power to stipulate for a reduced compensation. He concedes that the claim made in the alternative writ, that his legal salary was $5,000 per annum, is erroneous, but contends that it was $3,000 per annum, and that he is entitled to the difference between that sum and $1,500 per annum at which rate he was appointed, and which he received.

It is not claimed that the relator's salary was fixed by any statute. It is conceded that the power to fix the compensation of the district attorney and his assistants, clerks and officers, was vested by statute in the Board of Supervisors. The claim of the relator is that his salary was fixed by a resolution of the Board of Supervisors of the County of Kings, adopted on the 7th of August, 1877 (before the election of Mr. Catlin as district attorney). That resolution fixed the salary of the district attorney to be elected, and of the first and second assistants, and the salary or pay of the chief and assistant clerks, and of the several officers attached to or attendant upon the office of the district attorney; the salary or pay of the chief clerk being fixed in this resolution at $3,000 per annum. But on the 8th of November, 1877, the Board of Supervisors, by resolution, determined to raise by taxation, and included in the budget for the then current fiscal year, for salaries of the district attorney and his assistants, clerks and officers, only the sum of $22,000, which was considerably less than the aggregate of the salaries or pay of those officers as fixed by the resolution of August 7, 1877.

Although the last mentioned resolution was not, in terms, repealed or amended, we think that the action of the Board on the 8th of November plainly indicated an intention on its part to reduce the salaries to be paid in the district attorney's office to an aggregate amount which would be within the sum provided for in the tax budget, and that it was within their power to do so, as they had full authority to regulate the salaries of the persons thereafter to be employed in that office, and that authority was thus impliedly given to the incoming district attorney to make such arrangements with the subordinates to be appointed by him, in the way of scaling down their salaries, as would bring the aggregate within the sum to be raised by taxation.

The district attorney appears to have acted on this understanding. He was not compelled by law to appoint a chief clerk; but he offered the position to the relator at a salary of $1,500, which was accepted, and upon entering upon his office of district attorney he sent to the county treasurer a list of all the assistants, clerks and officers appointed by him, with the salaries to be paid to each, which salaries were in the aggregate equal to the unexpended balance of the amount provided for in the tax budget of the Board of Supervisors. The relator accepted from the county treasurer and gave receipts for his salary at the rate of $1,500 per annum, in monthly payments, during the whole time of his service; and it was not until long after his employment had terminated, viz.: January 17, 1884, that he made his claim for additional compensation.

We think the claim is without merit, and that it does not fall within the principle of the cases in which a salary fixed by statute, and attached to a public office or employment, is sought to be reduced, either by the officer making the appointment or by the officer charged with the duty of paying the prescribed salary. Here the amount of the relator's salary was within the control of the Board of Supervisors, and it is fairly presumable that by the voluntary acceptance and retention by the relator of his appointment at the reduced salary fixed by the district attorney, the Board of Supervisors was led to omit adopting a formal resolution conforming to his action. He should not now be permitted to retract his agreement. In this respect the case of Hobbs v. Yonkers, 102 N. Y. 13, 2 Cent. Rep. 764 is in point.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas of the City and County of New York, dismissing the complaint on a second trial of an action to recover the amount of a draft. Reversed.

January 6, 1879, the Commercial National Bank of Chicago, sold and delivered to one Wirt Dexter a draft on the defendant for $254.50, numbered 73,436. January 15, 1879, this draft was presented to the paying teller of the defendant at its banking house in New York City, and was certified by him, and the name, number and amount entered in his certification book.

February 10, 1879, the cashier of the Commercial National Bank of Chicago wrote to the cashier of the defendant stating that the draft had been indorsed and sent to the indorsee, but had not been received; that the party to whom it had been sold requested a duplicate, asking defendant to stop payment on original "which you say you have certified." Defendant thereupon instructed its paying teller not to pay the draft, and an entry was made on the certification book, opposite the entry relating to the draft: "Stop payment; see letter February 10, 1879." The paying teller also had a book in which he had made or caused to be made the entry that payment of this draft had been stopped.

February 25 this draft, which had been raised to the sum of $2,540 and altered in its date and also altered so as to make it payable to the order of the plaintiffs, was offered at the office of the plaintiffs by a person unknown to them in payment of some bonds which the person presenting the draft proposed to purchase. Thereupon the plaintiff sent a messenger to the defendant's banking house with the draft, who presented it to the paying teller, and on behalf of plaintiffs asked the latter if the certification of the draft was good. The paying teller took the draft, looked both on the face and back, and without comparing it with his books answered, "Yes;" whereupon, plaintiffs took the draft in good faith, and delivered in exchange therefor bonds and money to the amount of its face.

March 4, 1879, this draft was presented to the defendant, which refused payment thereof; and plaintiffs brought this action.

On the first trial the plaintiffs recovered a judgment which was affirmed by the general term, but reversed in this court and a new trial granted, for error in the charge to the jury.

See 89 N. Y. 418.

On the new trial the complaint was dismissed on the pleadings, and the opening of the plaintiffs. The judgment of the trial court, dismissing the complaint, was affirmed by the general term, and plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Mr. Esek Cowen, with Messrs. Abbott Bros., for appellants:

The trial court had no right to dismiss the complaint, unless it was impossible for the plaintiffs to make out a case on the new trial. This court assumed that they might improve their case, and virtually decided that the complaint contained a valid cause of action, when it granted a new trial, instead of finally dismissing the complaint, on the appeal. It must be presumed, on this appeal, that the plaintiffs would have proved what their counsel, in opening, offered to prove. One of these offers was to prove the accepted meaning, among bankers in the City of New York, of the question put by the plaintiffs to the defendant's teller.

The plaintiffs had a right to make this proof.

Ehle v. Chittenango Bank, 24 N. Y. 548; Wachter v. Quenzer, 29 N. Y. 548; Bissel v. Campbell, 54 N. Y. 357; Brown v. Brown, 8 Met. 576; Story v. Salomon, 6 Daly, 531, affirmed, 71 N. Y. 420; Coit v. Commercial Ins. Co. 7 Johns. 385; Astor v. Union Ins. Co. 7 Cow. 202.

The case should have been submitted to the jury, upon the question of the defendant's negligence.

Mr. Wheeler H. Peckham, for respondent:

On a second appeal the decision on the first appeal is the law of the case, and the questions will not be reopened.

Clark v. Keith, 106 U. S. 464 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 302).

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When this case was first before us (89 N. Y. 420) it came up on an appeal by the defendant from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, on a verdict in their favor. That judgment was reversed, and necessarily, there having been manifest error in the charge of the judge, who instructed the jury (in substance) that if the draft was presented to the teller of the defendant and he answered the question of the messenger who presented it in the manner testified to by the messenger, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. That instruction was in effect a charge that if the messenger asked the teller whether the certification was good and the teller answered in the affirmative, that answer of itself, as matter of law, rendered the defendant liable.

Under that charge the jury were relieved from considering the circumstances proved upon the trial, and from construing the import of the question and answer, and were constrained to render a verdict for the plaintiffs, provided they believed the testimony of the messenger as to the answer which he received. They were not called to pass upon any of the questions arising upon the evidence, as to the notice which the Bank had received in relation to the draft, and the entries relating to it, contained on its own certification book and book of stopped checks, nor upon any question of negligence on the part of the teller in failing to refer to the books mentioned. The charge held that the statement of the teller that the certification was good constituted in itself, as matter of law, an absolute estoppel upon the defendant, which precluded it from disputing its liability upon the certification, for the full amount of the draft as raised subsequent to the certification, without reference to any other question. This, a majority of the court held to be error.

It by no means follows, however, that that decision established that the defendant was absolutely exempt from liability, and could not be held responsible, even if the defendant, at the time the teller said that the certification was good, had notice that it had ceased to be good by reason of the subsequent alteration of the draft or had in its possession the means of ascertaining that fact; and the jury should find that it was guilty of culpable negligence, under the circumstances, in omitting to resort to those means of information, and thus misled the plaintiffs to their injury. That is an entirely different question from the one which was adjudicated on the former appeal.

On the trial now under review the plaintiffs did not rest upon the teller's answer alone, which on the first trial was erroneously held to be of itself sufficient to make the defendant liable. They sought to go further, and to show that before answering the question the teller examined the whole of the draft, both face and back, and everything upon it. It bore plainly on its face the number 73,436.

The complaint stated the facts relating to the history of the draft and the notice to the defendant that a draft bearing that number had miscarried, and requesting the defendant to stop payment of it, and the other facts set forth in the report of this case on the first appeal; 89 N. Y. 420; and on the last trial the counsel for the plaintiffs opened the case stating fully these facts, and, after a motion to dismiss on the complaint and opening, the counsel made a further opening, stating that he expected to prove that in the ordinary usage of banks in the City of New York, it was the duty of the teller, under the circumstances of this case, before answering the question asked of him, to compare the draft with the entry in the certification book, and with the book of stopped payments and the entries made therein, which identified the draft by its number 73,436, and that the teller was guilty of gross negligence in answering the question without first making the comparison; also that, according to the usage, the question asked the teller in this case related not merely to the marks of certification, but to the draft as certified; and he also asked to go to the jury on the question whether the teller examined the whole draft, and whether his answer referred to the draft as certified, or to the marks of certification only.

After this further opening the defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint was granted, and the plaintiffs' request to go to the jury denied, and the plaintiffs' counsel excepted.

We think that the court erred in thus dismissing the complaint. Without regard to the admissibility of evidence of usage, the plaintiffs had a right, under the circumstances offered to be proved, to go to the jury on the question whether the inquiry made of the teller was understood by the parties as referring to the validity of the certification at the time it was exhibited to the teller, or only to the genuineness of the marks of certification, and also on the question whether it was culpably negligent, under the circumstances, to answer the question without referring to the certification book and the book of stopped payments, which referred to the draft in question by its number, and would have disclosed the fraud. It was promptly discovered on the following day, when the draft was presented for payment.

Neither of these questions was necessarily involved in the case as presented to us on the first appeal. The judgment then under review could not have been sustained, on the ground that the jury might have found for the plaintiffs on the two questions now referred to; and the reversal of the judgment cannot, therefore, be regarded as an authoritative decision that they were not proper for the consideration of the jury. When the court is divided, as it was on the first appeal, and the majority concur simply for reversal, it is not safe to treat anything as having been adjudicated, except the precise point in respect to which error in the judgment of the court below was made to appear, which in this case was that the judge charged the jury, as matter of law, that if they found that the question whether the certification was good was asked of defendant's teller and answered as testified to by the messenger, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

That this charge was erroneous is all that was necessarily decided on the first appeal.

The counsel for the respondent now makes the point that in reviewing the decision dismissing the complaint, we must consider only the facts stated in the complaint itself, and that the further facts referred to in the opening of the counsel and in his offers of proof cannot be considered. We do not think this point tenable.

Where a complaint is dismissed on the opening of counsel, all the facts referred to in his opening, or offers of proof, should be considered, including facts not stated in the complaint, unless objection to proof of such additional facts is made, on the specific ground that it is not admissible under the pleadings. No such specific objection appears to have been made. If it had, it might have been met by an amendment of the complaint if necessary.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, costs to abide the event.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, reversing a judgment of the Westchester Special Term as to defendant McCloskey (and granting leave to plaintiff to discontinue as to him) in an action to charge defendants with deficiency on a foreclosure sale. Judgment modified. New trial granted.

Reported below, 38 Hun, 350.

Property owned by the Father Matthew's Total Abstinence Society, and mortgaged for its full value to plaintiff's assignor, was by said society conveyed under order of the court for nominal consideration to John McEvoy. The deed contained a covenant on the part of the grantee assuming payment of the mortgage. Thereafter McEvoy executed and recorded a deed of the same premises to John McCloskey, Archbishop of New York, which deed also contained a like covenant on the part of said McCloskey assuming payment of the mortgage. On a sale of the mortgaged premises on foreclosure of the mortgage there was a deficiency, to recover which this action was brought against said McCloskey and William P. O'Connor, executor of John McEvoy, deceased.

At the trial at the special term, before a justice without a jury, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff against both defendants. On separate appeals to the general term, which were heard together, the judgment was reversed as to McCloskey, with leave to plaintiff to discontinue the action as to him and affirmed as to defendant O'Connor. The defendant O'Connor appealed to this court from that part of the judgment of the general term which was adverse to him and such judgment was affirmed. See 6 Cent. Rep. 33, in which the facts are more fully stated.

The plaintiff appealed to this court from that part of the judgment of the general term which reversed the judgment of the special term as to defendant McCloskey. Subsequent to the trial at special term defendant McCloskey died and the defendant Corrigan, as executor, was substituted in his place.

Further facts appear from the opinion.

Mr. Ralph E. Prime, for appellant:

The presumption of delivery and acceptance which is inferred from the reading in evidence, as in this case, of the record of the deed, rests on good authority.

Jackson v. Perkins, 2 Wend. 308, 318; Lawrence v. Farley, 24 Hun, 293, 295; Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 416, 423; Fryer v. Rockefeller, 63 N. Y. 268, 273; Knolls v. Barnhart, 71 N. Y. 474, 478; Jackson v. Bodle, 20 Johns. 184, 187; Spencer v. Carr, 45 N. Y. 406, 410; Wilsey v. Dennis, 44 Barb. 354, 359; Lady Superior v. McNamara, 3 Barb. Ch. 375, 378; Moir v. Brown, 14 Barb. 39, 45; Gilbert v. *N. A. Fire Ins. Co. 23 Wend. 43, 46; Van Buskirk v. Warren, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 457, 460; Tompkins v. Wheeler, 16 Pet. 106 (41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 903); Halluck v. Bush, 2 Root, 26; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 297.

The eighth finding of fact is of the delivery of the deed to McCloskey, and his assumption of the mortgage. McCloskey has never excepted to this finding, nor to the fifth conclusion of law which charges him with the deficiency.

This court will not review questions of fact found when there are no exceptions to the finding.

Hunt v. Chapman, 62 N. Y. 333.

In case of no evidence to justify a finding, an exception to that finding is necessary to a review in this court.

Gidly v. Gidly, 65 N. Y. 69; Brush v. Lee, 36 N. Y. 52, 53.

It nowhere appears in the case that the reversal was upon questions of fact; and if there is any evidence at all, if only a "presumption" to sustain the findings of fact, this court will not review the facts found.

Lanigan v. N. Y. Gas Light Co. 71 N. Y. 32.

Where it does not appear from the general term order of reversal that it was on the facts (and so it fails to appear in this case), it will be deemed to be upon the law only; and the court of appeals can only look at the facts as found and the exceptions taken.

Krekeler v. Thaule, 73 N. Y. 608.

The attempted release by McEvoy's executor was futile. The grantor, McEvoy, and his executor, were each powerless to release defendant McCloskey from the covenant of assumption.

Ranney v. McMullen, 5 Abb. N. C. 246; Ranney v. Peyser, 5 Abb. N. C. 259, note; Hartley v. Harrison, 24 N. Y. 170.

This liability, once created, is irrevocable.

Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 242; Whiting v. Gearty, 14 Hun, 501.

The fact that the general term affirmed the judgment as to O'Connor and reversed it as to McCloskey did not prevent a new trial being granted as to McCloskey.

Hubbell v. Meigs, 50 N. Y. 484, 489.

The general term erred in reversing the judgment as to McCloskey and inviting the plaintiff to discontinue as to him. If it was right to reverse the judgment, it should have ordered a new trial.

Astor v. L'Amoreux, 8 N. Y. 107; Cuff v. Dorland, 57 N. Y. 560; Griffin v. Marquardt, 17 N. Y. 28.

Mr. E. C. Boardman, for respondent:

There is no proof in the case that the deed from McEvoy to McCloskey was ever delivered, or that McCloskey ever took possession of the premises described therein, or that he ever accepted or even knew of the existence of the deed in question or of the fact that it had been recorded.

The production of the books of conveyances containing the record of a deed is no proof of its delivery or of its acceptance by the parties sought to be charged.

Day v. Mooney, 6 Thomp. & C. 382; Best v. Brown, 25 Hun, 223.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant McCloskey in his verified answer denied that he entered into the covenant of assumption contained in the deed executed by McEvoy, and alleged that the deed was made and executed without his knowledge, and that it was never delivered to or accepted by him. The parties proceeded to trial, upon the issue so presented and the other issues in the case. The plaintiff put in evidence from the register's office in Westchester County the record of a deed dated May 8, 1878, recorded May 10, 1878, from McEvoy to the defendant McCloskey, purporting to convey to "John McCloskey, Archbishop of New York," for the nominal consideration of $1, the mortgaged premises and a lot adjacent thereto, which deed contained a covenant on the part of the grantee to assume and pay the principal sum of $3,900, on the mortgage, with interest from January 9, 1869. The deed was executed by the grantor alone.

The plaintiff rested his case against the defendant McCloskey solely upon the record. The case is bare of any circumstance or evidence showing or tending to show that the defendant McCloskey had any knowledge or information of the existence of the deed, or indeed of the existence of the mortgaged property prior to the commencement of the action, or that he was ever in possession, or that he ever had any conversation or negotiation with anyone in respect to the property. There is no evidence who put the deed upon record, or how it came to be recorded. The bare fact of the record is all that appears connecting the defendant McCloskey with the transaction. The grantor McEvoy died before the commencement of the action, and the defendant McCloskey a few months after the trial.

*See note to this case, Lawyers' edition, and digested citations at the close. [Ed.]

In determining the question whether the plaintiff made out a prima facie case of the delivery to and acceptance of the deed by the grantee, certain other facts need to be noticed. McEvoy was a Roman Catholic priest. He acquired title to the mortgaged property in 1870, from the trustees of "The Father Matthew's Temperance Benefit Society of Tuckahoe," a society incorporated under the Act of April 12, 1848, for the incorporation of "benevolent, charitable, scientific and missionary societies." The conveyance of the property by the society to McEvoy was made under the order of the court, which authorized the conveyance to be made to him "for the use of the Roman Catholic Church, or the people of Tuckahoe," and the deed referred to the order as the authority under which it was executed. It appeared by the petition upon which the order was granted that the society was unable to pay the mortgage, and that the value of the premises did not exceed the amount due thereon.

The plaintiff, to maintain his claim that the deed from McEvoy to McCloskey was delivered and accepted, invokes the presumption that a party has accepted a benefit attempted to be conferred upon him, and that the record of a deed beneficial to the grantee is prima facie evidence of its delivery. The property was conveyed to McEvoy for church purposes; and it cannot be doubted that in executing a deed to the defendant McCloskey it was his intention to vest the title in him as archbishop, for the same purposes, whatever may be the legal effect of his conveyance, and not to vest in his grantee a personal, beneficial interest in the property.

It is well known that the title to church property in the Roman Catholic Church is frequently vested in the bishop. This tends to explain a transaction which would otherwise be peculiar, and how McEvoy may have executed a deed of the land to his ecclesiastical superior without his knowledge.

The ground of the presumption from the bare record of a deed, that it has been delivered and accepted, wholly fails in this case. The deed was not beneficial to the grantee. The property was heavily incumbered, probably to its full value. As has been stated there is no evidence of any possession under the deed, or of any prior contract or negotiation between the parties, or of any knowledge in fact on the part of the grantee of the existence of the conveyance. In most of the cases where delivery of a deed has been sought to be established, without proof of the actual fact, there are circumstances which support the presumption of a delivery, in addition to the bare record of the deed. We are of the opinion that under the circumstances of this case, a delivery cannot be presumed from the record alone, and that the conclusion of the general term upon this point was correct. See Jackson v. Phipps, 12 Johns. 418; Jackson v. Bodle, 20 Johns. 184; Church v. Gilman, 15 Wend. 656; Elsey v. Metcalf, 1 Denio, 323.

Construing the exceptions in connection with the issue raised by the pleadings, we think they fairly presented the question whether the evidence justified a finding that the defendant McCloskey made the covenant upon which he is sought to be charged. But as the case on this point may be changed on a retrial we think the court below should have ordered a new trial, and that its order should be modified in this respect.

There is another question argued by counsel, of great interest, which we do not deem it necessary to decide, as it may not again arise; the question relates to the effect of the release from the covenant of assumption executed by the executor of McEvoy to McCloskey, after the complaint in the action and the notice of lis pendens had been filed, but before the actual service of process on the defendant.

Is it competent for a grantor of mortgaged premises, whose conveyance was made subject to the mortgage and contains a covenant of assumption by the grantee, without the consent of the mortgagee, to release the grantee from the covenant so as to bar any remedy thereon against him by the mortgagee, and does it make any difference whether the release is executed before or after the mortgagee has notice of the covenant, or before or after suit commenced by him thereon? This question has never been finally adjudicated in this court, although expressions of judges are to be found bearing upon it. Hartley v. Harrison, 24 N. Y. 170; Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 233; Dunning v. Leavitt, 85 N. Y. 30; Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co. v. Nelson, 78 N. Y. 150.

Prior to Burr v. Beers, 24 N. Y. 178, as is shown by Rapallo, J., in Garnsey v. Rogers, the right of a mortgagee to avail himself of the benefit of a covenant of payment, made by a grantee of the mortgagor, was regarded as an equitable right only, and was founded on the theory that "The undertaking of the grantee to pay off the incumbrance is a collateral security acquired by the mortgagor, which inures by an equitable subrogation to the benefit of the mortgagee." Denio, J., Burr v. Beers, supra.

Assuming this to be the true foundation of the rule, the question arises, When does this equitable right of subrogation attach? It is clear that it cannot be enforced by the mortgagee until default of the covenantor to pay the mortgage according to the terms of his covenant. But does not the equitable right of the creditor to the benefit of the covenant spring into existence contemporaneously with the covenant itself, although he cannot then avail himself of it, and although he may never be in a situation which renders a resort to it necessary? This right does not rest on privity of contract between the covenantor and mortgagee. It is the application of an equitable principle long recognized, to work out the real justice of the transaction. If the right of the creditor to the collateral security springs into existence concurrently with the origin of the relation of principal and surety between the mortgagor and his grantee, ought the immediate parties to the covenant, by a mere release, to be permitted to change the situation of the mortgageee and deprive him of the security of the covenant? It is true that there is no direct contract with the mortgagee, nor is there any consideration moving between the mortgagee and the covenantor; but does the absence of a consideration between these parties justify the mortgagor in canceling a security, which he has taken for his own protection and which at the same time operates also as a protection to his creditor, and especially when this is done for the mere purpose of defeating the remedy of the latter?

The case of Burr v. Beers established the doctrine in this State that an action at law would lie in favor of the mortgagee against the grantee of the mortgagor, on the covenant of assumption. Would the defense of a release be available when the action is in this form, assuming that it would not be available in the equitable action? In truth, is the direct action on the covenant not an action founded upon the equity of the transaction, rather than upon the notion of a contract between the parties?

We leave the question raised by the release in this case undecided. We prefer not to decide it until it is squarely and necessarily presented.

The order and judgment of the General Term should be modified by directing a new trial, and, as so modified, affirmed; with costs to abide the event.

All concur, Danforth and Peckham, JJ., in result.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming a judgment of the Rensselaer Circuit on a verdict directed for plaintiff in an action to recover the amount of an alleged lien for work done on goods taken from plaintiff's possession by defendants. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Messrs. Blumenstiel & Hirsch, for appellant:

I. Where credit is given, or where a special agreement for a particular mode of payment exists, or a particular time for such payment is provided, no lien exists.

Trust v. Pirsson, 1 Hilt. 292, 297; Dunham v. Pettee, 1 Daly, 112, 117, 118; Morgan v. Congdon, 4 N. Y. 552; Devinne v. Rianhard, 9 Daly, 406; Fielding v. Mills, 2 Bosw. 489; 3 Pars. Cont. 348.

II. The agreement was not an entire and single contract. Each delivery was a separate contract by itself, for either party could refuse to go on. Hence it is not within the facts or the principle of the case of Morgan v. Congdon, 4 N. Y. 552.

III. There is no lien for the work done on the goods on hand as against us, for the reason that when we levied the goods and offered to pay such amount, the right to retain them was placed on another and different ground. In such a case the lien for the true amount was waived.

LaMotte v. Archer, 4 E. D. Smith, 46; Maynard v. Anderson, 54 N. Y. 641; Saltus v. Everett,* 20 Wend. 267; Everett v. Coffin, 6 Wend. 608.

IV. On general principles, and unless there was an agreement to the contrary, the common-law lien for the work delivered became lost by surrendering possession of the property.

Grinnell v. Suydam, 3 Sandf. 132; Dunham v. Pettee, 1 Daly, 112; Grinnell v. Cook, 3 Hill, 492; Higgins v. Murray, 73 N. Y. 255; Robinson v. Frost, 14 Barb. 536.

Mr. N. Davenport, for respondent:

The plaintiff performed labor and furnished materials in laundering goods for Hoexter, and had a common-law lien thereon for such labor and materials, unless there was some special agreement for credit, or a future time of payment beyond completion of contract so inconsistent with such lien that it destroyed it.

2 Kent, Com. 635; Morgan v. Congdon, 4 N. Y. 552.

Partial payments, partial deliveries and the fixed price per dozen did not affect or impair the lien.

Blake v. Nicholson, 3 Maule & S. 168; Chase v. Westmore, 5 Maule & S. 180.

The contract was to terminate ten days after Hoexter should suspend delivery of goods; and as the time for such suspension was not limited, the contract was terminable ten days after notice by either party.

Marston v. Gould, 69 N. Y. 220.

But for the agreement to make monthly payments, or advances on account, the plaintiff could have recovered nothing until the completion of the contract; and the fact that the agreed price was by the dozen instead of a gross sum did not qualify or change the character of the contract.

Cunningham v. Jones, 20 N. Y. 486.

In the case at bar the defendants stand in no better position than Hoexter, and cannot be permitted to use any agreement or to so construe it as to destroy the plaintiff's lien, because Hoexter failed and refused to carry out such agreement on his part.

Mount v. Williams, 11 Wend. 77.

No usage or rule of the parties was established, from which it can be inferred that the plaintiff intended to waive its right to a lien, because the transaction in question was the first one between the parties.

Overton, Liens, p. 52.

There was but one bargain, and all the goods laundered were laundered under this one bargain; and plaintiff therefore had a lien upon all the goods in its possession at the time of the levy for the entire balance due.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

No controverted question of fact arose upon the trial of this action. Only one witness was examined on the part of the plaintiff, and no testimony was introduced on the part of the defense. The question presented was purely one of law.

The action was brought against the Sheriff and the defendant Hahlo for having, under an execution in favor of Hahlo against one Hoexter, taken from the possession of the plaintiff a quantity of collars and cuffs which had been delivered to the plaintiff by Hoexter for the purpose of being laundered, and upon which the plaintiff claimed to have a lien to the amount of $1,747.72, being the general balance due the plaintiff for laundering the collars and cuffs so taken from it by the Sheriff, and also for laundering other collars and cuffs which had been received by it from Hoexter and returned to him before the levy in question. The only question at issue is whether the plaintiff had the lien which it claimed.

The uncontroverted facts were as follows: Hoexter was a manufacturer of collars and cuffs, and the plaintiff carried on the business of laundering for manufacturers. In June, 1884, Hoexter, through his representative, Mr. Kupfer, stated to the agent of the plaintiff that he was about manufacturing a superior line of goods on which he desired to have the laundry work of the plaintiff, and asked the plaintiff's agent whether the plaintiff could take the job, and the agent replied that the plaintiff could. An agreement was thereupon entered into, verbally, between them, that the plaintiff should do the laundry work on all collars and cuffs Hoexter should deliver to the plaintiff, at the price of 16½ cents per dozen, payable in cash as follows: that on the first of each month the plaintiff should render a bill for all goods laundered and returned to Hoexter during the preceding month, and should receive payment in cash; that cash was not to be paid at the time the goods were actually delivered to Hoexter, but cash on the first of each month, for goods returned the previous month; that there was no fixed period during which the goods were to be delivered to be laundered, but only until notice by either party; that the plaintiff might at any time refuse to do any more goods, and Hoexter might refuse to deliver any fresh goods if he chose; and whenever Hoexter should desire a general settlement and clearing out of the goods he should shut down for ten days and not send any more work, and give the plaintiff a chance to get everything out of the laundry. It usually took seven or eight days to complete the process of laundering the goods. Under this agreement Hoexter began sending goods to the plaintiff's laundry, about the 18th of June, 1884; and the business continued until the 6th of April, 1885, when it was discontinued on account of the failure of Hoexter.

The work done by the plaintiff during the continuance of the contract amounted to between $6,000 and $7,000. In the course of the business goods were generally delivered at the laundry, and laundered goods returned, every day. The stipulated monthly payments were, at first, made by sight drafts drawn by Kupfer on Hoexter. This continued until January, 1885, when a sight draft was given for the December account. After January the plaintiff received ten day drafts for the work of the preceding month, down to the close.

On the third of April, 1885, the plaintiff received for the March account a ten day draft drawn by Kupfer on Hoexter for the sum of $1,132.41. Hoexter refused to accept this draft, and it was returned protested, and was never paid, and on the 6th of April, 1885, there was a balance unpaid to the plaintiff for work, including this protested draft, of $1,747.72, and the plaintiff had on hand between 2,400 and 2,500 dozen cuffs and collars of Hoexter's which were taken by the Sheriff on the execution against Hoexter on the 25th of April, 1885, against the protest of the plaintiff's agent, who claimed a lien thereon for the above mentioned balance of $1,747.72 due plaintiff. It was admitted on the trial that the value of the goods taken was equal at least, to the plaintiff's claim of $1,747.72, and it was also admitted by the plaintiff's counsel that when the defendants took the goods, they tendered the amount due for the work done upon the particular goods which are the subject of this action.

At the close of the testimony the defendants' counsel moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that it appeared that there was no lien on the goods, and also on the ground that there was no lien upon the goods taken, for work done on other goods which had already been delivered. The court denied the motion, and no evidence being offered on the part of the defense the plaintiff's counsel asked the court to direct the jury to render a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount. The court stated that it had great doubt as to the existence of any lien at all, but that the case was important enough to go to the general term, and accordingly directed a verdict.

To these rulings exceptions were duly taken. Judgment was entered on the verdict, and on appeal to the general term the judgment was affirmed.

If, under the agreement between the plaintiff and Hoexter, the plaintiff acquired any lien upon the goods laundered, we think that this lien attached to any goods which the plaintiff had in its possession at the close of the dealings, and to the extent of the whole balance then due to the plaintiff for work done, as well upon the particular goods remaining in the plaintiff's possession as upon those which it had previously returned to Hoexter. All the work was done under a single contract, and the lien attached to all goods delivered to the plaintiff under that contract. By returning a portion of those goods to Hoexter, the plaintiff waived only its lien upon the goods so returned, retaining it for its full amount upon the residue which remained in its possession.

This consequence results from the entirety of the contract under which the goods were delivered to the plaintiff to be laundered. If each lot of goods had been delivered to the plaintiff under a separate contract, it would have acquired only a lien upon the particular lot of goods so delivered, and only for the work done on that particular lot of goods; and when that lot was returned to the manufacturer, the plaintiff, by parting with possession would have destroyed its lien on that lot of goods, and could not transfer it to any other lot received under a separate contract. But where property is delivered for the purpose of having work done thereon, which adds to its value, it makes no difference that the deliveries take place at different times, provided they are all made under a single contract. The lien attaches to all the property, in the same manner as if it had all been delivered at one time; and if part of it is voluntarily returned without payment for the work, the only consequence is that the person doing the work has abandoned a part of his security for the total amount due him, and retained his lien therefor only upon the property which remains in his possession.

This is the doctrine recognized in Morgan v. Congdon, 4 N. Y. 552, where logs were delivered at the defendant's sawmill on different days, upon an agreement that defendant would saw into boards all the logs delivered. The defendant sawed part of them and delivered the boards without being paid for the sawing; and it was held that he had a lien upon the logs undelivered for the sawing of the others, provided all the logs were delivered to the defendant under a single contract. To the same effect are the cases of Blake v. Nicholson, 3 Maule & Sel. 168, and Chase v. Westmore, 5 Maule & Sel. 180, and other cases.

In the case last cited, wheat was delivered at a mill at various times to be ground, under a single contract to grind all the wheat furnished, at a fixed price, no time or mode of payment being agreed upon; and it was held that after delivery of a part of the meal ground, the grinder could retain the residue for the whole balance due him.

But all these cases are subject to the condition that there is nothing in the contract for doing the work, inconsistent with the right of lien, and that where a particular future time of payment is fixed, which may be subsequent to the time when the owner is entitled to a return of the article upon which the work is done, there can be no lien; and that where the parties contract for a particular time or mode of payment, the workman would have no right to set up a right to possession inconsistent with the terms of his contract, and in such a case there is no lien. 5 Maule & Sel. 186, 187.

In the present case the legal effect of the contract was that the collars and cuffs should be returned to Hoexter as fast as laundered. On this construction the parties acted throughout their dealings. Laundered goods were returned as a general rule every day during each month. The plaintiff had no right to demand pay for each lot delivered, at the time of delivery. The only witness to the contract testifies expressly that such was not the agreement, but on the contrary that it was that on the first of each month Hoexter should pay for the goods which had been laundered and returned during the preceding month. It is clear that the return of the goods to Hoexter was to precede the right to demand payment for the work, by a longer or shorter period, according to circumstances, but certainly some period of time. This is entirely inconsistent with the theory of a lien, as has often been adjudged.

The case of Stoddard Woolen Manufactory v. Huntley, 8 N. H. 441, is in point. It was an action of trover against a clothier for converting 1,000 yards of flannels which he had dressed for the plaintiff, and the defendant set up a lien for the price of his work. The work had been done under an agreement between plaintiff and defendant that the defendant should dress what flannels the plaintiff should make during the year, and finish them as fast as manufactured and bale them, the plaintiff to pay for finishing once in three months. Under this agreement, flannels had been dressed by the defendant and returned to the plaintiff for about six months, and at the end of one of the quarters the defendant had on hand two bales, for the work on which he had not been paid. The plaintiff, through its agent, demanded these bales, and the defendant refused to deliver them without being paid for the dressing. The court held that the legal effect of the contract was that the flannels were to be delivered to the plaintiff as fast as dressed, and that the dressing was not to be paid for until the end of the quarter; that by such a contract the right of lien was waived, and that even if some of the cloth remained in the defendant's hands at the end of the quarter, he was not entitled to retain it for the price of dressing. The only difference between that case and the present one is that there the work was to be paid for monthly.

There are many cases illustrating the same principle. Where it is agreed that a credit is to be given for the price of the work, not limited to a period preceding the time for the return of the article, the contract is inconsistent with the right of lien, and none can be set up. This rule has been applied even where the party for whom the work was done has become insolvent between the time of the employment and the expiration of the time of credit agreed upon. Fielding v. Mills, 2 Bosw. 489.

The same principle is applicable to liens of warehousemen, carriers and other bailees. If, by the terms of the contract, possession of the property is to be surrendered before payment, no right of lien exists.

In Chandler v. *Belden, 18 Johns. 157, 162, it was held that where, by the terms of the contract, freight was not to be paid until after the delivery of the goods, the carrier could not claim a lien.

The present respondent cites the case of The Kimball, 3 Wall. 37 [70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 50], but on looking beyond the head note into the opinion of Mr. Justice Field, it is certainly not an authority in favor of respondent. There, by the terms of a charter-party, part of the freight was to be paid in advance. The cargo was to be delivered within reach of the ship's tackle, and the balance of the charter money was to be payable, one half in five days, and the other half within ten days, after the discharge of the cargo. The opinion rests upon the ground that the provision, as to delivery within reach of the ship's tackle, related only to the manner of discharging, and that the credit was given only for a few days after the discharge of the cargo, and that it was no more than a reasonable time to enable the freighter to examine the condition of the goods, and determine whether he would accept them, and was not inconsistent with the retention of their possession by the ship owner until the charter money should be paid; distinguishing the case, in this respect, from Foster v. Colby, 3 Hurlst. & N. 705.

It is needless to multiply authorities on this point, although many might be cited. The counsel for the respondent contends that the contract being an entire one, no pay for the work done by plaintiff would become due until the termination of the contract, except for the agreement to make monthly payments, and that these payments were merely advances on account of the entire payment, and that an agreement to make these advances could not be considered as giving credit to the owner of the goods, but rather a credit to the mechanic.

We cannot agree to this construction of the contract. The payments were not advances on account, but payments in full for the work done done on goods returned during the month preceding the payment. But assuming the construction contended for, we are unable to see how it helps the plaintiff's case. The counsel concedes in his points that it was unquestionably understood that Hoexter was at liberty to take the goods as fast as they were laundered, because the nature of his business probably required it. If the contract price of the work was not due until the end of the contract, but the goods were to be delivered in the meantime, we fail to perceive how the contract was consistent with a right to a lien on the goods for that contract price.

We think that the doubt of the learned trial Judge, as to the existence of any lien at all, was well founded, and that the judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, costs to abide the event.

Martin J. KEESE et al., Respts.

In an action by a sheriff on the bond of a deputy sheriff, to recover damages suffered by the plaintiff by reason of a false return alleged in the complaint to have been made by the deputy, the answer of one of the defendants put the making of the return in issue, but the answers of the other defendants admitted the making of the return by the deputy, but alleged facts in justification thereof. The plaintiff failed to show that the return was made by the deputy, and was thereupon nonsuited as to all the defendants. Held, that the nonsuit was proper as to the defendant who had raised an issue as to the making of the return, but was erroneous as to the others, whose answers, being in effect in confession and avoidance, raised no such issue as to the making of the return as cast the burden of proving it upon the plaintiff.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit dismissing the complaint in an action by a sheriff on the bond of a deputy sheriff. Affirmed as to one defendant, reversed as to the others.

Mr. Henry Thompson with Mr. Robert S. Green, for appellants:

One of the grounds urged for dismissing the complaint was that "It appeared by the execution that the return was signed by William C. Conner, sheriff, and that it did not appear that the defendant Keese had anything to do with said return."

The name of William C. Conner was subscribed to the return but there was no evidence whatever that it was signed by him. It was necessary that the return should be signed in the name of the sheriff, either by himself or by some one in his name; otherwise it would have been no return at all.

Crocker, Sheriffs, § 39.

There is no presumption that the return was not made and signed by Keese himself, as indeed it was his duty to do, and which act the sheriff would be responsible for at the suit of the party aggrieved.

Id.; Gibson v. Nat. Bank of N. Y. 98 N. Y. 88.

In response to this objection plaintiffs offered to show the custom of the office in the making and signing of returns.

Keese and Campbell, by their answers, admitted Keese's responsibility for the return.

Keese in no way attempted to set up that he was not connected with the return, but he expressly admits that he did make it. He says that he was instructed by the under sheriff "not to make a levy," and also "to make the return, which he did."

So also with reference to the defendant Campbell; for by his answer he expressly admits the same. He alleges that Keese was advised not to levy, but to return said writ unexecuted and unsatisfied, with his indorsement thereon, to the effect that he could not find said property, "all of which said Keese did."

Mr. George W. Stephens, for respondents:

---

*See note to this case in Lawyers' edition. [Ed.]

The bond in suit was not given to protect the sheriff from all possible loss, but only from such as resulted from the misconduct of the deputy.

The proof adduced showed that the judgment in Hoffman v. Conner (the suit against the sheriff on the return) was the direct result of the sheriff's own act, in which there was no proof that the deputy in any way participated.

The plaintiffs' case is not aided by any admissions in the answers of the defendants Keese and Johnstone.

As to the defendant Johnstone: his answer admitted nothing, except the execution of the bond. As to him, therefore, there can be no question that plaintiffs were obliged to prove every element of their case, except the making of the bond.

As to the defendant Keese: he denies the allegations of the complaint, charging him with having falsely returned the execution unsatisfied, just as broadly as they are made. True, he says that he made the return which he did; but he not only failed to state what it was (and presumably, therefore, it was a true one, and not such a one as the sheriff had made), but he coupled it with the direct charge that he did it under the instructions of the sheriff's personal representative.

The court properly excluded evidence tending to show the custom of the sheriff's office in making and signing the returns to executions.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by William C. Conner, Sheriff of the County of New York, in his lifetime, against one of his deputies, and the sureties of such deputy on his official bond given to the sheriff. The sheriff having died the action has been continued in the name of his executors.

The condition of the bond was such as, among other things, to render the sureties of the deputy liable for any damage the sheriff should sustain by reason of any false return which the deputy might make to any process delivered to him for execution. The breach alleged was, in substance, that an execution in an action of replevin, for the return of the replevied chattels to the defendant, was issued to the sheriff and by him delivered to his deputy, Keese, for enforcement, and that the deputy made a false return to said execution; that the chattels could not be found; by reason of which false return judgment had been recovered against the sheriff, which he had paid, with costs, etc.

On the trial the plaintiffs proved the issuing of the execution. Its delivery to the deputy, Keese, was admitted. The return that the chattels could not be found, etc., signed with the name of the sheriff, and the recovery of judgment against the sheriff for the falsity of this return, were also proved. For the purpose of binding the deputy and his sureties by this judgment, it was shown that he was a witness on the trial of the action against the sheriff for the false return; and also, that by the express terms of the bond they waived notice of any action brought against the sheriff for any misfeasance or nonfeasance on the part of the deputy, and covenanted that a recovery against the sheriff in any such action should be conclusive evidence of their liability for the full amount recovered.

There remained but one link to be supplied in the chain of facts necessary to establish the liability of the defendants; that was that the return (for the falsity of which the sheriff had been compelled to pay damages and costs) had been made by the deputy, or on his report to the sheriff or under-sheriff.

That essential fact was not established by the evidence adduced on the trial of this action; and on that ground the plaintiffs were nonsuited. As to the defendant Johnstone the nonsuit was clearly right; for by his answer he put in issue all the facts alleged in the complaint bearing upon that question. The opinions of the majority of the general term are clearly right, so far as that defendant is concerned; but as to the defendants Campbell and Keese the case is different. By their answers they expressly admitted that the return was made by the deputy, Keese. The complaint alleges that Keese made the return and that it was false, by reason whereof the sheriff was made liable. The answer of defendant Campbell, after admitting the formal allegations of the complaint, setting forth that the plaintiff was sheriff; that he appointed Keese one of his deputies; the execution of the bond sued upon; and the waiver of notice therein contained; denied the other allegations of the complaint only so far as not thereafter specifically admitted, qualified or denied; and then proceeded to aver that the deputy, Keese, was willing and desirous faithfully to execute the process confided to him for execution, but that a third party claimed title to the property and was in possession thereof, and that he made the return for which the sheriff was sued, under instructions from the under-sheriff to consult the counsel of the sheriff, and to follow their advice in respect to levying upon the property; that such counsel having advised him not to execute the writ, but to make return that he could not find the property, he did make such return, contrary to his own judgment, but under the express direction of the sheriff through his counsel. The answer of the defendant Keese was to the same effect, although less particular and explicit in detail.

Of course if the matters thus set up in defense had been proved, they would have afforded a complete justification for the action of the deputy and would have absolved him and his sureties from any charge of misconduct which could have rendered them liable upon the bond. But no such proof was given or offered, and the defendants on the trial of this action rested their defense solely and singly upon the point that it had not been proved that the deputy made the return which was found to have been false; and on that sole ground the general term sustained the nonsuit.

We do not think that, as to the defendants Campbell and Keese, that fact was in issue, and that the counsel for the appellants is right in his contention that it was admitted by the pleadings. The answers of those defendants were in confession and avoidance, as would have been said of a like pleading under the common-law system, and should be held now so far as the substance is concerned. They admitted that the deputy made the return which rendered the sheriff liable, but set up as a justification that they did so pursuant to the direction of the sheriff himself, through his authorized agents. The affirmative of that issue was with them, and to sustain their defense it was necessary that they should prove their allegation. If they failed to do so, the averment of the complaint stood admitted.

The case is devoid of any evidence throwing light upon the merits of the case, and we must decide it on the record.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs, as to the defendant Johnstone; and reversed as to the defendants Campbell and Keese, and a new trial ordered as to them, with costs to abide the event.

All concur.

Re Petition of E. H. and D. M. CAVIN, Respts.,
v.
John B. GLEASON, Assignee, Appt.

1. Upon an accounting in bankruptcy or insolvency, a trust creditor is not entitled to a preference over general creditors of the insolvent, merely on the ground of the nature of his claim; that is, that he is a trust creditor, as distinguished from a general creditor.
2. The equitable doctrine that as between creditors equality is equity admits of no exception founded on the greater supposed sacredness of one debt, or that it arose out of a violation of duty, or that its loss involves greater apparent hardship in one case than another, unless it appears in addition that there is some specific recognized equity founded on some agreement, or the relation of the debt to the assigned property, which entitles the claimant, according to equitable principles, to preferential payment.
3. The court may order trust property, or its proceeds, specifically belonging to the trust included in the assigned assets of an insolvent debtor, to be restored to the trust. But in order to follow trust funds and subject them to the operation of the trust, they must be identified; or it must, at least, appear that the fund or property of the insolvent remaining for distribution includes the proceeds of the trust estate.
4. Where the trust fund was misappropriated by the trustee to the payment of his private debts before his assignment as an insolvent debtor and did not pass into the hands of his assignee, it is not entitled to a preference in payment from the funds in the hands of the assignee.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming an order of the Delaware Special Term in favor of petitioners in a petition for the payment of a claim in full by an assignee for the benefit of creditors. Modified.

In the year 1883 Seth H. White was doing business as a private banker at the Railway Bank, an unincorporated bank, in the Village of Delhi, New York.

On or before January 3, 1883, one J. P. Gould, of Minneapolis, Minn., applied to White to procure a loan to him of $3,000 on bond and mortgage. January 3, 1883, said White entered into an arrangement with the petitioners to take the loan and furnish the $3,000, which was made up as follows: an overdue promissory note payable to E. H. Cavin, on which there was due the sum of $1,000 and interest, also a note payable to E. H. Cavin for $495 and interest, two certificates of deposit of said Seth H. White, banker, one for $285 and one for $495, also a certificate of deposit in the Delaware National Bank for $200; $106 in cash and a note executed by D. M. Cavin to said White for $226.61 to make up the balance. Said White received these securities and obligations as money, and gave them the following receipt:

"Received January 3, 1883, of E. H. Cavin and D. M. Cavin $3,000, for investment with J. P. Gould, of Minneapolis, Minn., and when I deliver to them the bond and mortgage agreed upon this receipt is to be delivered up to me."

The bond and mortgage never were procured by White but soon after said January 3, 1883, White turned most of these securities into money, and with the exception of $30 of such funds used the entire amount in payment of his own obligations. White, becoming embarrassed and not having made the investment as he had agreed, January 11, 1883, made an arrangement with the petitioners by which he gave back to them their note $226.61, and an assignment of an interest in a certain land contract, as collateral security for the payment of the balance of said $3,000. Upon this land contract the petitioners realized sufficient to reduce their claim against White to the sum of $877.27.

January 12, 1883, White made a general assignment to Gleason in trust for his creditors. The funds in the hands of the assignee were sufficient to pay petitioner's claim in full, but not sufficient to satisfy the claims of other creditors of White.

Petitioners filed this petition, asking to be paid their balance of $877.27 in full, out of the funds in the hands of the assignee, upon the ground that their original claim arose out of trust funds in the hands of the assignee, and that they have the lawful right to follow the same in his hands.

The court at special term granted the prayer of the petitioners. On appeal to the general term the order was affirmed and defendant appeals to this court.

Further facts appear from the opinion.

Mr. J. B. Gleason, for appellant:

The prior title of the original owner and his right to retake the property, followed changes of form of the trust property so long as it could be traced from one specific form into another specific form. This is merely an equitable extension of the law of bailments.

Scott v. Surman, Willes, Rep. 400; Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 562.

Upon an accounting in bankruptcy one creditor cannot claim a general lien upon the fund, simply upon the ground that he is a trust creditor.

Ferris v. Van Vechten, 73 N. Y. 125.

The equitable doctrine demands for its application that the trust fund or money shall be traced and identified as existing in the new form into which it has been converted.

The conclusions of law of the trial court, to the effect that the trust fund has been traced into the hands of the assignee, are inconsistent with its express finding of fact that the fund was all paid out before the assignment.

Messrs. Johnson & Kemp, for respondents:

A trust is created whenever an obligation rests upon a person, arising out of a confidence reposed in him to apply property faithfully and according to such confidence.

2 Bouv. L. Dic. 615; 4 Kent, Com. 295; 3 Bl. Com. 431.

No particular form of words is requisite to create a trust. The court will determine the intent from the general scope of the language.

Perhaps the terms "merged" or "extinguished" would more properly be employed in defining what we understand to be the defendant's position in reference to our original claim.

It is well settled that merger never occurs in equity, unless justice or intent of parties demands it.

35 N.Y. 279.

The intention of the parties is the controlling consideration when it has been made known or can be inferred from their acts or conduct.

7 Wait, Act. & Def. 324 and cases cited; Campbell v. Carter, 14 Ill. 286.

An agreement under seal does not merge the debt if it is given and accepted as collateral only.

7 Wait, Act. & Def. 325; Charles v. Scott, 1 Serg. & R. 294.

In Butler v. Miller, 1 N. Y. 496, it was held in substance that taking a higher security would not merge the original debt in a case where the security was intended merely as collateral.

14 Johns. 404; 7 Cow. 662; 7 Wend. 248; 15 Wend. 155.

It was not necessary for the petitioners to trace the identical trust fund into the hands of the assignee to entitle them to an order directing him to pay the balance of their claim in full.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It may properly be conceded that the $3,000 received by White from the petitioners on the third day of January, 1883, for investment in the Gould mortgage, constituted in his hands a quasi trust fund, which White was bound to use for the specific purpose contemplated, and which he could not divert to any other use without committing a breach of trust. The securities which formed the greater part of the fund were immediately convertible into money; and authority in White to make such conversion was implied, but only as a means of realizing the money with which to make the mortgage loan.

The securities while in the hands of White remained the property of the petitioners, and when converted by him their title attached to the proceeds of the converted property. White collected the securities actually or constructively. He collected the notes against third persons and drew the money deposited in the Delaware National Bank. The two certificates of deposit issued by himself, amounting in the aggregate to $780, he accepted as money.

It is material to a proper understanding of the question presented, to state a few other facts, which appear in the record.

White was a private banker. On the 5th of January, 1883, two days after the transaction with the petitioners to which we have alluded, he was taken sick, and on or about the 9th of January a run commenced on the bank; and on the 12th of January he made a general assignment to the defendant, Gleason, for the benefit of creditors, having at the time on hand in cash assets only the sum of $64.75.

The Gould mortgage was never procured by White, and he made no investment for the petitioners of the $3,000, received on the third day of January. On the contrary it was found by the judge at special term that White, after receiving and collecting the securities, and prior to the 11th day of January, in violation of his trust, used the entire fund of $3,000 (except the sum of $30 which came to the hands of the assignee) in paying his personal debts and liabilities. But on the 11th of January, the day prior to the making of the assignment, for the purpose of securing the claim of the petitioners, he transferred to them a land contract, from which and other sources the petitioners have realized sufficient to reduce their claim to the sum of $877.27.

It was admitted on the hearing of the petition, which took place in January, 1885, that the assignee had then on hand proceeds of the assigned estate sufficient to pay the said sum of $877.27; but it was conceded by the petitioners that the assigned estate was insufficient to pay in full the debts of the assignor.

The special term has granted the prayer of the petitioners and made an order directing the assignee to pay the claim of the petitioners out of the money in his hands; and this order was affirmed by the general term. The order in effect appropriates out of the assigned estate the sum of $877.27 to the payment of the claim of the petitioners, in preference to the claims of the general creditors.

The petitioners, to maintain the order in question, rely upon the rule in equity that as between cestui que trust and trustee, and all parties claiming under the trustee otherwise than by purchase for valuable consideration, without notice, all property belonging to a trust, however much it may be changed or altered in its nature or character, and all the fruit of such property, whether in its original or altered state, continues to be subject to or affected by the trust. Pennell v. Deffell, 4 DeG. M. & G. 387, Turner, L. J.

This settled doctrine of equity has its basis in the right of property. The owner of personal property which, by the wrongful act of his agent or trustee, has been changed and converted into chattels of another description may elect to treat the property into which the conversion has been made as his own. Upon such election the title to the substituted property is vested in him as fully as if he had originally authorized the wrongful act, which title he may assert in a legal action to the same extent as he could have asserted title in respect to the original property.

The reason of the doctrine is stated by Lord Ellenborough in the leading case of Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 562, in language often quoted. "For," he says, "the product or substitute for the original thing still follows the nature of the thing itself, so long as it can be ascertained to be such, and the right only ceases when the means of ascertainment fail."

The question in that case involved the legal title to certain stock and bullion which an agent of the defendant, intrusted by his principal with money to invest in exchequer bills, had wrongfully misapplied to the purchase of the stock and bullion, intending to abscond with it and go to America; and the court sustained the defendant's title.

The courts go very far to protect the rights of property against a wrong doer. They follow it through whatever changes and transmutations it may undergo in his hands, and as against the wrong doer transfers to the changed and altered product the original title, however much the original property has been increased in value by his labor or expenditure, provided only that the product is still a chattel and is composed of the original materials. Silsbury v. McKoon, 3 N. Y. 379.

But a court of law as a general rule can deal only with the legal title; and when the legal identity of the property is destroyed, or the property cannot be traced specifically into another thing, it is powerless to give relief, except by action for damages against the wrong doer. This is implied in the language of Lord Ellenborough already quoted; and that language is followed by an illustration of his statement that the right to follow property only ceases when the means of ascertainment fail, "which," he remarks, "is the case when the subject is turned into money and mixed and confounded in a general mass of the same description."

It is not important to inquire whether later decisions have not established, even in respect to strictly legal actions, a somewhat less stringent limitation upon the right of pursuit than that indicated in the language just quoted. But it is unnecessary to pursue this inquiry here. It is clear that in this case the trust fund has been dissipated and lost by the act of the trustee. It is neither specifically in the hands of the trustee or of his assignee, nor is it represented by other property into which it has been converted. The fund according to the finding (with the exception of the sum of $30) was paid out on the debts of White before the assignment.

Plainly there is no room for any contention that the petitioners have legal title to any of the assigned property. The sole inquiry is whether a case is made for equitable intervention in favor of the petitioners, in the administration of the insolvent estate. It is clear we think that upon an accounting in bankruptcy, or insolvency, a trust creditor is not entitled to a preference over general creditors of the insolvent, merely on the ground of the nature of his claim; that is, that he is a trust creditor as distinguished from a general creditor. We know of no authority for such a contention. The equitable doctrine that as between creditors equality is equity admits, so far as we know, of no exception founded on the greater supposed sacredness of one debt, or that it arose out of a violation of duty, or that its loss involves greater apparent hardship in one case than another, unless it appears in addition that there is some specific recognized equity founded on some agreement, or the relation of the debt to the assigned property, which entitles the claimant, according to equitable principles, to preferential payment. If it appears that trust property specifically belonging to the trust is included in the assets the court doubtless may order it to be restored to the trust. So also if it appears that trust property has been wrongfully converted by the trustee, and constitutes, although in a changed form, a part of the assets, it would seem to be equitable and in accordance with equitable principles that the things into which the trust property has been changed should, if required, be set apart for the trust; or, if separation is impossible, that priority of lien should be adjudged in favor of the trust estate for the value of the trust property or funds or proceeds of the trust property, entering into and constituting a part of the assets. This rule simply asserts the right of the true owner to his own property.

But it is the general rule, as well in a court of equity as in a court of law, that in order to follow trust funds and subject them to the operation of the trust, they must be identified. A court of equity, in pursuing the inquiry and in administering relief, is less hampered by technical difficulties than a court of law; and it may be sufficient to entitle a party to equitable preference in the distribution of a fund in insolvency that it appears that the fund or property of the insolvent remaining for distribution includes the proceeds of the trust estate, although it may be impossible to point out the precise thing in which the trust fund has been invested, or the precise time when the conversion took place. The authorities require at least this degree of distinctness in the proof before preference can be awarded. See Van Alen v. American Nat. Bank, 52 N. Y. 1; Newton v. Porter, 69 N. Y. 133; Ferris v. Van Vechten, 73 N. Y. 113; Pennell v. Deffell, supra; Frith v. Cartland, 2 Hem. & M. 417.

The facts in this case fall short of the proof required, within any case which has come to our notice. The trust fund, with the single exception mentioned, was misappropriated by White to the payment of his private debts prior to the assignment. It cannot be traced into the property in the hands of the assignee, for the plain reason that it is shown to have gone to the creditors of White in satisfaction of their debts.

The courts below seem to have proceeded upon a supposed equity springing from the circumstance that by the application of the fund to the payment of White's creditors, the assigned estate was relieved pro tanto from debts which otherwise would have been charged upon it, and that thereby the remaining creditors, if entitled to distribution without regard to the petitioners' claim, will be benefited. We think this is quite too vague an equity for judicial cognizance; and we find no case justifying relief upon such a circumstance.

In a very general sense all creditors of an insolvent may be supposed to have contributed to the assets which constitute the residuum of his estate.

The case of People v. City Bank of Rochester, 96 N. Y. 32, seems to have been misunderstood. The question considered in this case was not raised there, and it was not claimed in that case that the proceeds of the checks of Sartwell, Hough & Co., the petitioners, had not gone into the general fund of the bank, or that they had not passed in some form to the receiver. The court did not decide nor intend to decide that the petitioners would have been entitled to a preference in case the proceeds of the checks had been used by the bank, and were not represented in its assets in the hands of the receiver.

For the reasons stated we are of opinion that the orders of the Special and General Terms should be modified, by reducing the sum directed to be paid by the assignee to the sum of $30, with interest from April 19, 1883, but without costs to either party.

All concur.

1. A general devise of lands in trust to executors to sell and convey them vests no title in the trustees.
2. A will directed that testator's residuary real estate be divided into two equal parts, "one of said parts to be paid" to a certain religious corporation and "the other of said parts to be paid by my executors" to a certain educational corporation,—continuing as follows: "And I give, bequeath and devise all my real and personal estate not hereinbefore specifically devised and bequeathed, to my said executors in trust for the payment of the bequests and legacies hereinbefore specified and ready to be paid; and for the purpose of executing such trust I hereby authorize and empower them to sell and convert all my real and personal estate into cash, and for that purpose authorize them to execute and deliver the necessary conveyances, assignments and releases of the same and to sell such estate or any part thereof at such time or times and upon such terms as to them shall seem proper." The executors conveyed certain of their decedent's real estate, and, the same being in the adverse possession of the defendants, brought this action of ejectment for the benefit of their grantee. Held,

   (a) That under the statute, no estate in land vested in the trustees under the above provisions of the will, since they were not authorized thereby to receive the rents and profits.

   (b) That if the power to sell conferred by the will might be exercised as a power in trust, although the provisions of the will were inoperative to create a valid express trust under the statute, yet in that event the title would, as provided by the statute, descend to the heirs at law, subject to the execution of the power.

   (c) That the claim that title in the executors was to be implied from the intent expressed in the clause containing the devises to said corporation is refuted by the adjudication in 43 N. Y. 424, holding that said devises were invalid to the extent of one half of the residuary estate, as being in conflict with the statute forbidding testamentary bequests to religious corporations, etc., in excess of one half of the testator's property.

   (d) That as testator's personal estate was more than sufficient to satisfy all valid legacies, an intent to satisfy devises by a sale of real estate cannot be drawn from said provisions of the will, and that therefore there was no equitable conversion of the realty so as to take it out of the statutory rules for the descent of real estate.

   (e) That there was no valid devise of the land either to the executors or to any other persons, and nothing to prevent its regular descent to the legal heirs of the testator.
3. The law never considers a conversion of real into personal property to have taken place, unless there has been a valid devise of the property in dispute in some form to a specified beneficiary and the purposes of the will require it to be done.
4. The decision in Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N.Y. 424, in which the present plaintiffs were defendants, and which held that such portion of testator's estate as was not well disposed of by will descended to his heirs at law and next of kin, held, under the doctrine of stare decisis, to be controlling in the present case.
5. The deed of the land in suit, executed by the executors, has no affirmative effect in supporting the cause of action.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Cattaraugus Circuit in favor of defendants, on a verdict directed by the court in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

Reported below, 36 Hun, 24.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Messrs. E. D. Northrup and William F. Cogswell, for appellants:

I. This will vested in the plaintiffs the whole undisposed of real estate of the testator, including the premises in question. By clauses 18 and 22 of said will they were directed to "sell and convert all his real and personal estate into cash," for the purpose of distribution, etc.

This provision operated in law as an equitable conversion of the real estate into money, and the title to it vested in the executors.

Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N.Y. 425, 431; Vincent v. New House, 83 N. Y. 512; Robert v. Corning, 89 N. Y. 239; Dodge v. Pond, 23 N. Y. 69, 76; Power v. Cassidy, 79 N. Y. 603, 613; Shumway v. Harmon, 6 Thomp. & C. 626; Stagg v. Jackson, 1 N.Y. 212; Forsyth v. Rathbone, 34 Barb. 388, 405; Leigh & D. Equitable Conversion, 5, 109; Reading v. Blackwell, 1 Baldw. C. C. 172: Moncrief v. Ross, 50 N. Y. 431; Tickel v. Quinn, 1 Dem. 425: Irish v. Huested, 39 Barb. 411; Lent v. Howard, 89 N. Y. 169; Hatch v. Bassett, 52 N. Y. 361; Shaw v. Chambers, 48 Mich. 355; Craig v. Leslie, 3 Wheat. 563 (16 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 460).

II. The twenty-second clause of said will says that they may make the sales "at such times and upon such terms as to them shall seem proper;" hence, it becomes their imperative duty to make such sale and conversion of the land in question, and to reduce it to possession to effectuate such sale.

Haight v. Brisbin, 96 N. Y. 132.

The authorities cited by the court below are not in point.

The case of White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 144, is not in point; it was one of a discretionary future conversion, after decease of the testator.

The case of Chitty v. Parker, 2 Ves. Jr. 271, cited in Leigh & D. Equitable Conversion, 95; 5 Law Lib. 49, was one where all the legacies had been paid out of the personal estate; and there was no further purpose of the will to be subserved, and the legacies were definite in amount.

The case of Hawley v. James, 16 Wend. 61, was a case of total failure or lapse.

A wide distinction exists between cases of an entire lapse and where there is only a partial lapse, as the authorities hereinafter cited show.

Where there is a total lapse, there is no equitable conversion; but where the lapse is only partial it is otherwise.

The case of Giraud v. Giraud, 58 How. Pr. 175, was also an action for the construction of a will, for the purpose of defining what should become of the proceeds of the equitable conversion, and is not a parallel to the case at bar.

In the case at bar the will directed a sale of the real estate in question. The estate is to be divided and paid, and invested in a certain manner, etc.

See Phelps v. Phelps, 28 Barb. 139; Harris v. Slaght, 46 Barb. 503, is nearly parallel to the case at bar; Van v. Barnett, 19 Ves. 102; Kirkman v. Miles, 13 Ves. 338; Ashby v. Palmer, 1 Meriv. 296. See also Maberly v. Strode, 3 Ves. 450; Gourley v. Campbell, 66 N. Y. 174-5; Leavitt v. Wolcott, 65 How. Pr. 51; 1 Wms. Exrs. 417 and cases cited; Downing v. Marshall, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 543; 2 Spence, Eq. Jur. 242; Burley v. Evelyn, 16 Sim. 290.

The executors have no power to partition the land itself among these many claimants of one half and the residuary legatees of the other half.

If this is not so, every sale of the real estate of the testator that the executors have made is void.

Throughout the whole administration of the estate, in all the various litigations that have arisen therein, the validity of those sales has been recognized and never questioned until the trial of this action.

29 Alb. L. J. 107.

The recent case of Mott v. Ackerman, 92 N. Y. 539, confirms this rule and also, at page 551, decides that the time is unlimited within which the executors may convey.

Hood v. Hood, 85 N. Y. 561; Messenger v. Casey, 18 N. Y. Week. Dig. 71; Robert v. Corning, 89 N. Y. 239.

The case of Kearney v. Missionary Society, 10 Abb. N. C. 274, cites Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N. Y. 424, 431, in support of the rule we have invoked, and also shows that the conversion took place, "out and out" at the death of the testator, and that the equitable conversion was not defeated by the inability of the beneficiaries to take the full amount of the gift in their favor, and that the lapsed portion was distributed as personalty.

Arnold v. Gilbert, 5 Barb. 190.

Betts v. Betts, 4 Abb. N. C. 318, citing Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, at page 386, confirms the same rule, and at page 418 and 419 citing Smith v. Claxton, 4 Madd. 484, clearly establishes this rule. And it also cites Bogert v. Hertell,* 4 Hill, 492, 501, in which Nelson, Ch. J., shows that where there is only a partial failure of the purpose of the conversion, the conversion takes place nevertheless. And in Downing v. Marshall, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 662, 667 the rule is affirmed.

Fisher v. Banta, 66 N. Y. 468; Re Mahan, 32 Hun, 78.

In Kane v. Gott,  24 Wend. 641, 659, Judge Cowen says that the land is to be treated "as if the testator had himself sold land and then bequeathed the consideration money."

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of 156 acres of land situated in the County of Cattaraugus, brought by the plaintiffs as executors of the will of Benjamin Chamberlain. The plaintiffs claim that Benjamin Chamberlain died seised of an estate in fee simple in such land, in February, 1868, and that therefore a power of sale, as well as the title thereto, became vested in them by virtue of the provisions of his will. They also claim that, having executed the power of sale by conveying the lands to one Freeman in 1880 for a valuable consideration, and such deed being void by reason of an adverse possession by the defendants at the time of its execution, this action is brought under the statute for his benefit to recover such lands.

It is an elementary rule in ejectment that the plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the strength of his own title and not upon the weakness of his adversary's; and this being so it will be unnecessary to consider the defenses pleaded in the answer, unless we come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs derived title to the premises under the will of the testator.

Upon the trial the court directed a verdict for the defendants, holding that the plaintiffs had shown no title in the premises; and the general term, on appeal, affirmed such judgment.

The question presented is determined by the provisions of the will and such additional force as may be given to the plaintiffs' claim by reason of the conveyance to Freeman, and the provisions of the statute authorizing an action for his benefit in the name of his grantors.

The provisions of the will are somewhat voluminous, but so far as they bear upon the questions under discussion are substantially comprised in its eighteenth and twenty-second subdivisions which read as follows: "18th. I hereby further will and direct that all my estate not otherwise herein before disposed of be divided into two equal parts, one of said parts to be paid to the Centenary Fund Society of the Erie Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to be by said corporation invested and kept permanently invested, and the interest and income thereof used and expended by said corporation for the benefit of Alleghany College at Meadville, Pennsylvania, in such manner and for such specific purposes as said corporation shall direct; and that the other of said parts be paid by my executors to the trustees of the Chamberlain Institute, to be by said trustees permanently invested in bonds and mortgages upon productive farming lands in this State, such mortgages to be first liens; the said principal to be kept permanently invested, and the interest and income thereof to be received by said trustees and by them used in the payment of the salaries of tutors and professors employed to teach in said institute, and in purchasing books and apparatus for the library of said institute," etc.

"22nd. I hereby further nominate and appoint as executors of this my last will and testament, Thomas J. Chamberlain, Amos Dow, Charles P. Adams and Alonzo Kent. And I give, bequeath and devise all my real and personal estate not herein before specially devised and bequeathed, to my said executors in trust for the payment of the bequests and legacies herein before specified and ready to be paid; and for the purpose of executing such trust I hereby authorize and empower them to sell and convert all my real and personal estate into cash, and for that purpose authorize them to execute and deliver the necessary conveyances, assignments and releases of the same, and to sell such estate or any part thereof at such time or times and upon such terms as to them shall seem proper."

It is of course well settled that a general devise of lands in trust to executors, to sell and convey them, vests no title in the trustees. Manice v. Manice, 43 N. Y. 304.

It will be observed that the testator has not by any express language attempted to vest the title of his real estate in his executors, and that is not claimed by the appellants; but they seek to imply his intent to do so from a consideration of the various provisions of the will, and mainly from that authorizing them to convert his real estate into cash. An unanswerable objection to such an implication seems to us to arise from the express provisions of the statute relating to uses and trusts, which practically forbids it unless, in addition to the creation of a valid trust, the power to take the rents and profits is also given to the executors.

It is not claimed that the devise contained in such clause is brought within the description of any of the express trusts authorized by statute, unless it may be that permitted by subdivision 2 of section 55, article 2, title 2, chapter 1, part 2, of the Revised Statutes, allowing the creation of a trust "To sell, mortgage, or lease land for the benefit of legatees, or to satisfy charges on it."

We are, however, of the opinion, for several reasons hereafter stated, that such a trust was not thereby created. The will directs the executors to divide the testator's whole residuary estate into two parts, one of which is directed to be paid to the Centenary Fund Society, and the other to the trustees of the Chamberlain Institute, and for the purpose of making such division they are authorized and empowered to sell and convert all of his real and personal estate into cash.

Undoubtedly a strong implication arises from the use of the word "paid" in directing the satisfaction of the legacies, that it was intended by the testator that the real estate should be converted into money and thus handed over to the legatees; but there is no imperative direction given to sell the lands, neither do the purposes of the will require such a sale; and a legal performance of the duties enjoined upon the executors could have been effected by a distribution of the property in specie to the legatees.

The distribution or division of the residuary estate between the named legatees was the main object contemplated by the testator, and not its sale; and although he might have intended a conversion of the real estate, it does not affect the transfer of the title unless the intention to do so is manifested in the mode and language required by the statute. That expressly provides in the case of such a trust that no estate in the land vests in the trustees unless they are also authorized to receive the rents and profits of the same. Sec. 56, R. S. supra.

Although the provisions of the will are inoperative to create a valid express trust under the statute, yet the power therein conferred might still be exercised as a power in trust; but in that event it is also expressly provided that the title shall descend to the heirs at law, subject to the execution of the power. R. S. §§ 56, 58, 59; Cooke v. Platt, 98 N. Y. 35; Konvalinka v. Schlegel, 6 Cent. Rep. 79; Downing v. Marshall, 23 N. Y. 366.

It was held in Cooke v. Platt that a merely discretionary power of sale in the executors for purposes of distribution, even though connected with the right to receive the rents and profits, did not vest them with title to real estate. Much less would this be so where no power to take rents and profits was given by the will or inferable from any of the purposes therein contemplated. See also White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 162.

The cases of Lent v. Howard, 89 N. Y. 175, and Donovan v. Van De Mark, 78 N. Y. 244, cited by the appellants, are not in conflict with the views expressed but rather tend to support them. In the first case it was held that the will did not vest the title in the executors, but that it descended to the heirs; but under the special provisions of the will it was decided that the right to the rents and profits of the real estate was separable from the right to the possession, and that those received by the executors intermediate the death of the testator and the execution of the power of sale were intended to be given to and belonged to the executors for the purposes of the will.

In Donovan v. Van De Mark it was held that the will devised the real estate to the executor in trust with power, either directly or inferentially, to receive the rents and profits and apply them according to his judgment, and that therefore a valid trust was created and a legal title vested in the trustee. In that case the right to take the rents and profits was by the will clearly intended to be given to the executor, and in that respect differs from the case at bar.

The argument that title in the executors was to be implied from the intent expressed in sections 18 and 22 to give it to them is effectually refuted by reason of the adjudication of this court in 43 N. Y. 424, holding that said devises were invalid, to the extent of one half of the residuary estate, as being in conflict with the provisions of the statute forbidding testamentary bequests to religious and other charitable societies or corporations in certain cases, in excess of one half of the testator's property. Laws 1860, chap. 360.

The case shows that the real estate of the testator embraced but a small portion of his property, and that the personal estate was much more than sufficient to satisfy all of the valid legacies. It was, therefore, the duty of the executors to satisfy such legacies from the personal estate; and resort to the real estate for such purpose could be had only when they were expressly charged upon it. An intent to satisfy these devises by a sale of the real estate cannot, therefore, be drawn from the provisions of this will. It is clear that there has been no valid devise of the land, either to the executors or to any other persons, and nothing to prevent its regular descent to the legal heirs of the testator. It is a settled principle of law that the legal rights of the heir or distributee to the property of deceased persons cannot be defeated, except by a valid devise of such property to other persons. Haxtun v. Corse, 2 Barb. Ch. 521; Jackson v. Schauber, 7 Cow. 195; Post v. Hover, 33 N. Y. 597; White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 144; Hawley v. *James, 16 Wend. 61.

It was said by the Chancellor in Haxtun v. Corse, 2 Barb. Ch. 521, that "It was not sufficient to deprive an heir at law or distributee of what comes to him by operation of law, property not effectually disposed of by will, that the testator should have signified his intention by his will that his heir or distributee should not inherit any part of his estate. But to deprive an heir or distributee of his share of the property which the law gives him in case of intestacy the testator must make a valid and effectual disposition thereof to some other person." It is, therefore, quite plain that the executors did not take title to the lands in question under the will, unless such claim can be supported upon some other theory than the one discussed.

It is however urged that the authority given the executors to sell and convey the real estate for the purposes of the will worked an equitable conversion, and so changed its character as to take it out of the operation of the rules provided by statute for the descent of real estate.

As we have seen, under the construction given to this will, there was no necessity in satisfying its purposes that there should be a conversion; and equity will never presume a conversion, unless it is demanded to accomplish the lawful purposes expressed in the will by the testator.

Judge Allen said, in 43 N. Y. 431, "If the residuary bequests are valid, there was an equitable conversion of the whole estate into personalty;" but he then proceeded to show that they were valid only to the extent of one half the value of the property; and it follows as a corollary from such conclusion that an equitable conversion had not taken place.

*See editorial note at beginning and digested citations at close of this case, Lawyers' edition. [Ed.]

This question came under consideration in White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 162, where Grover, J., said: "To constitute conversion of real estate into personal, in the absence of an actual sale, it must be made the duty of and obligatory upon the parties to sell in any event; such conversion rests upon the principle that equity considers that as done which ought to have been done. A mere discretionary power of selling produces no such result." It was also held in that case that so far as the will made no valid disposition of the real estate it vested in the heirs.

While in the determination of the claims of heirs, devisees and legatees, arising under a will, the law will consider a conversion of real into personal property to have taken place for certain purposes in special cases, it never does so unless there has been a valid devise of the property in dispute in some form, to a specified beneficiary, and the purposes of the will require it to be done. It was said by Judge Earl, in Wilder v. Ranney, 95 N. Y. 12, that "There may have been a conversion of this real estate into personalty for many purposes, but not for all purposes. It physically remained real estate, taxable as such, controllable as such, and it could only be conveyed as such; and the rules of law generally applicable to real estate remained applicable to this."

In that case it was held that an equitable conversion of the real estate did not authorize its sale and conveyance by one executor without the co-operation of his coexecutor.

The decision of this case might also, we think, have been rested altogether upon the former determination of this court in Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N. Y. 425, which rendered the questions therein determined stare decisis. The validity of the trust attempted to be created by the provisions in question, having there come under consideration, it was held that in so far as the testator attempted by the residuary clause to give to the institutions therein named more than one half of his residuary estate, his effort was ineffectual, and that such portion of his estate as was not well disposed of by will descended to the testator's heirs at law and next of kin.

Under this decision and in accordance with the remittitur transmitted to it, judgment was on the 3d of October, 1871, entered in the supreme court, in the clerk's office of Cattaraugus County, by which it was determined "that the real estate of the said Benjamin Chamberlain, which he held or owned at the time of his decease, descended to his heirs at law, subject to the execution of such of the valid and effectual provisions of said last will and testament as relate to or affect the same; and exempt as aforesaid from any claim or right of dower on the part of the said Lucy Chamberlain; and that in case, after the payment of the debts of the testator and the execution of the valid and effectual provisions of said last will and testament, there shall remain any surplus from the personal estate of said testator, such surplus shall and is hereby declared and held to belong to and shall be distributed and divided between and among the next of kin of said testator as their rights shall appear, in the manner provided by law in cases of intestacy."

The action in which this judgment was rendered was brought by one Calvin J. Chamberlain, in behalf of himself and the other heirs at law and next of kin of Benjamin Chamberlain against the plaintiffs herein, the executors of the said Benjamin Chamberlain, and the principal legatees under such will, to obtain a construction of its provisions. A necessary result of this determination under the doctrine of stare decisis is to foreclose all parties from the right or privilege of reopening or discussing again the questions therein determined.

It was said by Denio, J., in Towle v. Forney, 14 N. Y. 425, that "The cases, however, are extremely rare in which the determination of the highest appellate court can be properly departed from when the same legal question again arises before a court of the same government. If it shall be thought that an erroneous rule has been established by the adjudication relied on as a precedent, it is better that it should be changed by the Legislature by an Act which cannot retrospect than that the courts should overturn what they have themselves established, and thus disappoint all who have acted upon the rule which had been considered settled. If this is so where an abstract rule of law, determined in a prior case, is sought to be applied to new facts, the reason is stronger where, as in this case, a series of particular acts has been passed upon and held to produce a given legal result, and the same identical facts are again before the court between other parties. In such a case, there being no pretense of collusion and no reason to impute carelessness or inattention to the judges, the determination should be considered final and conclusive upon all persons in interest or who may become interested in the question, as well as upon the parties to the particular action." Chase v. Chase, 95 N. Y. 373.

This application of this doctrine to the case in hand seems particularly appropriate, inasmuch as a large estate has been administered by the present plaintiffs in accordance with the principles declared in the former decision, and the entire known property of the testator converted and distributed among the heirs at law, next of kin and legatees, by a judicial settlement before the surrogate, acquiesced in by all parties interested. As early as 1875 a large sum derived from the residuary estate had been equally distributed by judicial proceedings between the residuary legatees and the next of kin; and said legatees had executed and delivered to the plaintiffs proper vouchers acknowledging full satisfaction of their legacies.

But one question remains to be discussed, and that relates to the effect which the deed from the executors to Freeman has upon this action. It is clear that such a deed, being void under the statute, could have no affirmative effect in supporting the cause of action. While the statute in such a case authorizes the grantee in the deed to maintain an action in the name of his grantor to recover possession of the lands described from the occupant thereof, it is obvious that such deed adds nothing to the original right of the grantors. Code Civ. Proc. § 1501.

The intent of the statute was to enable the grantee to avail himself of a title which overreached the right of the adverse possessor and barred such possessor from making the objection that the plaintiff in the action had parted with his title. Such an action can be maintained independently of the consent of the grantor, and is supposed to be conducted by the grantee alone for his own benefit; but it must necessarily be sustained, if sustainable at all, upon the validity of the title originally existing in his grantor. It is brought in his name and upon the theory of an original right in him to the possession of the property. But it has been seen that the plaintiffs never acquired any title or right to the possession of the disputed premises. The title to the premises, originally existing in their testator, passed at the time of his death to his heirs; and from that time they alone had a right to the property and the exclusive right to maintain an action for its possession.

The power of sale given by the will to the executors could be made effectual only by its valid exercise, and this it is clear has never been effected. They stand, therefore, as plaintiffs in this case, precisely as though its exercise had never been attempted and they were asserting only the rights to the property which the will gave them. As we have before shown, they did not take the title by the will; and they have shown no other right to recover in this case.

The judgment should be affirmed.

All concur.

v.

Messrs. E. D. Northrup and William F. Cogswell, for appellants.

Messrs. John G. Hall and D. H. Bolles, for respondents.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case differs from the preceding case of Chamberlain v. Taylor only in respect to the execution of the power of sale contained in the will of Benjamin Chamberlain.

No proof was given in this case of any attempt to execute such power of sale; and the right of the plaintiffs to recover was rested wholly upon the right in the real estate conferred upon them by the will.

As we have seen in the preceding case, the title did not pass to them; and the judgment must, therefore, be affirmed.

All concur.

PEOPLE, ex rel. George W. OSTRANDER et al., Respts.,
v.
Alfred C. CHAPIN, as Comptroller etc., Appt.

1. The comptroller can be required by mandamus to hear and determine an application made to him by a purchaser at a state tax sale of real estate, to cancel the sale and refund the purchase money, where the purchaser alleges that the tax was invalid and presents proofs in support of his allegation. Laws of 1855, chap. 427.
2. The comptroller's power to cancel such sales is not restricted to cases where the invalidity appears on the face of the proceedings, but may be exercised in cases when the invalidity depends upon extrinsic facts to be established by evidence before him offered by the the purchaser, either before or after the deed.
3. Where a power is given by statute, everything necessary to make it effectual, or requisite to attain its end, is implied.
4. The power to cancel implies power to receive evidence of the defect, and to act upon such evidence. The comptroller has power to receive affidavits and to administer oaths to witnesses produced before him, on such inquiry.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming an order of the Albany Special Term granting a peremptory writ of mandamus compelling the Comptroller to hear and determine an application to set aside a state tax sale. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Denis O'Brien, Atty-Gen., for appellant:

It is submitted that it was the intention of the Legislature only to clothe the comptroller with power to correct any errors made by himself as an officer of the State, or any error that appears on the face of the record, and that he cannot be compelled to act as a court of inquiry at the suggestion of every purchaser at a tax sale.

Section 848 of the Code of Civil Procedure gives the comptroller no judicial powers in the case in hand.

People v. Chapin, 2 Cent. Rep. 467; Mayor v. Davenport, 92 N. Y. 612; Cagwin v. Hancock, 84 N.Y. 537.

If the Comptroller had any discretion to exercise upon the question of entertaining the application of the relators herein, then the court at special term had no right to sit in judgment upon his exercise thereof, or to coerce his action in that behalf.

People, ex rel. Demorest, v. Fairchild, 67 N.Y. 334.

The question in this case is not simply whether the Comptroller had the right or power to receive an affidavit or to examine a witness who voluntarily appears before him, but whether, "coupled with his lack of power to compel the attendance of witnesses" or to protect himself against imposition from falsehood and perjury, he should be compelled, by mandamus, to entertain such a proceeding, and to receive such evidence. It is submitted that his discretion in this particular is no more the subject of review by the courts than his action would be in case he had entertained the application, heard the evidence, and then denied it. He did hear the application, but refused to receive or be bound by the evidence offered.

People, ex rel. Hammond, v. Leonard, 74 N.Y. 443.

But the refusal of the Comptroller to entertain the application of the relators, and to take the action requested of him, may be upheld upon any ground that now appears, which could not have been remedied if the point had been raised by the comptroller upon the application.

Allard v. Greasert, 61 N.Y. 4.

The papers presented to the Comptroller show that the sale sought to be set aside took place in 1871 and the irregularity complained of took place between 1861 and 1865. The Comptroller should not be compelled to entertain such a proceeding as this after such an unreasonable delay.

People, ex rel. Millard, v. Chapin, 5 Cent. Rep. 916; People. Sheridan, v. French, 31 Hun, 618.

Mr. Arthur L. Andrews, for respondents:

A mandamus is the proper remedy.

The power to make cancellation of invalid tax sales is conferred upon the Comptroller by the statute.

Laws 1855, chap. 427, §§ 83, 85.

Any person interested in a power conferred by statute may apply for a mandamus to compel an exercise of the power.

People, Ward, v. Asten, 49 How. Pr. 405; affirmed in 62 N.Y. 623; People, Boltzer, v. Daley, 37 Hun, 461.

The Comptroller is authorized to take such proofs of alleged irregularities as will enable him to determine whether the sale is ineffectual to give title.

It is urged, on the part of the Comptroller, that he has no power to summon witnesses, nor are they liable to punishment in case of false testimony.

Whenever a power is given by statute, everything necessary to make it effectual or requisite to attain the end is implied.

1 Kent, Com. 464; Stief v. Hart, 1 N.Y. 20.

It is respectfully submitted that the views of the respondents are sustained by the decision of this court in Clark v. Davenport, 95 N. Y. 477.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this appeal is whether the Comptroller can be required by mandamus to hear and determine an application made to him by a purchaser at a state tax sale of real estate, to cancel the sale and refund the purchase money, where the purchaser alleges that the tax was invalid, and presents proofs in support of his allegation.

Chapter 427 of the Laws of 1855, § 83, provides as follows: "Whenever the comptroller shall discover, prior to the conveyance of any lands sold for taxes, that the sale was for any cause whatever invalid or ineffectual to give title to the land sold, the lands so improperly sold shall not be conveyed; but the comptroller shall cancel the sale, and forthwith cause the purchase money and interest thereon to be refunded, out of the state treasury, to the purchaser, his representatives or assigns."

Section 85 provides that if the discovery that the sale was invalid shall not be made until after the conveyance, it shall be the duty of the comptroller on receiving evidence thereof to cancel and refund, etc., and to recharge the county, from which the tax was returned, with the amount refunded.

The tax sale in this case was made by the Comptroller in 1871, for the unpaid taxes of the years 1861 to 1865, inclusive, upon certain lands in the Town of Wells in Hamilton County. The purchaser paid the purchase money and received the usual certificates of sale, and afterwards assigned them to the relators. No deed appears to have been given by the Comptroller conveying the land sold.

The relators claim that they have found that the board of supervisors of the County of Hamilton did not in any of the years for the taxes of which the lands were sold, estimate and set down in the assessment rolls, the sums to be paid as a tax upon the lands, as required by 1 R. S. 395, § 33; and this omission, the relators allege, rendered the sale invalid, and ineffectual to give title to the lands sold.

Or on about the 8th of December, 1885, they made application, by petition in writing, to the Comptroller for a cancellation of the sales, and the refunding of the purchase money. Their petition set forth the sale and the issuing of the certificates, and alleged that the supervisors of the several towns of Hamilton County, and Town of Wells, failed to extend the tax on the several assessment rolls, as a board of supervisors, but delegated to each individual member to do the same and did not subsequently ratify said extension. The petition was accompanied with the certificates of the sales and the assignments thereof.

In August, 1886, the relators, through their counsel, requested the Comptroller to take action on their application, and produced to him the affidavit of the clerk of the board of supervisors of Hamilton County, who was in office during the year 1861 to 1865, both inclusive, and also the affidavit of one of the members of said board, substantiating the allegations of their petition; and at the same time offered to produce satisfactory evidence of the defect alleged, from witnesses who knew the facts.

On the 20th of August, 1886, the Comptroller sent to the attorneys for the relators the following communication refusing their request.

"State of New York,
Comptroller's Office,
Albany, August 20, 1886.

In the Matter of the Request to Grant Application 223 on the Production of Satisfactory Proof of Irregularities not Patent on the Face of the Records.

Stedman, Thompson & Andrews,
Albany, N. Y.

Gentlemen: While I do not question the force of the authorities cited by the applicant in making this special request, and while I have no reason to doubt his ability to produce before me evidence of the kind and force that would be required upon a trial in court, it, nevertheless, seems to me that his request is, practically, that I should assume judicial powers and functions not conferred upon me. The so-called common-law evidence which the applicant offers to produce before me, would not, after all, be evidence in any technical sense. It would be such, superficially; but it would not and could not be invested with the attributes, or expose the witness giving it to the penalties, accompanying the giving of true or false testimony under legal oath before a duly qualified tribunal. The applicant's request is, therefore, denied.

Respectfully Yours,
Alfred C. Chapin, Comptroller."

The relators thereupon, on affidavits stating the foregoing facts, made a motion in the supreme court at special term for a writ of mandamus commanding the Comptroller to proceed to hear, act upon and determine the application made by the relators, and to receive such evidence, to be offered by the applicants, as would be competent in a court of justice, or such proof as is authorized by statute.

In opposition to the motion the Comptroller presented his own affidavit, setting forth his letter of August 20, and alleging that, in his belief, the statutes of this State did not clothe him with the power to examine, in a judicial capacity, evidence aliunde the record, for the reasons set forth in said letter.

The position taken by the Comptroller thus appears to have been that the Act of 1855, authorizing him to cancel tax sales and cause the purchase money to be refunded to the purchaser, or his assigns (Laws of 1855, chap. 427, § 83), applied only to cases where the invalidity of the sale appeared upon the face of the proceedings, and that he had no power to cancel a sale where the invalidity did not thus appear, but had to be established by extrinsic evidence.

The motion for a mandamus was granted by the court at special term, and the order was affirmed at general term; and the Comptroller now appeals to this court.

We are of opinion that the powers of the Comptroller, under the Statute of 1855, are not so restricted as he contends. The statute, so far from providing merely that he may cancel the sale on discovering that it is invalid for any cause appearing on the face of the proceedings, enacts that when he discovers that it is for any cause whatever invalid or ineffectual to give title to the lands sold, he shall cancel the sale and forthwith cause the purchase money, with interest, to be refunded to the purchaser.

This statute was evidently intended to vest the Comptroller with power to make restitution to purchasers at tax sales, of the purchase money paid by them, whenever it should be found that the sale was ineffectual, for any reason, to enable them to obtain title to the land which they had bought and paid for. This was just to the purchasers, who were entitled under section 63, of the same Act of 1855, to a title in fee, but who at the time of the passage of the Act of 1855 would have had no legal remedy to recover back their money from the State in case their title failed. It is not certain that they would have any remedy now unless one is afforded by the Act of 1855. The remedial feature of that Act is also supported by consideration of sound policy, as it was calculated to encourage persons to bid at tax sales, by the assurance that they would either get title to the land they bought, or a return of their money, and were not likely to lose both. It was beneficial to the land owner, because it tended to make his land bring a better price at the sale, and also to the State, as it tended to enable it to collect its unpaid taxes, by encouraging purchases at tax sales.

To restrict the Comptroller in this power of canceling sales, to cases where the invalidity appears upon the face of the proceedings, would not only do violence to the language of the statute, but would frustrate its intent. The intent was to protect the purchaser in case the sale was found to be ineffectual to give him title. This protection would be very inadequate if it left him to take the risk of all the many other defects which might exist in a tax title. As to those, the purchaser would have had no remedy except by petitioning the Legislature in case his title proved invalid, for in 1855 there was no other mode of obtaining redress from the State; and it is at least questionable whether the subsequent statutes, establishing the board of audit and the board of claims, would afford a remedy.

Section 85 of the same Act shows very clearly that by the words "for any cause whatever" the intention was to provide for cases where the invalidity depended upon extrinsic facts, to be established by evidence, for that section provides for the cancellation of the invalid sale after the Comptroller's deed has been executed, and declares it to be the duty of the Comptroller upon receiving evidence that the sale was invalid, to cancel it and refund the purchase money. It cannot be conceived that the Legislature intended to draw a distinction between the two cases, and to provide that where a deed had been executed the Comptroller should receive evidence, and that where no deed had been executed he was not empowered to receive evidence of the invalidity of the sale. Taking the two sections together it seems plain that it was intended that in both cases the Comptroller should receive evidence, and that it was implied that the purchaser, who was the party interested, should have the right to offer such evidence.

The Act of 1873, chap. 120 (referred to in the opinion of Peckham, J., at special term), is confirmatory of this view. That Act provided for setting aside cancellations whenever they have been obtained by fraud, misrepresentation or suppression of any material fact, or by a mistake of fact.

This statute is entirely inconsistent with the theory that the Comptroller was limited in his power of cancellation to defects appearing on the face of the proceedings and could not consider extrinsic facts. The Comptroller objects that the affidavits produced to him, and the testimony of witnesses offered on the part of the relators, were not evidence in a technical sense, because he was not vested with judicial powers and functions, and such affidavits and testimony would not expose the witnesses to the penalties accompanying the giving of false testimony under legal oath before a duly qualified tribunal. This is one of the grounds upon which he bases his refusal to consider or act upon the proofs offered.

We think the Comptroller had legal authority to receive and act upon the proofs offered, and that they did constitute legal evidence. He was clearly authorized to decide the question of the validity or invalidity of the tax sales, at least as between the State and the purchaser, and for the purpose of determining whether the purchaser was entitled to have the purchase money paid by him refunded out of the state treasury. This was in the nature of a judicial function conferred upon him by law. It is a general principle that where a power is given by statute, everything necessary to make it effectual, or requisite to attain its end, is implied. 1 Kent, Com. 464; Stief v. Hart, 1 N. Y. 20, 30.

To enable him to decide whether or not the tax sales were invalid, for any cause whatever, and ineffectual to give title, it was necessary that he should receive evidence of the facts showing their invalidity. The power to cancel therefore implies power to take proof of the defect. Indeed, in section 85 it is in terms made the duty of the comptroller to receive evidence that the sales were invalid and to act upon such evidence. That section says that "It shall be the duty of the Comptroller, on receiving evidence thereof, to cancel the sale," etc.

If witnesses should be produced before him he is expressly authorized by law to swear them; 1 R. S. 185, § 1; and all the power required to enable him to conduct the investigation is conferred upon him by section 823 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides, among other things, that "Where an officer, board or committee, to whom, or to which, application is made to do an act in an official capacity, requires information or proof to enable him or it to decide upon the propriety of doing the act, he or it may receive an affidavit for that purpose;" and the same section provides that whenever an officer, etc., is authorized to receive an affidavit he may swear the deponent.

The Comptroller was thus vested, at the time the application was made to him by the relators, with legal authority not only to receive the affidavits tendered, but also to administer oaths to the witnesses who might be produced before him; and section 96 of the Penal Code is broad enough in its provisions to subject a witness or deponent to the pains and penalties of perjury for swearing falsely on such a hearing or inquiry by the Comptroller.

The learned attorney-general, in support of the Comptroller's appeal, takes the further point that the statute was intended to provide only for cases where the invalidity results from some defect in the proceedings of the Comptroller himself, in respect to the sale. We can find nothing in the statute to support this theory. The provision is that if, for any cause whatever, the sale should be discovered to have been invalid, or ineffectual to give title, the purchase money shall be returned and the sale canceled. If the tax itself, which was the foundation of the power to sell, is found to have been void, the sale, however regularly conducted, is ineffectual to give title to the land sold. The failure of title is the essential ground upon which restitution is to be made. The argument that the only invalidity which the Comptroller can consider is a defect in his own proceedings is conclusively answered by section 84 of the same Act, which provides that if the error originated with the town or county officers, the amount refunded shall be charged to the county and reassessed by the board of supervisors and paid to the state treasurer.

Some criticism is made upon the language of section 83, viz.: that if the Comptroller shall discover that the sale was invalid, etc., he shall cancel it, etc. The statute could not have been intended to be confined to cases where the Comptroller, by his own unaided researches and without suggestion from anyone else, makes the discovery. We think that the meaning was that where he shall find, or it shall be made apparent to him, that the defect exists, he shall act. When the purchaser satisfies him by evidence that he can get no title under the sale, we think that it is his duty to discover it and to cause the purchase money to be refunded. Section 85 expressly provides that "on receiving evidence" of the invalidity he shall act.

We are also of opinion that mandamus is the proper remedy to set the Comptroller in motion, where he refuses to entertain or act upon an application of this description. It is not claimed that he can be directed by that writ how to decide the question, but only to receive the evidence and exercise his judgment upon it. Being vested by the statute with power to decide, the purchaser (whose money is in the state treasury), having a legal interest in having his right to a return of it determined, is entitled to apply for a mandamus to compel the exercise of the power.

Besides, the statute is in terms mandatory, and declares that on discovery of the defect the Comptroller shall cancel the sale and cause the purchase money to be forthwith refunded.

The relators presented to the Comptroller prima facie evidence which, if true, showed that the taxes and the sales were invalid and that they were entitled to be refunded the purchase money; Bellinger v. Gray, 51 N. Y. 610, 617; People v. Hagadorn, 104 N. Y. 6 Cent. Rep. 658; and they offered to produce further satisfactory evidence of the facts alleged.

We think it was the duty of the Comptroller to hear and decide the case, and that the mandamus was properly granted.

The order should be affirmed.

All concur.

v.

Artemas S. CADY, Clerk of Arrears, Respt.

1. The words "belonging to the same owner," in Laws 1843, chap. 230, art. 3, § 8, providing that, in advertising lots to be sold for the nonpayment of taxes in New York City, it shall be the duty of the comptroller to advertise all lots lying contiguous to each other and belonging to the same owner, in one parcel, unless otherwise requested by such owner,—do not mean simply the technical owner of the title, but the person in whose name as owner or occupant the lots are assessed.

2. A sale of land for a term of years for nonpayment of taxes in New York City is not rendered void by the fact that the notice to redeem required the owner to pay the tax, with interest from the date of sale, whereas the purchaser did not pay his money upon such sale until some time thereafter.

3. A notice of sale, etc., required by section 20 of article 3 of said Act, made out in July, 1868, to the person appearing as assessed on the assessor's book for 1867, must be taken to be a notice to the then last assessed owner of the premises.

4. Section 23 of article 3 of said Act requires that the affidavit of service of said notice shall be made by a person "residing in the City of New York;" the affidavit in this case had the venue of "City and County of New York," and continued, "I, ——— ———, of the City of New York, do solemnly swear," etc. Held, that the intendment was that the person making the affidavit was a resident of the city; that the statute does not require the fact of residence to be stated in the affidavit; and that so long as the fact exists it would seem sufficient.

5. An affidavit stating that said notice was served by "leaving the same with a member of the family of the person last assessed as owner, at his place of residence, No. 68 Fifth Avenue," held, a sufficient compliance with section 21 of article 3 of said Act.

6. A commissioner of deeds is authorized to take said affidavit of service, and where the venue of the affidavit is stated as "City and County of New York" and the certificate thereto is signed by a person as "Commissioner of Deeds," the presumption is that the person so signing is a commissioner of deeds within the place stated in the venue.

APPEAL from an order of the General Term of the Superior Court of New York City, affirming an order of the Special Term denying a motion for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel defendant to accept a payment for taxes and interest. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Alexander B. Johnson, for appellant:

Relator has a lawful right to pay this tax unless the sale was valid, and the notice necessary to cut off the right of redemption was served as required by law.

Desty, Tax. p. 890; Bensel v. Gray, 12 Jones & S. 375; Clementi v. Jackson, 92 N. Y. 594; Townshend v. Cady, 19 Jones & S. 318; Townshend v. Cady, 18 Jones & S. 399; Hilton v. Bender, 69 N. Y. 81; Miner v. Beekman, 50 N. Y. 343.

The lease given on such sale furnishes no evidence per se of the regularity of any of the proceedings, either prior to the sale or subsequent to it.

Striker v. Kelly, 7 Hill, 9; Doughty v. Hope, 1 N. Y. 79; Vogler v. Walsh, 22 Hun, 140.

The sale was invalid because the two lots were contiguous to each other and were advertised and sold separately, without the request of the owner.

Laws 1873, chap. 230, art. 3 § 8.

The owner is aggrieved by the enhanced expense thereby created.

The case of Cunningham v. Cassidy, 17 N. Y. 276, has no application.

The alleged sale herein was in a proceeding in derogation of the common law and the effect of it would be to devest an owner of property without notice and for a trifling sum of money. A proceeding in derogation of common law must be strictly pursued.

Cooley, Tax. p. 324.

The notice to redeem required redemption by paying interest from date of sale, to wit: January 20, 1866; whereas, the purchaser paid his money February 12, 1866, and the notice was therefore wholly void.

Haddock v. Cady, Daily Reg. April 7, 1886.

The taxes were void and the sales based on them were void; the one lot in 1860 was assessed to A. Carrigan and the other to Mrs. Lyons; at such times Mrs. Gray was the owner.

Section 5, chapter 410, Laws of 1867, did not apply to any assessment already made.

1 R. S. 389; Whitney v. Thomas, 23 N. Y. 281; Paillet v. Youngs, 4 Sandf. 60; Sanders v. Leavey, 34 Barb. 75.

The right of relator to pay this tax was conceded at the special term unless the notice was filed as required by sections 20–23, et seq.

Laws 1843, chap. 230, art. 3; Donahue v. O'Conor, 13 Jones & S. 278.

There must be a substantial compliance with the law.

Newell v. Wheeler, 48 N. Y. 486; Hilton v. Bender, 69 N. Y. 79.

The notices filed and served are wholly defective, are not in compliance with the statute, and do not operate to cut off the owner's right to redeem.

The Act of 1843 only required that the notice should be served upon the last assessed owner; this was imperative in every case.

Laws 1843, chap. 230, art. 3, § 20.

The intention of the Law of 1843 was undoubtedly to give the actual owner notice. Because at the period of its enactment and up to 1867, the tax would be void if not assessed to the actual owner.

1 R. S. 389; Whitney v. Thomas, 23 N. Y. 281; Paillet v. Youngs, 4 Sandf. 60; Gilbert v. Havemeyer, 2 Sandf. 506; Sanders v. Leavey, 38 Barb. 75; Newell v. Wheeler, 48 N. Y. 486.

In 1867, prior to the assessment for the year previous to the service of these notices, this requirement was dispensed with so far as New York City was concerned.

Laws 1867, chap. 410, § 5.

The next change was made by chapter 381, Laws of 1871, requiring service of such notice in all cases, upon the actual owner.

By this change of the law the year prior to the notice of these services, the policy of the Act of 1843 was unintentionally defeated.

Relator therefore claims the strictest construction of these statutes in his favor.

These notices show upon their face that they were not served upon the last assessed owner.

The learned justice at special term erred in his conclusion that the burden of proof was upon the owner to show that there was no service upon the last assessed owner; because the Act of 1843 throws that burden upon the purchaser.

To perfect his title he must preserve his notice and file it with proof of service in order to devest the owner's title. Even the certificate of the comptroller is not conclusive upon this point.

Jackson v. Esty, 7 Wend. 148; Bush v. Davison, 16 Wend. 553; Doughty v. Hope, 1 N. Y. 79.

A. Carrigan is notified that the lot was taxed in his name as owner on the assessors' book of the twelfth ward for the year 1867.

This notice is dated July 25, 1868.

Upon May 1, 1868, the assessment for the year 1868 was completed and the notice should have been directed to and served upon the person who was assessed as owner in the year 1868.

Re Schell, 76 N. Y. 432; Re Scholle, 14 Hun, 14.

The affidavit of Kingsland that he served the notice is defective, in that it does not show that Kingsland resided in New York. The description "of New York" does not necessarily show that he resided there; he may have done business there, and described himself in that manner, while he, in fact, resided elsewhere.

The affidavit is defective in that it does not show where service was made. It says at "68 Fifth Avenue." The justice at special term says the burden of proof is upon the relator to show that "68 Fifth Avenue" is not in New York.

The relator could not show that it was not in New York any more than he could show it was not in Brooklyn, Philadelphia or any other large city.

These presumptions cannot be indulged in cases where, by adverse proceedings, the owner of land is devested of his title for a trivial sum.

The purchaser must see to it that the notice of proof of service complies strictly with the law.

Hilton v. Bender, 69 N. Y. 79; Cruger v. Dougherty, 43 N. Y. 107.

The affidavits of service were not sworn to before any officer authorized to administer oaths in such a case, and therefore are a nullity on their face.

A commissioner of deeds is a creature of the statute and his duties and powers are definitely prescribed.

The Revised Statutes provide as follows:

Section 41. Commissioners of deeds appointed for any county or city have power: 1, to take the proof and acknowledgment of conveyance and the discharge of mortgages; 2, to take the acknowledgment of bail in any action in the supreme court and in the court of common pleas in the county for which they were appointed, or in the mayor's court of the city for which they are appointed, and in the City and County of New York, in any action in the superior court of law therein; 3, to take the acknowledgment of satisfaction of judgments in the court of common pleas of the county for which they are appointed, or mayor's court of the city for which they are appointed, or in the supreme court, and to perform such other duties as are or may be enjoined by law.

Section 49 provides: "Whenever any oath or affidavit is or may be required or authorized by law in any cause, matter or proceeding (except oaths to jurors and witnesses in the trial of a cause, oaths of office and such other oaths as are required by law to be taken before particular officers), the same may be taken before any judge in any court of record, any circuit judge, supreme court commissioner, commissioner of deeds, or clerk of any court of record, and when certified by any such officer to have been taken before him, may be read and used in any court of law or equity of record, or not of record, within this State, and before any officer, judicial, executive or administrative, before whom any such cause, matter or proceeding may be pending."

2 Edm. ed. pp. 293, 294; chap. 3, pt. 3, title 2.

Section 49 applies only to matters pending before the courts. Therefore it follows that a commissioner of deeds was not authorized to administer an affidavit such as appears in this case.

The affiant could not be convicted of perjury if the statements made by him were false, and such an instrument stands on the same footing as a foreign passport.

Stanton v. Ellis, 16 Barb. 319; Lane v. Morse, 6 How. Pr. 394.

Mr. D. J. Dean, for respondent:

The sale for taxes was not invalid.

The right to avoid the sale for taxes was undoubtedly lost by aquiescence and unexplained neglect.

Cunningham v. Cassidy, 17 N. Y. 276; followed in 9 Daly, 22.

The very statute on which the relator relies, in his application for mandamus, expressly provided that the lease given by the city to the purchaser at a tax sale should be "conclusive evidence that the sale was regular, according to the provisions" of the Act.

Laws 1843, chap. 230, art. 3, § 2.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator herein asks the court to compel the defendant by mandamus to accept certain moneys sufficient in amount, as he alleges, to pay the taxes and interest on two certain lots in the City of New York for the year 1860, and to give receipted bills therefor. The defendant is Clerk of Arrears in the city and has refused to give such receipt, on the ground, among others, that there are no arrears of taxes against the premises for the year spoken of, because they have been sold for such arrears, and the sale took place January 20, 1866, and on the 19th of January, 1869, a lease thereof was granted for 1,000 years for each lot.

Several different grounds are stated in relator's affidavit, upon which this application is based, all of which have been held untenable by the special and general terms; and from this adverse determination he has appealed here.

The more material grounds will be noticed in their order.

First. It was claimed that the sale was illegal and conveyed no title to the purchaser because of the alleged violation of the eighth section of the third article of chapter 230 of the Laws of 1843, relating to the collection of taxes in the City of New York.

It seems that the premises in question were known in 1860 as lots 13 and 14, block 1272, of the twelfth ward of the city, and were contiguous lots. Lot 13 was in 1860 assessed to A. Carrigan, and the other lot was assessed to Mrs. Lyons, and the taxes so assessed remained unpaid until January 20, 1866, when each lot was sold for such arrears.

The relator alleges that these lots belonged to the same owners (Rose Hannah Gray and Florence Kuberly) from August 1, 1859, to April 4, 1866; that they were contiguous to each other, and that the city comptroller advertised said lots for sale in separate parcels without the consent or request of the owner.

The section of the statute in question reads as follows: "Section 8. In advertising houses and lots, improved or unimproved lands, to be sold for the nonpayment of taxes, it shall be the duty of the comptroller to advertise all the houses and lots or other lands lying contiguous to each other and belonging to the same owner, in one parcel, unless otherwise requested by such owner."

We are of the opinion that the words "belonging to the same owner" in the above section do not mean simply the technical owner of the title, but as therein used they mean the person in whose name as owner or occupant the lots are assessed. The assessment rolls are the only record the comptroller has before him from which to decide who is the owner, and in cases where the land was assessed to the occupant (as in some cases it might be, 1 R. S. 389, § 2; Whitney v. Thomas, 23 N. Y. 281, 285) the comptroller would be without any evidence of ownership.

It cannot be supposed that under such circumstances the statute contemplated a search by the comptroller through the register's office, to find out whether the lands which were assessed to different occupants but which were contiguous were not owned by the same owner, for the purpose of deciding whether to advertise them in one parcel or not. For this purpose the person assessed must be assumed to be the owner.

If contiguous lots were assessed to the same occupants, it would be reasonable to say that the statute contemplated an advertisement of both lots in one parcel; while if they were assessed to different occupants, it would justify a separate advertisement by the comptroller, even though it should subsequently turn out that the lots belonged to the same owner, unless some proof of ownership should have been given before advertising, and some demand should have been made to advertise in one parcel.

This construction gives to the statute a reasonable meaning, one easily capable of being carried out, and with a fair presumption that the object of the provision would be attained. That object we think was to prevent an unnecessary accumulation of costs of advertising, where the lots were contiguous, and being assessed to the same person one advertisement would answer every purpose. Within this construction the separate advertisement of these contiguous lots was proper. We do not mean, by putting our decision on this ground, to say that the statute is not merely directory on this point. We leave that question open.

Second. Another ground upon which the sale is alleged to be void is set up in the following language: "Deponent further says that deponent believes that said Cady based his refusal to accept such money on a pretended sale for nonpayment of such tax; and deponent alleges that such sale, if had, was wholly void * * * 2d. Because the comptroller, by his notice to redeem, required the owner to pay such tax with interest from date of sale, to wit: January 20, 1866; whereas, the purchaser did not pay his money upon such sale until the 12th day of February, 1866."

No copy of this notice to redeem is set forth in the moving papers, and its contents appear only as above stated. Under section 1 of article 3, of this chapter the comptroller proceeds to advertise for sale and to sell lands upon which taxes have been unpaid for a certain time. The sale takes place at the time named in the advertisement, unless the taxes are paid in the meantime, and the lands are sold for the lowest term of years which a person will bid and pay the taxes due thereon. A certificate of sale is to be given, describing the lands purchased, stating the term of years for which they were sold, the sum paid, and the time when the purchaser will be entitled to a lease.

There can be no doubt, as it seems to us, that the term of years for which the bid is made commences to run from the time of the bid, which is the day of sale. The time when the purchaser is to be entitled to his lease should also be reckoned from the date of the sale. As these two periods commence running from that date, we think the certificate of sale should also bear the same date. The certificate is simply a written acknowledgment or proof that the sale itself has taken place. It is the sale which is the foundation for all subsequent proceedings; and upon such sale is based the right to convey the title to the purchaser when the time expires which will entitle him to the conveyance for the term he bid at such sale. This formal written certificate may perhaps as matter of fact be actually made out and delivered some time after the sale; but it is executed and takes effect by virtue of the sale and relates back to that time, and in contemplation of law is then given and should be thus dated.

It is further provided, by the second section of that article, that six months before the expiration of two years after the sale the comptroller again advertises that unless the land be redeemed by a certain day it will be conveyed to the purchaser.

If the person claiming title to the land shall not within two years from the date of the certificate pay the proper amount to the comptroller he loses his land. It is thus seen that, the date of the sale and the date of the certificate of sale being properly coincident, there is nothing material in the fact that the sale in this case was on the 20th of January, while the purchaser did not pay his money until the 12th of February following. The time of the payment of the purchase money does not determine the date of the certificate; and as there is no allegation as to what that date was, it will be presumed here that it was the proper date, viz.: the date of the day of sale.

We are aware that it has been argued that the certificate of sale should be dated as of the day when issued, if not actually issued on the day of sale, for it is then, as it is said, that the purchaser pays his money; otherwise the owner in redeeming has to pay interest to the purchaser at the rate of 14 per cent between the day of sale and the day when the purchaser pays the amount of his bid, while during that time the money has been in the pocket of the purchaser. This may be a possible result in practice, if the comptroller does not insist (as he may) upon immediate payment of the amount of his bid by the purchaser.

But this interest is imposed chiefly by way of penalty upon the delinquent taxpayer; and the fact that, as practically conducted, the sales by the comptroller may sometimes result in the payment to the purchaser of interest for a short time upon moneys not yet advanced by him, is not of much weight in that view of the law. It is certainly of not enough weight to cause us to vary from a construction of the statute which we think reasonable and proper, where the result of the opposite construction might be to avoid the bar of the statute in all cases where the day of sale and the date of the certificate were different, and the notice to redeem called for payment of interest from the earlier date.

Third. The relator claims that the notices which section 20* of the third article of the same statute requires should be served by or in behalf of the purchaser (after he has received his conveyance) upon the person last assessed as owner, were not served on such person; and the fact as he claims appears upon the face of the notice.

As to lot 13, one notice is directed to the Asylum for Lunatics as the occupant at that time (July 26, 1868), and another to "A. Carrigan, last assessed owner of said premises;" and the latter notice, bearing the same date as the other, states that the lot (13) was taxed in that name on the assessors' book for the year 1867. The same facts with different names apply to lot 14. The criticism made is that the assessors' book for 1868 was at that time, July 26, 1868, the last book, and hence the notice was addressed to one appearing on a former but not necessarily the last roll, and that therefore it did not appear that the notice was to the person last assessed as owner.

We have no doubt that in July, 1868, the person assessed in 1867 was the last assessed owner. The assessments against persons and property in New York City at that time were commenced on the first Monday of September in each year (Laws 1859, chap. 302, § 7); and these assessments were put in books called "The Annual Record of the Assessed Valuation of Real and Personal Estate:" and these books were open for examination and correction from the second Monday of January until the first day of May in each year, and after that the books were closed to enable assessment rolls to be made. The rolls are thus taken from these record books which contain the assessments made since the prior September and which were concluded by the second Monday of January and were then open for revision; and hence, the assessment rolls, existing in July, 1868, were based upon the assessments made from September, 1867, which were the last assessments then in existence, and the notice in July, 1868, to the person appearing as assessed on the assessors' book for 1867, must be taken to be a notice to the then last assessed owner of the premises.

Fourth. It is further claimed that it does not appear that the person making the affidavit of service of the notice provided for in said section 20, of article 3, was a person residing in the City of New York as is required by the twenty-third section of the same article. The affidavit has the venue of "City and County of New York" and continues, "I, Phineas C. Kingsland, of the City of New York, do solemnly swear," etc.

I think here is a fair intendment to be made that the person thus swearing was a resident of the city.

The fact that the affidavit of a person residing in the city was made necessary by the statute may be properly considered with reference to the meaning of the expression "of the City of New York" contained in the affidavit. The fact of residence must exist; but we find nothing in the statute expressly requiring such fact to be stated in the affidavit; so long as it exists it would seem sufficient, and certainly so when there is no hint that he was not a resident of the city.

Fifth. Another ground taken is that the affidavit fails to state where the service was made, the statute requiring it to be served personally or by leaving it at the dwelling house of the occupant and person last assessed as owner, with any person of suitable age, etc. Sec. 21, same Act.

The affidavit stated that the notice was served by leaving the same with a member of the family of the person last assessed as owner, at his place of residence, No. 68 Fifth Avenue.

This is sufficient. The statute does not make it necessary that the city of residence should be stated. Leaving the same at the dwelling house of the occupant is the requirement of the statute, when the service is not made personally; and an affidavit showing the service upon a member of the occupant's family at his place of residence, naming the street, is surely sufficient.

*This section is as follows;

"Section 20. Whenever any lands or tenements sold for taxes in the City of New York, and conveyed in the manner provided by law, shall, at the time of conveyance, be in the actual occupancy of any person, the grantee to whom the same shall have been conveyed, or the person claiming under him, shall serve a written notice on the person occupying such lands or tenements; and in all cases on the person last assessed as owner, whether the property be in occupancy or not, provided such person has a residence, or actually resides, in the City of New York, stating in substance the sale and conveyance, the person to whom made, and the amount of consideration money mentioned in the conveyance, with the addition of 42 per cent on such amount as the said lands or tenements were struck off for at the time of the sale, and the further addition of the sum paid for the lease and advertisements; and stating also that unless such consideration money, and the said 42 per cent, together with the sum paid for the lease and advertisement, shall be paid to the said comptroller for the benefit of the grantee, within six months after service of such notice, that the said conveyance would become absolute, and the occupant and all others interested in the lands or tenements be barred from all right and title thereto during the term of years for which such lands or tenements shall have been conveyed." [Ed.]

If the requirements were that the service was to be made in New York we think the inference that the service was there made is a fair one, considering that the venue of the affidavit was in that city, and that the taxed premises were there situate, and that service was to be made upon the owner last assessed and upon the occupant.

Sixth. It is also claimed that the affidavit was not sworn to before any officer authorized to administer oaths. It was sworn to before a commissioner of deeds of New York City. The Revised Statutes provided that an oath or affidavit when required in any cause, matter or proceeding, might be taken, among others, before a commissioner of deeds and when certified by him to have been taken before him might be read in any court, or before any officer, judicial, administrative or executive, before whom any such cause, matter or proceeding might be pending. 2 R. S. 284, § 49.

This gave ample authority to the commissioner. The affidavit purports by its venue to have been taken in the City and County of New York, and it is signed by a person as commissioner of deeds. Upon an affidavit with such a venue the presumption is that the person signing himself commissioner of deeds is such within the place stated as the venue.

We have thus gone over the principal grounds relied upon in the brief submitted by the counsel for the appellant. We have also examined all the others. We think there was no error in the decision of the case; and,

The order of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of New York is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

Henry K. S. WILLIAMS, Respt.,

v.

MAYOR, etc., OF NEW YORK et al., Appts.

1. When the State, by the Act of 1813, granted to the City of New York wharf rights which might extend into the deep water covering its own land, it granted property in the land covered by the wharf and occupied by it, and an easement for approach of vessels to its front; and that easement the State could not, by its own sole action, take away or destroy without awarding adequate compensation.
2. The Act of 1857, settling the bulkhead lines for the Port of New York, operated upon the existing restrictions as to exterior lines and gave the City authority to locate wharves upon land of the State under water at a new line, with an easement of approach in front and of access from the land, and authorized the City to fill up and occupy the open space between the new line and the land as a necessary incident to the use of and access to the new wharf; and such filling, so permitted by the State, would give the new made land to the City.
3. The State did, by its earlier Acts and their recognition in 1857, permit solid filling on its lands under water within the bulkhead lines, and by that process part with its title and transfer it to him who lawfully made the new land as an approach to the docks.
4. Hence, when the City, being owner of the upland in front of which the harbor commissioners' line had been established under the Act of 1857, made a deed to private individuals of "All that certain water lot or vacant ground and soil under water to be made land and gained out of the Hudson or North River or Harbor of New York and so much thereof as has already been made and gained," etc., together with the "estate, right, title and interest" that the City "may have or may lawfully claim in the premises conveyed, by virtue of their charter and the various Acts of the People of the State of New York," such deed conveyed the right to make and own a solid filling between an old wharf and a new one on the new line, and an easement, as against the State, for the approach of vessels over the land of the State under water in front of the harbor commissioners' line.
5. While the effect of the Acts of the Legislature is to convey a title to the City to all land belonging to the State between the new bulkhead and the City's old wharf and land, it is not their effect to convey to private proprietors all land belonging to the State between the land of such proprietors and the new bulkhead line, because the private owner has no interest in the new bulkhead which can carry him over the intervening space, and the City has.
6. When a private owner's land and wharf right will be taken away and destroyed by the new extension line and structures of the Dock Department of the City of New York, he is entitled to adequate compensation.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department on an amicable submission, directing a reference to ascertain damages to plaintiff from the building of a pier in front of his premises by the Board of Department of Docks of New York City. Affirmed.

For the purposes of this appeal it was agreed between the parties that the judgment of the general term should be regarded as a final judgment, and that the assessment of damages in case said judgment was affirmed be made after filing the remittitur.

Plaintiff held the premises in question, a wharf or dock and adjoining land abutting on the Hudson River between Twenty-Fifth and Twenty-Sixth Streets as extended and west of Thirteenth Avenue in the City of New York, as grantee of all the right, title and interest, privileges, etc., that were acquired by Thomas Williams and others, and by Jeremiah Towle, under two several deeds from the City of adjoining water lots, dated respectively December 20, 1858, and November 29, 1859.

The injury complained of was the filling in, in front of plaintiff's premises, and the construction of "pier No. 55" out from said filling, thereby destroying plaintiff's dock and otherwise injuring such premises.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. James C. Carter, for appellants:

Plaintiff's assertion of title is founded solely upon the conveyance by the City of New York; but at the time that conveyance was executed the City had no title to the land and none could then have passed to its grantee. The State alone had the title.

The only ground upon which the plaintiff makes any pretense that the City owned this land at the time of its conveyances in 1858 and 1859 to the plaintiff's predecessors, is that the Harbor Commissioners' Acts of 1857 and 1858 operated as a conveyance by the State of the tract in question to the City. There is no foundation for this view.

There are no words in either of these Acts importing a conveyance of land; nor was it any part of the purpose of these Acts to effect any transfer of title. Their sole object was to check encroachments upon the navigable waters around New York by drawing a line at which all filling up should be arrested.

It may well enough be that a permission by the State to a riparian proprietor to fill up and occupy land under water in front of his premises would be equivalent to a grant of the fee. But no such permission is contained in the Harbor Commissioners' Acts, and none can be implied. Indeed, were implication in such a case permissible, no ground for it can here be found. The purpose of these Acts was simply to prevent filling up beyond a certain line, not to permit it up to such line. The point is fully covered by authority.

People v. N. Y. etc. Ferry Co. 7 Hun, 105; S. C. 68 N. Y. 71.

Plaintiff's grantors gained no easement over the land under water in front of their lands. Their grantor, the City, had no lands outside of the grant and could not create any easement over them. And it has always been the settled law of this State that the Sovereign, as the owner of the land under water in front of riparian proprietors, can fill it up and improve it as it may think fit, without giving any ground of complaint to such proprietors.

Gould v. Hudson River R. R. Co. 6 N. Y. 522; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 224).

If the State of New York has ever conferred upon the City the right to create such an easement over its own lands the authority can be gathered by implication only. A settled principle of construction forbids a resort to this mode of deriving a title or right. Whoever asserts that the Sovereign has surrendered or impaired its title to its own lands, more especially those over which absolute control in the Sovereign is requisite to the discharge of the most important public functions, can sustain his assertion only by pointing to the express and unequivocal language of the Sovereign contained in some deed or statute.

Mr. Frank A. Irish, also for appellants:

The City at the time of the grants to Williams and Towle in 1858 and 1859 did not own the strip of land between Thirteenth Avenue and the Harbor Commissioners' bulkhead line of 1857, and could not give title thereto.

It cannot be argued that a grant from the State is implied from the Act of 1858, which repeals the prohibition in the Act of 1855 against making grants, or from the Act of 1857 against solid filling further into the water than the line thereby established.

See People v. N. Y. & Staten Island Ferry Co. 7 Hun, 105; 68 N. Y. 71.

The general power of the City to lay out wharves, or exterior streets, gave it no authority to make a private grant of the strip in question such as the plaintiff claims, and does not in any way strengthen his position.

Various Acts of the Legislature granted this power; and it is understood that the plaintiff expects in some manner to justify his claim by some reference to their authority. See the following Acts:

Dongan Charter, § 2; Colonial Act, Oct. 1, 1691, chap. 18; Montgomerie Charter, § 16; Laws 1787, chap. 61; Laws 1798, chap. 80; Laws 1813, §§ 177–182, 219–236.

The exterior streets or bulkheads, and the piers projecting therefrom, and the slips or basins formed by such piers and streets required or permitted to be built under these Acts, are all public wharves and slips, the same as the public streets of the City. This has been settled by numerous adjudications.

Comrs. of Pilots v. Clark, 33 N. Y. 251, 264, 265; Radway v. Briggs, 37 N. Y. 256, 258; Taylor v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 37 N. Y. 275, 283, 284; Re N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 77 N. Y. 248, 257; Marshall v. Guion, 11 N. Y. 461, 471; Comrs. of Pilots v. Erie R. Co. 5 Robt. 381, 382: Taylor v. Beebe, 3 Robt. 262, 268; People v. Mallory, 46 How. Pr. 281; 2 Thomp. & C. 78; Mayor v. North Shore etc. Ferry Co. 55 How. Pr. 155.

The defendants are not estopped by anything contained in the grants to Williams and Towle from showing the plaintiff's want of title to the strip in question, or to the wharfage arising therefrom.

The things granted were: (a) the soil, within the limits named; (b) incidentally, the wharfage to arise from a private wharf to be built on this soil.

The grant does not contain any express covenants respecting the title to the premises conveyed, and in this respect it differs from the Astor grants involved in the case of Langdon v. Mayor, 93 N. Y. 129.

Those grants had a general covenant for quiet enjoyment in the usual form. The present grants have no covenant for quiet enjoyment.

Where the grant is expressly limited to the present interests of the grantors they will not be estopped or precluded from claiming the premises under a subsequent grant to them.

It is so held in this State in the case of Douglas v. Cruger, 80 N. Y. 15, 19; National Fire Ins. Co. v. McKay, 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 445, 454; Sparrow v. Kingman, 1 N. The point in question has been decided in this State in cases involving quitclaim deeds.

And in many cases in other States:

Allen v. Sayward, 5 Maine, 227; Partridge v. Patten, and Sweetser v. Lowell, 33 Maine, 483, 446; Harriman v. Gray, 49 Maine, 537; Robertson v. Wilson, 38 N. H. 48, 52; Doane v. Willcutt, 5 Gray, 328, 338; Comstock v. Smith, 13 Pick. 116; Sydnor v. Palmer, 29 Wis. 226, 247; Read v. Whittemore, 60 ,Maine, 479; Bruce v. Luke, 9 Kan. 201; Holbrook v. Debo, 99 Ill. 372; Sanford v. Sanford, 135 Mass. 314; Bogy v. Shoab, 13 Mo. 365; Blanchard v. Brooks, 12 Pick. 47, 66; Miller v. Ewing, 6 Cush. 34; Morrison v. Wilson, 30 Cal. 344; Cadiz v. Majors, 33 Cal. 288; Graham v. Graham, 55 Ind. 23; Allen v. Holton, 20 Pick. 458; Frank v. Darst, 14 Ill. 304.

The plaintiff can make no claim with respect to the strip between Thirteenth Avenue and the bulkhead line, because he is bound by the covenant in the grants to permit it to be taken for the purpose of a street by the defendants, without compensation.

Langdon v. Mayor, 93 N. Y. 129.

The clause referred to is applicable to every part of the premises granted, and refers to streets that "hereafter may be laid out through the premises granted," as well as to those existing.

The department of docks has laid out a new street, River Street, through, across or over, the whole of the strip in question, the bulkhead forming the outer edge of said strip, and also over the land under water in front thereof. The River Street in question has been "laid out and designated" pursuant to authority of law.

Laws 1870, chap. 383, § 34; 1871, chap. 574, § 6.

The plans adopted have been approved by the Legislature.

Laws 1884, chap. 517; 1882, chap. 410, § 712.

It may perhaps be urged by the plaintiff that an exception cannot technically be made of a street not then existing, and the location of which was undetermined; but without question the court will give it effect as a reservation of the power to lay out streets in the future and to appropriate any part of the premises described for that purpose. It has so construed similar clauses where as exceptions they could not take effect.

Thompson v. Gregory, 4 Johns. 81; Dygert v. Matthews, 11 Wend. 35; Rose v. Bunn, 21 N. Y. 275; French v. Carhart, 1 N. Y. 96; Putnam v. Stewart, 97 N. Y. 411.

The reservation of the right to lay out streets, roads or highways in the future over premises granted, or to appropriate some part of the premises granted, for some purpose or use to arise in the future, has frequently been the subject of adjudication and been recognized in the courts.

French v. Carhart, 1 N. Y. 96; Groat v. Moak, 94 N. Y. 115; Hart v. Connor, 25 Conn. 331; Thruston v. Masterson, 9 Dana, 228; Tuttle v. Walker, 46 Maine, 280; Adams v. Morse, 51 Maine, 497; Van Ohlem's App. 70 Pa. 57; Galloway v. Wilder, 26 Mich. 97.

The plaintiff's claim, under the grants, to the title and right of possession and occupancy for private purposes, of the strip between Thirteenth Avenue and the bulkhead line of 1857 cannot be upheld, because to do so would make Thirteenth Avenue an inside street and thus completely destroy the effect of the Act of 1837, which lays it out as a public exterior street or wharf.

There have been frequent adjudications, to the effect that additions, by accretion, both artificial and natural, to public streets or highways along a river, acquire and partake of the same public nature as such streets or highways.

The courts have only inquired to see whether clear proof existed of an intention to lay out a public street or wharf adjacent to the water highway; and when this has been done the adjudications are absolutely uniform and unbroken that the addition becomes a part of the public street.

People v. Lambier, 5 Denio, 9; Barclay v. Howell, 6 Pet. 499, 512 (31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 478); New Orleans v. U. S. 10 Pet. 662, 717 (35 U. Co.* 37 Conn. 337; Peck v. Providence Steam Engine Co. 8 R. I. 353; Kennedy v. Jones, 11 Ala. 63.

Looking at the case with reference to the grant of wharfage, etc. accruing at a wharf built on the bulkhead line, the plaintiff has no easement or right over the land under water in front thereof, and no right to prevent the defendants from filling in such land under water and shutting off access to such wharf by water.

In this respect the case here presented differs from that presented in Langdon v. Mayor, 93 N. Y. 129. The subject of that action was the right to collect the wharfage accruing at the exterior wharf or street which at that point was West Street. The exterior street in question was not only built upon land belonging to the City, but at the time of the grant the City owned the land under water for 200 feet in front of the wharf or street in question.

The land under water in this case belonged to the People of the State of New York, who were not parties to the grant, and were not therefore prohibited from filling it in, or from authorizing the defendants to do so as their agents, for public purposes.

Messrs. Stewart & Boardman, for respondent:

The corporation at the time of the delivery of the Williams and Towle deeds had full power to grant the right to construct a wharf on the line of solid filling known as the Harbor Commissioners' Line, and the right to collect the wharfage accruing therefrom in perpetuity, although the land under water on which the wharf was built, and the land under water exterior thereto, belonged to the State.

Crocker v. Mayor, 21 Blatch. 197; Kingsland v. Mayor, 35 Hun, 458.

The legal effect of the Williams and Towle deeds was to confer upon the grantees, their heirs and assigns, so long as they complied with the covenants and conditions therein contained, the permanent right and easement to collect wharfage, and all the benefits and advantages growing, accruing or arising by or from the wharf erected on the west line of the premises conveyed.

An easement for access to the plaintiff's wharf over the adjacent land under water of the State passed under the Williams and Towle deeds by necessary implication.

Langdon v. Mayor, 93 N. Y. 159.

Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that the Legislature could authorize the destruction of the plaintiff's wharf without compensation, we submit that by the Act of April 18, 1871, no such power was conferred upon the City.

By the construction of the plaintiff's wharf, on the harbor commissioners' line, under the authority of the Legislature and the Williams and Towle deeds, he acquired an absolute and indefeasible right to the wharfage; and it was beyond the power of the Legislature to authorize the Corporation to derogate from its own grant, by shutting off the wharf from the river and putting another wharf in front of it for its own use and profit. Any law purporting to give such authority to the City would be in violation of the State and Federal Constitutions.

State Const. art. 1, § 7; 14th Amend. U. S. Const.; Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 3 L. R. Ex. 306; Moore v. Great So. R. Co. 10 Irish Com. Law Cas. N. S. 46; Beckett v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 82.

The plaintiff is the owner in fee of the strip of land between his wharf and Thirteenth Avenue, which avenue has never been widened. The plaintiff's wharf is a private wharf. It is not built upon the outer line of a public street.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Since the rights of the plaintiff depend upon deeds given by the City to his predecessors in 1858 and 1859, and which it is said purported to convey what the corporate grantor did not possess, and rights which remained vested in the State, it will be the most natural route to a conclusion if we start with the inquiry what rights the City possessed, derived from the State, at the instant of those conveyances.

Before 1857 the City owned the upland covered by these grants and which bordered on the river, to a line which is now the west line of Thirteenth Avenue. The process by which it became such owner is not immediately material, since its title and that of its grantees thus far is not here in dispute. The land had a water front, and the City was a riparian proprietor, but with much wider rights than simply attached to it in that character.

The State had granted to the City, by several earlier Acts but notably by the Act of 1813 (2 Rev. Laws, p. 431, §§ 220, 227, 228; Laws 1806, chap. 126, § 1), a general right to build and maintain wharves, piers and slips along the water front wherever the Municipality should choose. This general grant had at the time no limitation upon the original choice of location. It carried with it necessarily, and was surely intended so to do, at least two incidental and subsidiary rights, because inevitably involved in the terms and character of the grant. One of these was to occupy and possess the lands of the State under water, so far as needed for the construction and maintenance of the wharves which the City was at liberty to build. It needed no authority from the State to erect wharves on its own land. What it did need was a right to build them on land under water owned by the State, and safety and protection for them when built.

The Sovereign began by granting to the City belts of its lands along the water front. The Dongan Charter granted the strip between high and low water; the Montgomerie Charter one of 400 feet extending out beyond low water; and which in 1807 was extended northerly to accomodate the growth of the City in that direction. But at least as early as 1801, another process began by giving to the City the grant of a general power to build and maintain wharves. Laws 1801, chap. 129.

In 1806, chap. 126, the right was granted "to cause piers to be sunk in such places and manner as they shall think eligible between the Whitehall Slips and the east side of the Exchange Slips * * * and also at their own expense to cause such and so many other public basins to be formed and completed in said City as they may deem necessary for the trade thereof, and to take to their own use the shippage or wharfage arising from the same."

The Act of 1813 was broader and seems to have been a substantial reenactment of the Act of 1801. It provided "That it shall be lawful for the Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the said City in common council convened to lay out wharves and slips in the said City whenever and wherever they shall deem it expedient."

I have no means at hand of ascertaining precisely at what date the western line of the City's bulkheads passed the limit of the 400 feet and occupied the land of the State lying under water, although one of the maps used on the argument shows that the line at some points had already been passed when the revision of 1813 was made; but that event might easily occur, since the westerly bounds of the City ran to the west line of the State in the Hudson River. The authority thus given, being commensurate with the municipal limits, involved a grant of so much of the land of the State under water as those wharves would occupy if the City's choice of location required such appropriation.

This right was tantamount to an ownership. It embraced the entire beneficial interest and was inconsistent with any title remaining in the State. The wharf when built completely occupied the land under water, and might be built if need be of stone and earth. All use for the floating of vessels disappeared, so far as it occupied the water. The new and substituted use created by the City or its grantees belonged wholly to them, for the entire benefit in the form of shippage, wharfage and cranage was given to them. There was never any restraint put upon this general grant, and the ownership involved where the plans carried the wharves on to the State's land in the stream, except the limitation of exterior lines, beyond which the authority should not go, or that imposed by general plans agreed upon by both parties.

But this general grant of authority to build wharves and take their use and product involved another right. We decided in Langdon v. Mayor, 93 N. Y. 129, that a wharf right so implied a right of approach for vessels that its grant carried with it an easement for such approach over the grantor's land under water lying in front. The Act of 1813 fully recognized and protected that easement. It in terms forbade, after the City had located its dock, any filling or the erection of any structure in its front, and so by its own act incapacitated itself without the assent of its grantee from destroying or obstructing the easement given; so that when the State granted to the City wharf rights which might extend into the deep water covering its own land it granted two things: property in the land covered by the wharf and occupied by it, and an easement for approach of vessels in its front. That easement the State by its own sole action could not take away or destroy without awarding adequate compensation.

To say the contrary would be to declare that after the City under its authority from the State has completed its entire system of wharves and piers at a cost of millions, the State may yet destroy it all, in violation of its own self imposed prohibition, by building in front on its own land under water obstructing docks or walls.

But in 1857 a new agreement was made between the State and the City. I call it such because it was that both in fact and in legal effect. It was preceded by an Act of 1855, chap. 121, a preamble to which recited that it was represented that the harbor had become obstructed by the erection of piers, wharves and bulkheads, and that grants to occupy land under water had been made and "are liable to be made" without sufficient knowledge; and then appoints a commission to ascertain all the facts and advise as to a new exterior line and a plan of construction, and in the meantime to prevent further injury forbade any new grants of land under water either by the commissioners of the Land Office or the Common Council.

The ultimate result of that commission was the Act of 1857, which moved the wharf or bulkhead line at the locality here in question about eighty feet farther into the stream and located there the exterior wharf line fronting on the water. The City accepted this change. Practically this enactment operated upon the existing restrictions as to exterior lines and gave the City, under its general right of building wharves, authority to locate them upon the land of the State under water at the new line. The same consequences followed as it respected the City's right to the land under water occupied by the new wharves and piers and the new easement of approach in their front. But this change had another effect. There was left, in the execution of the plan agreed upon by the City and the State, open water and land under it in front of the former bulkhead and extending to the new wharf line known as the harbor commissioners' line. Upon that line and extending back from it, the Act of 1857 contemplated the building by the City of a new wharf under its general grant of power. What was to become of that intermediate space? One thing about it was certain. The grant of the new wharf upon the new exterior line carried with it a right of access and approach over the State's land under water, either by an adequate and sufficient bridge or by a filling with earth. Such filling, if permitted by the State, would necessarily give the new made land to the City. The learned counsel for the appellant himself says: "It may well enough be that a permission by the State to a riparian proprietor to fill up and occupy land under water in front of his premises would be equivalent to the grant of a fee." He insists, however, that no such permission was given. Of course he would not claim that no right of access was involved in the grant, and that the State authorized a wharf in the interest of the commerce of a great seaport, only to cut off all approaches to it from the land. Now the Act of 1857, as we read it, in the light of the situation and of prior legislation, fairly authorized the City to fill up and occupy the open space as a necessary incident to the use of and the access to the new wharf.

Its second section reads: "It shall not be lawful to fill in with earth or other solid material in the waters of said port beyond the bulkhead line or line of solid filling hereby established." The learned counsel for the appellant says, in his clear and terse way: "The purpose of these Acts was simply to prevent filling up beyond a certain line, not to permit it up to such line." But why prohibit at one point if no permission had been given at any? If no general permission had ever been given, why specially prohibit in part? In the appellant's view what was the need of this provision at all? Did anybody suppose that it ever was lawful, in the absence of permission or a grant, to fill up with earth the State's land under the water of a navigable stream? It is clear that the Act of 1857 proceeds upon an assumption. It assumes that the City and its grantees have a right of solid filling upon some of the State's lands under water, and proceeds upon that assumption not to deny but to limit and restrict that right; and so when it says that no filling shall be done "beyond" it strongly implies that it may be done "up to." Three times in the Act of 1857 the new bulkhead line is described as synonymous with the "line of solid filling."

If we go back a little along the current of legislation, we shall find in the Revised Laws of 1813 the reason and the basis for the assumption and the language of the Act of 1857. By the terms of the earlier Act, the City, already authorized to build wharves where it pleased within the corporate boundaries, was further and expressly authorized to compel the riparian owners to build such wharves at their own expense, and where there was open space between the land and the wharf to require such proprietors "to fill up and level at their own expense according to such plan and by the said days respectively the spaces lying and being between their said several lots and the said streets and wharves; and shall, upon so filling up and leveling the same, be respectively entitled to and become the owners of the said intermediate spaces of ground in fee simple."

Of course if the City was the upland owner with an open space between its land and the new wharf, it had the right to fill it in and thereby become its owner. By this Act the State granted to the City and to the upland owner the right to fill out to the permitted wharves and vested title to the new made land in the adjoining owners. The line of solid filling, therefore, permitted by the State was exactly synonymous with the bulkhead line. When the City was restricted in its general right of building wharves to limits within exterior lines it was natural equally to restrict the solid filling permitted within the same lines.

We do not think it alters the case that this grant by the State was to persons compelled to fill under the terms of the Act. Where the City itself was adjoining owner the compulsion became simply a privilege or right; and it is quite possible that as to the citizen a similar change occurred. We may infer from the constant repetition of grants that what at first was a burden, borne under compulsion, soon became a benefit and was sought as a privilege; and so instead of the compulsory direction of an ordinance the City gave the same direction and with the same results, by the terms and stipulations of a grant. And thus we discover the assumption upon which the Law of 1857 rested; and see in it a clear recognition by the State that its removal of the exterior bulkhead line further into the stream carried with it a surrender by the State to the City or its grantees or the upland owners, of its land under water behind the new wharves, whenever they should be constructed.

Why should the State have done otherwise? How could it have done otherwise, unless it meant not only to throw the necessities of an enormous commerce upon the City but to hamper and obstruct the bearing of that burden by withholding a right useless to itself? And so I reach the conclusion that the State did, by its earlier Acts, and their recognition in 1857, permit solid filling on its lands under water within the bulkhead lines, and by that process parted with its title and transferred it to him who lawfully made the new land as an approach to the docks. And this view is further strengthened by the two facts that the State has seen this process going on for about half a century without once interfering or asserting a hostile right, but on the contrary has given to the City, whenever requested, formal conveyances of its lands so occupied.

We are able now to see what the rights of the City were when it conveyed to Williams and Towle. The City owned the upland. In front of it the harbor commissioners' line had been established. The erection of a new wharf on that line was desired. Its construction would shut in and destroy the old wharf on the old west line of Thirteenth Avenue, and require a solid filling, which the City had a right to make and, having made, would own and possess. It had a further right as against the State: an easement for the approach of vessels over the lands of the State under water in front of the harbor commissioners' line, whenever a new wharf should be built upon that line. All these rights it conveyed to Williams and Towle and vested every one of them in them. It had the power to convey them. Langdon v. Mayor, 93 N. Y. 129.

It did convey them. Its deeds cover the open space between the avenue bulkhead and the harbor commissioners' line and make that the west or outer line of the grant. The deed was made and accepted upon an understanding of the City's rights, precisely as we have held them to exist. It described the property thus:

"All that certain water lot or vacant ground and soil under water to be made land and gained out of the Hudson or North River or Harbor of New York, and so much thereof as has already been made and gained," etc.

The municipal authorities either at that date understood their rights as we do, or else perpetrated a deliberate fraud upon an unsuspecting purchaser. The grantees in the two deeds were required to covenant and did covenant to build at their own expense, within three months, the new wharf and bulkhead along the west or river front; to build such streets as ran through the premises, grading and paving the same and laying the sidewalks thereof; to repair and maintain the whole of Twenty-Sixth Street lying west of Eleventh Avenue, and such other streets as should be laid out on the premises.

The City on its part, withholding covenants of seisin or warranty, did stipulate that the deeds should "pass the estate, right, title and interest they may have or may lawfully claim in the premises hereby conveyed by virtue of their several charters and the various Acts of the People of the State of New York;" and covenanted that the grantees should take and hold "all manner of wharfage, cranage, advantages or emoluments growing out or accruing by or from that part of the said exterior line of said City lying on the westerly side of the hereby granted premises fronting on the Hudson River."

We determined in the Langdon Case that such deeds granted a wharf right which lay in grant if not in covenant. The temporary prohibition contained in the Act of 1855, staying the City from conveying, pending the examinations of the commission, was repealed before these deeds were made, and for the obvious purpose of allowing the City to resume that system of grants which the Legislature in the preamble to the Act of 1855 had recited "were liable to be made."

The grantees in the present case performed their covenants. They constructed the wharf on the river line; filled in the space between; built the streets required; and went peaceably into the possession of their land and wharf rights. They became owners of the newly made land, as well as that already "gained" at the date of the deeds and owners of an easement for the approach of vessels in front of their wharf, both as against the City and against the State.

In this respect is developed the only serious difference between the Langdon Case and this. In that case the City owned the land under water in front of the dock; in this the State owns it; in that the grant of a wharf right by the City carried with it an easement in the City's land under water in front; in this the State's grant to the City carried the right to such easement over the State's land under water to the City; and the deeds of the latter carried it to the grantees.

We are not unmindful of the criticisms which have been made upon this view of the case, or the further grounds upon which the rights of the grantees are assailed.

It is suggested that if the effect of the Acts to which we have referred was to convey a title to the City to all land belonging to the State lying between the new bulkhead and the City's old wharf and land "it must also have been their effect to convey to private proprietors all land belonging to the State between the land of such proprietors and such bulkhead line," and that doctrine has been expressly denied. Van Zandt v. Mayor, 8 Bosw. 375.

But the alleged vicious conclusion does not follow, because the mere riparian proprietor has no right to the new outside wharf, or to use or approach the same, or take the wharfage therefrom, which is the right of the City. The private owner has no interest in the new bulkhead which can carry him over the intervening space, and the City has. The former has simply been deprived of his rights, and suffered a loss of his property, for which he is entitled to compensation.

It is said that by a law of the State (Laws 1887, chap. 182) Thirteenth Avenue has been laid out as an exterior public street; and the plaintiff is claiming by virtue of grants from the City alone to convert Thirteenth Avenue into an inside street contrary to the express law of the State. That is very far from a correct view of the situation. The change was made, as we have seen, by force of the law of the State which carried the west wharf line further into the stream and the line of solid filling to the same point. The process had been going on for years and outside transformed into inside streets continually. A glance at one of the maps used on this argument shows that original high water mark was but a little west of Tenth Avenue, and even the west line of the 400 feet beyond low water given by the Montgomerie Charter was east of Eleventh Avenue; and from that point on the City has been permitted to grow into the river over the lands of the State under water, not only by its consent but through its direct participation and agency.

It is argued that under his deeds plaintiff had no right of wharfage, except at the west line of Thirteenth Avenue; that he lost that by himself filling up in front of that bulkhead; and that such right of wharfage "has no immunity from destruction by a filling up in front either by the State or its grantee;" citing Gould v. Hudson River R. R. Co. 6 N. Y. 522.

It is not necessary to express either approval or disapproval of that authority. It is enough to say that it has no sort of application to the present case. There the plaintiff had no rights beyond those of a mere riparian proprietor. If he had possessed in addition a wharf right, derived from the State or its grantee, quite a different question would have been presented. But we have sought to show that plaintiff's wharf right was not at the old line but at the new one, and the filling was covenanted to be done as a necessary incident to the wharf right granted.

Much was said on the argument as to the rule of construction applicable to grants by the State. The subject was fully considered in the Langdon Case and need not here be resumed.

It seems only necessary to add that we do not view the grant by the State to the City as without consideration, and purely and simply a gift. The State owned but a single seaport, open to commerce and touched by tide-water, and that one a harbor of remarkable size and convenience. Its interest to concentrate there ships and cargoes from all parts of the world by protecting the harbor and lining it with docks and piers was very great, and took on the character of a duty due to the prosperity of the Commonwealth. It early imposed that duty upon the City and the citizens, by whom it has been steadily performed at very great cost, and one in the future to be largely increased. Every grant the State made was in aid of the expenditure involved in the performance by the City of that duty, and in consideration of that performance. Little enough of its own duty has been borne by the State, and to call that little a pure gratuity amounts almost to a sarcasm. We do not understand Dermott v. State, 99 N. Y. 101, to have limited the Langdon Case.

A point was made over the reservation in the deeds of "such streets as now are or hereafter may be laid out through the premises hereby granted;" and it was claimed that a new river street 250 feet wide and absorbing Thirteenth Avenue and all the land west of it to the river was laid out by the department of docks. We do not think the power to lay out streets was conferred upon that department. It belongs to the board of street opening and improvement, by whom no such action has been taken. It may be added that the plan for what is called a "river street" upon "sheet A" of the general plan did not have indorsed thereon a certificate of adoption by the commissioners of the sinking fund, and "sheets C & D" which were adopted and indorsed are utterly silent as to any river street.

It follows from what has been said that the plaintiff, whose land will be taken away and his wharf right destroyed by the new exterior line and structures of the dock department, is entitled to adequate compensation.

The Act organizing that department will and was intended to change utterly the water front system of the City. Upon the new line the municipality is to build all docks and wharves and piers and own them all and the old plan of wharves and piers owned by individuals is to be swept away. But by the Act the rights of private owners are respected and there is not in it a word or line of meditated spoliation. The wharf property of citizens may be taken but must be paid for fairly and in the ordinary manner.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

NEW YORK, LAKE ERIE & WESTERN R. R. CO., Farmers Loan & Trust Co., and Hugh J. Jewett, Receiver of Erie Railway Co., Respts.

In May, 1875, the attorney-general, in the name of the People, commenced an action in equity under 2 R. S. p. 463, § 38, against the Erie Railway Company, for its dissolution as an insolvent corporation, and Hugh J. Jewett was appointed temporary receiver of the company therein. In June, 1875, and during the pendency of the People's action, the Farmers Loan & Trust Company commenced an action for the foreclosure of two mortgages executed by the Erie Company upon its railway and appurtenances, and Jewett was appointed receiver of the mortgaged property in this action. The Erie Company, at the time of the commencement of these actions, owned certain bonds and stocks in other corporations, and the judgment rendered in the foreclosure action in November, 1877, recited that such bonds and stocks were held by the receiver therein as part and parcel of the mortgaged property and premises, and authorized the referee appointed to sell the mortgaged premises, to sell such bonds and stocks as a portion of the mortgaged premises, which was done, and the sale confirmed, and said bonds and stocks passed, with the mortgaged premises, under such sale and subsequent proceedings, to the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, a corporation formed on reorganization of the Erie Railway Company—the order for such transfer providing that it was subject to all the rights of the People in and to the premises or any part thereof, as the same might be ascertained in the People's action. Thereafter a reference as to the property subject to said mortgage was had in the People's action and a judgment entered therein upon the report of the referee to the effect that said stocks and bonds did come under the mortgage and were properly sold with the mortgaged premises, and adjudging the Erie Railway Company to be dissolved. Thereafter this suit was commenced, seeking to subject said bonds and stocks to the payment of certain unsecured obligations held against the Erie Railway Co.,—on the ground that said bonds and stocks were not covered by said mortgages, and that the court never acquired any jurisdiction over the same nor of the rights of the plaintiff and other unsecured creditors therein, they not having been made parties to said foreclosure suit nor to the People's action. The complaint set out the facts connected with said actions at length, but did not contain any allegations of fraud. Held, on demurrer to the complaint:

(a) But for the pendency of the People's action, it cannot be doubted that the determination and judgment in the foreclosure action would have been conclusive upon everyone:—it was within the province of the court to determine what property was actually embraced within or subject in express terms or by subrogation or any other equitable principle, to the mortgages foreclosed.

(b) The unsecured creditors were not necessary or proper parties to the foreclosure action and had no right to intervene therein, and any adjudication made against the mortgagor was binding upon them.

(c) The pendency of the People's action, in which a temporary receiver had been appointed, did not prohibit the commencement of the foreclosure action; and the court had power to permit the latter action to be commenced and to proceed, to appoint a receiver therein and to supersede the receiver appointed in the People's action, to transfer all the duties of the receiver in that action to the receiver in the foreclosure action, and to order all the property covered by the mortgages to be delivered to such receiver.

(d) The judgment in the foreclosure action was not, under the facts, within 2 R. S. p. 462, § 71, which declares that all judgments confessed by the insolvent corporation after the filing of the petition for its dissolution shall be absolutely void as against the receiver who may be appointed on such petition and as against creditors of the corporation.

(e) The rights which the statutes secure to creditors in the case of a statutory final receiver of an insolvent corporation are such only as pertain to the property which comes to the receiver to be administered by him and distributed to creditors; and there is no statute which entitles them to notice or gives them the right to a hearing before the receiver, except as to claims upon and their rights in such property.

(f) Under the statutes in force in 1875 in relation to actions by the People for the dissolution of corporations, there was nothing which required a final receiver in such actions to consult the general creditors of the insolvent corporation in the prosecution or defense of any action.

(g) There is no provision of law which required that general creditors of the corporation should be made parties to the People's action or have any notice thereof; they were represented therein by the People through the attorney-general, and by the receiver and by the defendant corporation; and while they could have been permitted to intervene or to appeal from the judgment or any of the orders therein, if any ground of appeal existed, they had no right to attack the same collaterally, unless for fraud.

(h) The proceeding in equity under 2 R. S. p. 463, § 38, for the dissolution of the corporation was unaffected by the Code of Procedure; and prior to the year 1880 (Code of Civil Procedure and Repealing Act) there was no statute regulating the powers and duties of receivers appointed in such equitable proceeding.

(i) The complaint does not allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Special Term sustaining a demurrer to a complaint in an action to have certain securities applied in payment of claims of certain creditors. Affirmed.

Statement by Earl, J.:

The plaintiff commenced this action on behalf of himself and all other creditors of the Erie Railway Company similarly situated, and made parties defendants the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company and Hugh J. Jewett, Receiver of the Erie Railway Company.

In his complaint he alleges that prior to its dissolution the Erie Railway Company was a corporation organized under the laws of this State; that in the year 1870 (to secure the payment of its bonds, amounting to about $16,000,000) it executed and delivered to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, as trustee, a mortgage of its railway and certain property then owned by it, which railway and property were described in the mortgage in the following words, to wit:

"All and singular the Railway of the party of the first part, from and including Piermont on the Hudson River, to and including the final terminus of the said Railway on Lake Erie, and the railway known as the Newburgh Branch, from Newburgh to the main line, and also all that part of the Railway designated as the Buffalo Branch of the Erie Railway, extending from Hornellsville to Attica, in the State of New York, and also all other railways belonging to the party of the first part in the States of New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey or any of them, together with all the lands, track, lines, rails, bridges, ways, buildings, piers, wharves, structures, erections, fences, walls, fixtures, franchises, privileges and rights of the said Company, and also all the locomotives, engines, tenders, cars, carriages, tools, machinery, manufactured or unmanufactured materials, coal, wood and supplies of every kind, belonging or appertaining to the party of the first part, and all the tolls, income, issues and profits arising out of the said property, and all rights to receive or recover the same; also all the estate right, title and interest, terms and remainder of terms, franchises, privileges and rights of action, of whatsoever name or nature, in law or in equity, conveyed or assigned unto the New York & Erie Railroad Company, or unto the Erie Railway Company, by the Union Railroad Company, by the Buffalo, New York & Erie Railroad Company, by the Buffalo, Bradford & Pittsburgh Railroad Company, by the Rochester & Genesee Valley Railroad Company, and by the Long Dock Company."

That afterward, in 1874, to secure the payment of other bonds, amounting to about $24,000,000, it executed to the same trustee another mortgage upon its railway and property, by the same description contained in the prior mortgage.

That about the 25th day of May, 1875, an action was brought by the attorney-general, in the supreme court of this State, in the name of the People as plaintiffs, against the Erie Railway Company, its directors and certain trustees under various mortgages, including the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, as defendants; that the relief prayed for in that action, among other things, was that the Corporation should be dissolved and be wound up, that the plaintiffs should have judgment accordingly, and that in the meantime, while the action was pending, Jewett, President of the Company, should be appointed Receiver to take, hold and possess, under the immediate authority and direction of the court, the franchises and property, with full power to operate the road and to preserve its franchises and corporate existence until final judgment, and with such other general powers as it is usual and in accordance with the rules and practice of the court to confer upon receivers in like cases; that on the 26th day of May, 1875, on the application of the attorney-general in that action, Jewett was appointed Receiver of the Company, in pursuance of the prayer of the complaint; that, by virtue of such appointment, Jewett undertook the duties of the receivership, and all the estate of the Erie Company and its franchises thereupon became vested in him as Receiver, to be administered and distributed by him in accordance with the statutes in such case provided.

That about the 15th day of June, 1875, the defendant, The Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, as trustee, commenced an action against the Erie Railway Company for the foreclosure of the two mortgages above mentioned; that in that action the Trust Company was sole plaintiff and the Erie Railway Company and the trustees under prior mortgages were the only defendants; that subsequently the summons and complaint in that action were amended so as to make certain creditors of the Erie Company codefendants therein; but Jewett, as Receiver in the Peoples' action, was at no time made a party to that action; that the complaint in that action alleged, among other things, the insolvency of the Erie Company; that it had made default in the payment of the interest falling due upon its bonds; that to the extent of the rightful interest in the mortgaged premises of the Trust Company as the mortgagee, its rights were in law and equity superior to the rights of the People of the State of New York; that the Trust Company was entitled to have the mortgaged premises foreclosed and sold for the payment and satisfaction of the respective debts to secure which premises were mortgaged to it; and that the prayer of the complaint demanded that an accounting should be had as to the bonds outstanding under the mortgages; that Jewett should be appointed Receiver of the mortgaged premises and property in that action, and that the mortgaged premises and property should be sold and the proceeds applied for the payment of the mortgage debts, and that the complaint further demanded in words following, to wit: "That an inquiry may be had and an account taken of and concerning all and singular the premises and property so mortgaged to this plaintiff as aforesaid, in order that it may be fully and at large ascertained whereof the said mortgaged premises consist;" that on the 15th day of June, 1875, Jewett was appointed Receiver in that action of all the property covered by the two mortgages.

That the estate of the Erie Railroad Company at the time Jewett was appointed Receiver in the People's action, consisted not only of the railway and the property described in the two mortgages, but also of a large amount of other property, such as bonds and stocks in other corporations, which property was not appurtenant to the mortgaged premises, not subject to the lien of the mortgages or either of them, and not in any manner necessary for the practical operation of the mortgaged premises, or to the use, management or maintenance thereof, amounting to many millions of dollars in value; that part of such property had been acquired by the Erie Company subsequently to February 4, 1874, the date of the second mortgage; that the property not subject to the lien of the mortgages constituted a large and valuable fund applicable to the payment of the general and unsecured creditors of the Erie Company; that the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company or its attorney admitted in the foreclosure action the existence of such fund and the necessity of an accounting with respect to the same, on a motion in that action in which it was made to appear to the court by the affidavit of such attorney, on or about the 6th day of April, 1876, that there were in the hands of Jewett, as Receiver, stocks and bonds as before mentioned representing interests in other corporations to the nominal amount of more than $22,000,000, which belonged to the estate of the Erie Company; that an unascertained portion of such securities was covered by the two mortgages; that another unascertained portion had been acquired with moneys supplied by the respective parties for whom the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, was trustee; that advances had been made upon or against a further portion thereof out of the income of the mortgaged property in the hands of the Receiver; that the Receiver had paid out of the income of the mortgaged premises in his hands certain debts of the Erie Railway Company, constructed prior to the appointment of the Receiver, for labor, salaries and supplies which ought of right to be reimbursed to the mortgage creditors out of the assets of the Erie Company not covered by the mortgages; that certain resulting trusts existed in favor of the mortgage creditors in such securities; and that such securities or the proceeds thereof, in case of their sale, should be dealt with by the Receiver as a part of the general funds in his hands under the several mortgages; and that it was alleged in the affidavit that it was impracticable at that time to take, state and adjust the accounts and to finally account in respect to the matters above referred to, and that such final accounting and adjustment could only be had with due regard to the rights and interests of the parties upon the accounting preliminary to the final decrees, and by the final decrees to be made upon the basis of such accounting; that an order was made on that motion in the foreclosure action, on or about the 6th day of April, 1876, authorizing the Receiver to treat the fund as a part of the general fund and estate embraced in the two mortgages, "without prejudice to any equitable rights and interests of the respective parties which may be established on final accounting."

That during the pendency of the foreclosure action, the holders of the bonds and stocks of the Erie Company formed a plan for the formation of a new corporation in which their interests were to be represented; but no provision whatever was made in the plan of reorganization, for the unsecured debts or obligations of the Erie Company; that the reorganization was consummated in pursuance of the plan and the sanction of the court and with the cooperation of Jewett, as Receiver, in the foreclosure action, and that the new organization thus formed is the defendant, the Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company.

That such proceedings were had in the foreclosure action that judgment of sale was rendered therein on or about the 7th day of November, 1877, and that the decree recited among other things as follows: "That the Receiver in the course of his receivership has lawfully acquired and become possessed of a large amount of stocks in other corporations, bonds and other obligations for the payment of money, a large part of which has been lawfully and properly pledged by him to secure the payment of money borrowed by him, which he was authorized to borrow for the general purposes of his receivership, and which will probably remain to a greater or less extent so pledged at the time of the sale of the mortgaged premises; that all or nearly all of such stock, bonds, obligations and securities are embraced and described in the inventory of the mortgaged premises and property made and filed in this case by the Receiver in pursuance of the order of this court; that the said stocks, bonds, securities and obligations are held by the Receiver as part and parcel of the property and premises mortgaged to the plaintiff, and as the product of the rents, profits and issues of the mortgaged premises during the said receivership, subject, however, to the liens existing thereon by reason of such pledge or pledges thereof as hereinbefore stated;" "that the referee appointed to sell the mortgaged premises should be authorized at the request of the plaintiff's attorney to expose for sale and sell, as part of the mortgaged premises, all and singular the said stocks, bonds, obligations, accounts and evidences of indebtedness and other choses in action of which the Receiver may have become lawfully possessed in any way or manner during his receivership; subject, however, to any lawful lien or liens existing thereon, whether created by the Receiver or otherwise."

That it was by the foreclosure judgment ordered, adjudged and decreed, among other things, that sale be made of "all and singular the mortgaged premises, franchises and property, both real, personal and mixed, mentioned in the complaint in this action and hereinafter mentioned;" being the same premises and property described in the two mortgages, with the following addition: "And this description is to be understood as embracing and including all and singular the choses in action, stocks, bonds, book accounts, bills receivable and other evidences of indebtedness, leasehold estates, contracts and other property hereinbefore mentioned;" that a sale was had under the judgment by a referee appointed for that purpose on the 24th day of April, 1878; that the terms of sale as announced by the referee described the property to be sold by the words of description contained in the mortgages with the addition of the following words, namely: "Embracing and including all and singular the choses in action, stocks, bonds, book accounts, bills receivable and other evidences of indebtedness, leasehold estates, contracts and other property mentioned and described in the lists and schedules to be exhibited at the sale and contained and described in the Receiver's inventory of the real and personal property of the Erie Railway Company, also to be exhibited at the sale, not consumed or disposed of by the Receiver in the discharge of his duty prior to the sale, and including all property of every kind and description acquired by the Receiver during his receivership, with the proceeds of the rents, profits and issues of the mortgaged premises since the making of the said inventory, and not embraced therein, and excepting therefrom such portions thereof as will be declared excepted at the time and place of the sale."

That the Receiver's inventory of the real and personal property of the Erie Railway Company referred to in the terms of sale was exhibited at the sale, and it contained all the mortgaged premises and also all the other assets, real and personal, above described, not covered by the mortgages and which were held by Jewett, as Receiver, in the People's action for the benefit of the unsecured creditors of the Company; that there were present, and exhibited at such sale, lists, including not only the mortgaged premises and property, but also other claimed estate and assets of the Company which were not covered by the mortgages; that the sale was made to certain trustees under the reorganization plan; that on or about the 25th day of April, 1878, an order was entered in the foreclosure action, confirming the sale and the report thereof by the referee, and it was thereby ordered "That the said referee be and he hereby is ordered and directed forthwith to execute and deliver a proper deed or deeds of conveyance of all and singular the said premises, franchises and property so as aforesaid sold or intended so to be, to the said purchasers or their assigns, on their complying with the conditions on which, by the terms of said sale and by said decree, such deed or deeds were to be delivered."

That on or about the 26th day of April, 1878, the referee executed and delivered to such trustees, a referee's deed of the property sold which described it in the words following, to wit: "All and singular the property, franchises and estate whether real, personal or mixed, and wherever situate and whether within or without this State, embraced and included in the said judgment, and authorized and directed to be sold therein and thereby, of which said property, franchises and estate, real, personal and mixed, the following is the general and the best practical description; that is to say"—then in addition to the description of the premises in the mortgages were the following words: "This description is to be understood as embracing and including all and singular the choses in action, stock, bonds, book accounts, bills receivable and other evidence of indebtedness, leasehold estates, contracts and other property in the said judgment mentioned or therein directed to be sold," with some exceptions not material now to be mentioned; that the Erie Railway Company also executed to the trustees a deed, of even date with the deed mentioned, of the same premises described as in the deed of the referee; that thereafter, on the 27th day of April, 1878, the defendant, The New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, was incorporated in pursuance of the reorganization plan, and thereupon the trustees executed and delivered to it a deed of the property held by them under the deeds of the referee and of the Erie Railway Company above mentioned, describing the same in the words used in those deeds.

That on or about the third day of May, 1878, Jewett, as Receiver, presented to the supreme court in the foreclosure action a petition for an order authorizing the delivery by him to the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, of the property sold in the foreclosure action; and that thereupon on that day an order was made in the foreclosure action in which, among other things, it was ordered "That the said Receiver do transfer, deliver and surrender to the said New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company all the property and franchises whereof he is now possessed as Receiver in this action, and which were embraced or intended to be embraced in the judgment of foreclosure herein, subject to the reservations and exceptions hereinafter specified, and subject to all and singular the rights of the People of this State in and to the premises, or any part thereof, as the same may be ascertained on due inquiry and examination by the attorney-general, in the action of the People of this State against the Erie Railway Company, now pending, to the end that such rights and interests may be as fully protected as if this transfer had not been ordered and directed; and that upon such transfer, delivery and surrender, the said Receiver be and he is hereby absolutely and forever discharged of and from any and all liability as Receiver in this action, for the property and franchises so delivered, transferred and surrendered."

That on or about the first day of June, 1878, Jewett, as Receiver, delivered to the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company all the property referred to in that order, or the greater portion thereof, subject, however, to the terms of the order, and took therefor a receipt from the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company containing a list of certain shares of stocks and bonds in other companies and other personal property; that none of the property specified in that list was as matter of fact or law embraced in or covered by any of the mortgages of the Erie Railway Company, or subject to the lien thereof, or appurtenant to the mortgaged premises; nor was any of the same necessary for the use, operation or maintenance of the Erie Railway, and a great portion of the property was not the property of the Erie Railway Company or in its possession at the date of the mortgage; that no accounting whatever was had in the foreclosure suit, by which it was or could be ascertained or determined what portion of the assets which came into the hands of the Receiver was subject to the mortgages and what portion thereof was not so subject; and judgment and sale "was had and said assets were disposed of, as herein above described, without any such determination in said suit; and the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company took over the assets formerly owned by the Erie Company, expressly subject to such examination and determination to be duly and properly made under the direction of the court in the aforesaid suit of the People of the State of New York against the Erie Railway Company, or otherwise, and to the results of such examination; and no such accounting or determination has yet been had in that suit or otherwise."

That on or about the 20th of May, 1878, on the petition of the attorney-general an order was made by the supreme court in the People's action, wherein it was ordered among other things as follows: "That James C. Spencer be and he is hereby appointed referee to examine, adjust and pass upon all the accounts, acts and doings of Hugh J. Jewett, Receiver in this action, for and during the entire period of his said receivership, and that for the purpose of such accounting the accounts heretofore rendered by the said Hugh J. Jewett, as Receiver in the action of the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, against the Erie Railway Company, and which had been examined and passed upon by the said James C. Spencer, as referee duly appointed in said action, and approved by this court, shall be deemed and taken as accounts rendered and filed in this action, but shall not preclude the attorney-general from making such further examination of said accounts, acts and doings as he may deem necessary, and such action thereon by the referee and by this court as may be just and proper, nor preclude the attorney-general nor this court from requiring additional or more specific accounts by said Receiver, and the said referee shall take testimony for the purpose of ascertaining what property or assets, if any, the said Hugh J. Jewett, as Receiver in this action, acquired, held or disposed of, not covered by or subject to the lien of the mortgage of the Erie Railway Company to the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, which has been foreclosed, and, if any such property has been disposed of by said Receiver, what disposition has been made thereof; and also what rights and equities, if any, the said Farmers Loan & Trust Company, the purchasers at the foreclosure sale of the mortgaged premises, or their assigns, had or have in or to such property or assets or any part or portion thereof; and that the said referee report to this court the testimony so taken by him, and the material facts which he shall deem established by such testimony, with his opinion thereon, for the further action of this court."

That subsequently to the entry of that order, in the month of March, 1879, the People's action was discontinued as to all parties defendant, except the Erie Railway Company and the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, without prejudice to proceedings already had; that supplemental pleadings were served therein, setting up the foreclosure sale, and the conveyance herein above described, including the conveyances to the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, and that the attorney-general under date of the third day of April, 1879, in his reply to the answer theretofore served, of the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, made the following allegations, among others, to wit: "First alleges and shows that, at the time the Receiver heretofore appointed in this action entered upon the performance of his duties as such Receiver, he became seised and possessed of all the assets of the said Erie Railway then in possession of said Company, including a large amount of stocks and bonds of other corporations, real estate in the City of New York and elsewhere in the States of New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and of certain property, choses in action and effects, which were not embraced in the mortgage known as the second consolidated mortgage of the Erie Railway Company, nor subject to the lien thereof. And that also during his said receivership the said Receiver has lawfully acquired for the benefit of the estate of the Erie Railway Company certain other property, including stocks and bonds of other corporations, which are not affected by said mortgage, nor subject to the lien thereof.

"Second. That said property was improperly, wrongfully and unlawfully included in the judgment entered in the action to foreclose the said second consolidated mortgage, and in the sale thereunder, and was improperly, wrongfully and unlawfully included in the deeds to the purchasers at such sale and in the deeds to the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railway Company from said purchasers, and in the mortgage by said New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company to the said Farmers Loan & Trust Company, which deeds and mortgage are referred to in said answer of said Trust Company.

"Third. And the said plaintiffs deny that by reason of any proceedings had in said foreclosure action or by reason of any of said conveyances, or of said mortgages, the said Farmers Loan & Trust Company has been, or is now, invested with the title in trust or otherwise, to any of the aforesaid property, stocks, bonds, real estate and effects, or any part or portion thereof, or has any right or claim thereto."

That hearing upon these objections was had before Spencer, the referee in the People's suit, to which hearing the People of the State of New York, by the attorney-general, the Erie Railway Company, and the defendant the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, were the only parties, and of which hearing no notice was given to unsecured creditors; that such proceedings were thereupon had that on or about the 25th day of November, 1879, a final judgment was entered in the People's suit, in which a report theretofore made by the referee was confirmed, and it was adjudged among other things, as follows, to wit:

"That the Receiver in this action did not at any time acquire, hold or dispose of any property of any kind not covered by or subject to the lien of the mortgage of the said defendant the Erie Railway Company, to the said defendant the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, which mortgage has been foreclosed as fully and at large set forth in the said reports of the said referee; that the judgment of foreclosure in the action of the said Farmers Loan & Trust Company, and the sale under the said judgment, and the conveyance made by the referee in pursuance of such sale, the conveyances and assignments subsequently made to the purchasers at such sale and by such purchasers to the New York, Lake Erie & Western R. R. Co., did vest in the said * * * Company a good and valid title to all the property of every kind and description embraced and described in the said judgment and in the several said conveyances and assignments."

"That the said defendant corporation, the Erie Railway Company, be and the same is hereby adjudged to be dissolved."

"That whereas Hugh J. Jewett was heretofore, by an order of this court, duly appointed Receiver in this cause, and duly qualified as such Receiver, it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that said Hugh J. Jewett be and he is hereby continued as Receiver of the Erie Railway Company, with all the power and authority conferred by law upon receivers of dissolved corporations in like cases."

That the Erie Railway Company was by that decree judicially dissolved; that during all this time the plaintiff and other persons referred to in the complaint similarly situated were unsecured creditors of the Erie Company, holding large obligations against it; that Jewett, as Receiver in the People's suit, never advertised any notice of his appointment, or any notice to persons holding "open or subsisting contracts of the Erie Railway Company, or other creditors to present their claims to said Receiver, nor did he call any general meeting or other meeting of the creditors of such Corporation within four months from the time of his appointment, or at any time, for the ascertainment and adjustment of open and subsisting contracts of said Corporation, or for any other purpose; and he did not, previous to rendering his account under the foregoing order of reference, or at any time, publish a notice of his intention to present an account, in the state paper, or in a newspaper published in the County of New York, which was the county in which was the principal place of conducting the business of said Erie Company, or in any county, specifying the time or place at which such accounts should be rendered; nor did he in anywise comply with any of the provisions of the statutes of the State in that behalf and hereinbefore recited; but on the contrary thereof he purposely, and without authority of law, and with the unlawful intent to prevent the general creditors of said Erie Company, including this plaintiff and those similarly situated, from being heard in said proceedings, abstained from complying and did not comply with any of the provisions of the said statute so as aforesaid recited, and which provisions encroached upon the rights of the said persons and creditors, and were to be strictly pursued; and there was no opportunity or notice given to all concerned in said accounting, or to this plaintiff or those similarly situated, or to anyone holding claims upon open or subsisting engagements of the Erie Company, to be heard by the court in said suit of the People on the accounting of said Receiver or otherwise; and the court did not hear the allegations of all concerned in said accounts; and the court did not at any time decree the said accounts to be final or conclusive upon all the creditors of such Corporation, or upon the persons who have claims against it upon open or subsisting engagements; and the said court did not have or acquire any jurisdiction in said suit, or otherwise, at any time or in any manner as against such persons or creditors as aforesaid, including this plaintiff, and those similarly situated, to make the said order of reference hereinbefore recited, or any order or decree which should or could deprive such persons and creditors of this plaintiff of their legal rights to the premises or estop or bar them from asserting the same in any court of competent jurisdiction, or from pursuing in such court their legal remedies against the property of said Company wherever found, or in whosesoever possession the same might be; and said accounting and decrees, and all the aforesaid proceedings, prior or subsequent, for the determination of the question whether any of the assets received by said Jewett, as Receiver, were held by him free from the lien of the mortgages of the Erie Company, and liable to be distributed among the unsecured creditors of the said Company, were and are wholly without jurisdiction and void, and are not binding upon or a bar to this plaintiff or those similarly situated with him, he and they having had no opportunity or notice to be heard in the above described actions on the determination of the said question, as by the statutes of this State they had a right to have; and that the same cannot, nor can either or any thereof, without the committing of a fraud in law upon the persons and creditors aforesaid, including this plaintiff and those similarly situated, be interposed as a bar or estoppel, upon their right to pursue the property of the said Erie Company, wherever the same may now be found; and this plaintiff insists, notwithstanding the said proceedings and decrees, that a very large amount of property, consisting of real estate, stocks and bonds of other corporations and other assets, did come into the hands of said Jewett, as Receiver, which were not affected by or subject to the lien of the aforesaid mortgages, and a portion of which, to an amount not known to this plaintiff, but believed by him to be of the value of many hundreds of thousands of dollars, have been transferred and delivered to said New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, which assets, comprising not only the property enumerated in the receipt set forth in this complaint but also other assets of large value, constitute a fund as herein above described, wherever they may be traced, for distribution among the unsecured creditors of the said Company, including this plaintiff and those similarly situated with him."

And the plaintiff prayed judgment that the estate, late of the Erie Railway Company and covered by the mortgages mentioned, be adjudged and "decreed a trust fund, to be applied as the court may direct to the payment and satisfaction of the interest accrued and yet to accrue upon said western extension bonds of the Atlantic & Great Western Railroad Company bearing the guaranty of the Erie Railway Company, according to the terms thereof, except so far as said interest has been paid by net proceeds of dividends upon the shares of the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati & Indianapolis Railroad Company; that any and all orders, decrees, accountings or proceedings in suits hereinabove described, which may or which can be alleged or claimed to bar or estop the rights of this plaintiff and of other creditors of said Company similarly situated with him, to pursue, recover and enjoy the property of said Erie Company not embraced in and covered by the mortgages of the Erie Company herein above described, be adjudged and decreed, as to this plaintiff and the said creditors of the Erie Company, fraudulent in law and without jurisdiction on the part of the court purporting to have made the same, and void, and to constitute no bar or estoppel against this plaintiff or said other creditors from pursuing and recovering said property in whosesoever hands the same may be found, and that the said orders, decrees and proceedings, and each thereof may be, as to this plaintiff and said other creditors, vacated, annulled and set aside: that the sale of the property of the Erie Railway Company, now or formerly in the possession of the said Jewett, as such Receiver, to wit: all stocks, bonds and interests in other corporations, and patent-rights, licenses and other property, real or personal, not covered by the mortgage to the Farmers Loan & Trust Company or subject to the lien thereof, may be declared to be invalid and void, and that such sale may be annulled and set aside; that an accounting be had of such property," and for other relief. All the decrees, legal proceedings, orders and judgments referred to in the complaint are by reference made parts of the complaint.

To this complaint the defendants severally demurred, on the ground that certain parties named were necessary parties defendant to the action, and that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Messrs. Clarence A. Seward and J. Alfred Davenport, for appellant:

I. The demurrer admits that while Jewett, the possessory Receiver, pendente lite, in the People's action on May 26, 1875, went into possession of all the assets and property of the Erie Company, he is found November 25, 1879, before the appointment of the final Receiver, stripped of all possession and asserting himself to be without claim of title and with nothing to deliver to the final Receiver; while all the assets are found with a new company, of which said Receiver is president, and from which the Erie Company's nonmortgage creditors are excluded.

II. To annihilate the title of the final Receiver in the property received by the Receiver, pendente lite, the following is relied upon:

1. The judgment of foreclosure made November 7, 1877, in the suit of the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, against the Erie Company, commenced June 15, 1875.

2. The conveyance executed by the Erie Company April, 1878, covering the alleged unmortgaged assets.

3. The final decree of November 25, 1879, in the People's action, appointing a final Receiver and declaring that the judgment of foreclosure has left nothing for him to receive.

The plaintiff claims that both of these decrees and the said conveyance were prohibited by statute, made without jurisdiction, and void; and that the obtaining of the said decrees in the manner pointed out in the complaint, and contrary to the provisions of law, and the acts and omissions of the Receiver with reference thereto, constitute a fraud in law as against the plaintiff; that the said decrees should be declared void as to the plaintiff and those similarly situated with him; and that the unmortgaged assets should be traced and recovered as a trust fund, under an express trust declared by statute, and applied under the statute, as the court shall direct, to the pro rata payment of the excluded creditors.

III. In actions by the People for the dissolution of railroad companies, the supreme court is a court of general jurisdiction acting in the exercise of special statutory powers.

Ferguson v. Crawford, 70 N. Y. 259.

The claims of creditors must be ascertained by article 3, title 4, chapter 8, part 3 of the Revised Statutes, providing the form of procedure in cases of voluntary dissolution.

The intent of the Legislature is conclusively shown to be, by the provisions of the above statute, that in proceedings for the dissolution of corporations, the claims of the creditors of the dissolved corporation, and their conflicting rights and interests in the assets, are to be ascertained and adjusted by the agency of the receiver appointed upon dissolution, on notice published in a specified way to all the creditors, and with opportunity to be heard; that mortgages, judgments and liens of all kinds are to be satisfied by or through him upon such notice, and that it is only after such notice is given that any decree can be made involving the adjustment of such rights which shall be binding upon the creditors of the company, even though their claims be "open;" and in case dissolution is decreed to transfer to a final receiver as trustee in liquidation, absolute title and possession of the corporation's assets and for sale and distribution of proceedings pro rata among creditors according to their respective rights.

Rinn v. Astor Fire Ins. Co. 59 N. Y. 143.

IV. Three important safeguards are given, protecting the title to be made by the people in their final receiver:

1. Section 71 (2 R. S. p. 469), making void all transfers or consent decrees by the Corporation after the commencement of the proceedings.

Re Waterbury, 8 Paige, 382; Sands v. Hill, 55 N. Y. 22; Galwey v. U. S. Sugar Refining Co. 13 Abb. Pr. 211, 215; Hutchinson v. N. Y. Central Mills, 2 Abb. Pr. 394, 401; Clinch v. South Side R. R. Co. 1 Hun, 636.

2. The appointment of a temporary receiver to hold and preserve the assets for the final receiver.

The object of an appointment of a temporary receiver is to preserve the property in such a position that the plaintiff, if, and when, he obtains judgment for the relief to which he may prove himself to be entitled, may procure the execution of that final judgment upon the property. It has often been described as an equitable attachment, to secure the execution of the decree when, and if, made.

The appointment of such a receiver, however, does not in any way affect the right to the property. The court, in an action for a receiver, deals with the possession only, until the right can be determined, if the right be the subject matter in dispute between the parties.

Kerr, Receivers, chap. VI.

The receivership of Jewett in the People's action, prior to the final decree of dissolution, and extending from May 26, 1875, to November 25, 1879, was necessarily of this temporary or possessory nature; for a final receiver in trust for liquidation could not be appointed prior to decree of dissolution. It would not be competent or constitutional for legislative authority to devest a title absolutely, before a hearing.

People v. Washington Ice Co. 18 Abb. Pr. 382; Montgomery v. Merrill, 18 Mich. 338.

3. Application of the doctrine that the title of the final receiver relates back to the commencement of the action. The difference between the temporary and final receiver is shown by the statute, which declares that the latter is vested with all the estate of the corporation (§ 67), and is trustee thereof for creditors and stockholders (§ 67), with power of sale (§ 68) and of distribution (§ 79), and with power to redeem all liens, satisfy judgments, and to settle all matters and accounts between the debtor and its creditors (§ 68); and it has been held that, after his appointment, the answer of the corporation, under seal, cannot affect the property in his hands, nor have any effect whatever in determining the right to the same.

Davenport v. City Bank of Buffalo, 9 Paige, 12; Atlas Bank v. Nahant Bank, 23 Pick. 480; Rinn v. Astor Fire Ins. Co. 59 N. Y. 143; Re Berry, 26 Barb. 55; Montgomery v. Merrill, 18 Mich. 338.

V. In the case at bar, all the foregoing principles are made applicable, by reason of the fact that the People's action, begun in accordance with the statute on May 26, 1875, actually resulted, November 25, 1879, in a decree of dissolution and in the appointment of a final receiver "with all the power and authority conferred by law upon receivers of dissolved corporations in like cases."

Mr. Jewett as such final receiver, therefore, was vested with all the estate of the Erie Company, and was trustee thereof for creditors (§ 67), by relation back as of the 26th day of May, 1875 (26 Barb. 55), and with an absolute title, against which all acts done by the Erie Company subsequent to May 26, 1875, were void by statute (§ 71), and for the protection and ultimate assertion of which, possession of all assets was asserted and taken by the court, by its possessory receiver ad interim.

VI. The foreclosure decree was void by statute as to creditors, by section 71, supra, because it was based upon the consent of the Erie Company, given after the commencement of the People's action, and when, therefore, the Erie Company was prohibited by statute from giving such consent.

1. The consent is in these words: "We consent to the entry of this judgment. Shipman, Barlow, Larocque & Macfarland, attorneys for the defendant, the Erie Railway Company. Dated New York, November 7, 1877."

2. The judgment consented to is a tranfer by the Company, so far as unmortgaged assets are concerned, and hence prohibited.

3. The consent was necessary to the decree. The plaintiff, on foreclosure, described the mortgaged property in the exact terms of the mortgage; and the decree, by its own declaration, was made upon bill and answer and supplemental bill. The answer is described in the decree merely as being one admitting the truth of the allegations made in the amended and supplementary complaint; and having been made after commencement of the action for dissolution it would have been powerless to enlarge the mortgage as against the title finally vested in the Receiver for dissolution, even if the complaint had gone beyond the words of the mortgage in describing the mortgaged property.

Davenport v. City Bank of Buffalo, 9 Paige, 12; § 71, supra.

4. The consent being void, the decree is without jurisdiction, and void as to creditors, and constitutes no bar to a determination by the creditors as to what was covered by the mortgage.

VII. The conveyance made by the Erie Company to the purchasers under foreclosure was clearly void by section 71, so far, at least, as it purports to affect unmortgaged assets. It was a transfer and assignment executed directly in the teeth of the statute, and contrary to its express terms. It derives no validity from having been made in pursuance of the consent decree, for that is equally defective. The deed cannot rise above its source.

VIII. The foreclosure decree was not in fact relied upon by the purchasers, as the assets were accepted by the purchasers subject to the rights of the People in their action, as stated in the order of April 6, 1876, which authorized the Receiver to treat the securities as part of the general estate embraced in the mortgage, expressly stating it to be "without prejudice to any equitable rights and interests of the respective parties, which may be established on final accounting."

The petition of May 3, 1878, by Mr. Jewett, as Receiver in the foreclosure suit, also states such a reservation. So, also, with the order of May 3, 1878, in the foreclosure suit which orders a transfer of such property to the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, and the memorandum of receipt executed in pursuance of such transfer.

IX. Inasmuch as the decree of foreclosure was a consent decree, made after the Corporation was powerless to consent; and inasmuch as that decree, therefore, is void as to the Receiver, as finally appointed in the People's suit on November 25, 1879, and as to creditors; and inasmuch as the assets were accepted by the purchasers, expressly subject to an accounting in the People's action—it remains that the judgment in the People's suit, made November 25, 1879, adjudging that the temporary Receiver in that action received no unmortgaged assets, is the only remaining barrier between the final Receiver and the creditors, on the one hand, and the unmortgaged assets on the other. It all hangs, therefore, upon the jurisdiction of the court to enter that judgment, so far as it undertakes to make the adjudication above described, and upon the power of the attorney-general to represent the creditors upon such an application.

X. The judgment in the People's action, dated November 25, 1879, was not only unauthorized, but was prohibited by statute; was made without jurisdiction, as to either subject matter or parties; and was coram non judice, and void.

1. The claim of the respondents, that the attorney-general's action was brought under section 38, necessarily brings them under the old Code of Procedure, § 444, which provides that when a receiver upon the dissolution is appointed, the said receiver is to have the powers, and is to be subject to the obligations of article 3, title 4, chapter 8, of the third part of the Revised Statutes; that is to say: that the final receiver upon dissolution, where a surrender of franchises is ascertained under section 38 of the Revised Statutes, instead of being a common-law receiver, subject to the general powers of the court of equity, as to procedure, and as to mode of acquiring jurisdiction of parties and subject matter, is a statutory receiver, and a trustee, as in all other cases of dissolution of corporations, for whom a specific course of procedure, including specific provisions for notice to all creditors, and for appeal by them, is prescribed by statute; and that the jurisdiction of the court to deal with the assets in the People's action was limited and controlled by the statute.

Mickles v. Rochester City Bank, 11 Paige, 118.

By section 471 of the Code of Procedure, in force when the People's action was begun, it was enacted that when, in consequence of any proceeding provided for by chapter 8, part 3, of the Revised Statutes (except titles 2 and 12 thereof, which do not apply), a "civil action" shall be brought; "Such action shall be conducted in conformity with this Act;" and therefore, sections 430, 442 and 444 of "this Act," i. e., of the Code of Procedure, in force in 1875, applied, and were controlling in the People's action now under consideration.

All possible doubt upon this point is removed by chapter 151, of the Laws of 1870, which provides that a receiver of the property of a corporation can be appointed "only in a civil action."

2. This was contemplated by the court in its order of November, 1879, which appointed Jewett Receiver, "with all the powers and authority conferred by him upon receivers of dissolved corporations in like cases."

3. Section 444 is mandatory, not only upon the attorney-general but also upon the court. As to the attorney-general it is mandatory in express terms; as to the court it is mandatory because it cannot be the intent of the statute to permit the court to refuse what it declares in the same sentence to be the duty of the attorney-general to apply for and obtain, and because the words "shall have the same power to appoint," etc., have a mandatory force on the well known principle of construction.

4. Inasmuch as the court is compelled by the statute to create the office of receiver, upon dissolution of the corporation, who, upon such appointment, is immediately clothed by the statute with the same power to take an account and make distribution of the property of the corporation, among its creditors, as are given in article 3, title 4, chapter 8, of the third part of the Revised Statutes, the converse of the proposition is indisputable, viz.: that the court is prohibited by statute from doing any act which would defeat the exercise, by the receiver, of the title, power, control or jurisdiction conferred by the statute upon such receiver, and from depriving creditors of any of the rights, such as rights to notice, rights of contestation of claims or liens upon the fund through their trustee, rights of appeal, etc., expressly reserved to them by the statute.

5. Inasmuch, too, as the power conferred by chancery to sequestrate and distribute the assets of a corporation on the ground of insolvency is "a mere addition to the common law" (Bradt v. Benedict, 17 N. Y. 93), and "is to be regarded as creating a new equitable right" (Bangs v. Duckinfield, 18 N. Y. 596; Pond v. Framingham etc. R. R. Co. 130 Mass. 194; High, Receivers, § 288), the remedy given excludes all others.

While it is conceded that these new rights and this new jurisdiction were conferred upon the court of chancery as part of the general authority of the court as a court of general and not of special statutory jurisdiction, and that the rule will apply that jurisdiction is presumed in courts of general jurisdiction until the contrary is shown, while the facts necessary to establish the jurisdiction of an inferior court must be alleged and proved (Bangs v. Duckinfield, 18 N. Y. 592; Chemung Canal Bank v. Judson, 8 N. Y. 254, 260), yet it is abundantly established that the above distinction is of no materiality or importance, except as a rule of evidence; and that the presumption in favor of the jurisdiction of the court and the evidence afforded by the recitals in its decrees are only prima facie and can be overthrown by proper allegation and proof, or by positive evidence on the face of the record itself showing want of jurisdiction.

6. The rule goes to the jurisdiction.

High, Receivers, § 289; Bangs v. McIntosh, 23 Barb. 591; Oakley v. Paterson Bank, 1 Green, Ch. 173.

7. The power of the court and attorney-general over assets prior to the decree of dissolution was therefore limited by the statute.

8. The accounting and reference in the People's action was essentially different in the mode of procedure, which was made by the statute exclusive of all others:

a. In the absence of the final trustee from the reference, such absence being fatal to the jurisdiction. The final receiver is absolutely vested with the right to be heard as to creditors' liens. The extent of the liens was admitted by the mortgagee to be undetermined, and said question was left undetermined in the foreclosure suit. This right to be heard was a live asset of the final trustee, and the court had no jurisdiction to confiscate it without notice to him; and the attorney-general had no power to represent him.

b. The absence of notice to creditors was fatal to the jurisdiction. The inquiry whether the property in question was or was not embraced in the mortgage was a question of the construction of the instrument after the facts in relation to the property had been ascertained; and the facts bearing upon this inquiry in possession of creditors as well as of their trustee, and their views of the law upon the proper construction of the mortgage have never been called for or heard by any court, and the determination contemplated by suit has not been made.

The right to be heard, being a right of property, could not be confiscated without due process of law, which requires notice.

The attorney-general had no representative power as between contending creditors.

The temporary receiver did not represent contending creditors, nor did his appointment affect the right or enlarge the jurisdiction of the court.

c. The contract of plaintiff is impaired by the judgment in the People's action, which is therefore unconstitutional and void.

The foregoing views are affirmed by the declaration of this court in Rinn v. Astor Fire Ins. Co. 59 N. Y. 143, 147, as follows:

"Before distribution is made opportunity is to be given to creditors, not parties to the action in the first instance, to come in and make themselves parties to it by the exhibition of their claims. * * * Each creditor has the right to be heard in respect to his own demand and to contest the demands of others (9 Paige, 600; 2 Barb. Ch. 35). * * * If the receiver can be called upon to account by any creditor in any district of the State and to litigate with him in a distinct proceeding, the question of his right to payment out of the fund, and that too, as in this case, without notice to other creditors, it would be likely * * * in many cases to prejudice other claimants."

XI. The statutory mode of acquiring jurisdiction over subject matter and parties having been departed from, the result is a nullity and may be collaterally attacked on proper evidence.

XII. The final receiver colluded with the purchasing Company, which claimed all the assets with his acquiescence and under his protection and presidency.

Jewett's position when appointed final receiver was that of trustee, vested with all the estate formerly of the Erie Company, including the right to be heard as to the extent of the mortgage lien and to have the same ascertained in a proceeding to which he as final receiver should be a party, and after notice to creditors; but he has admittedly wholly failed to exercise the right, or any right as receiver, or to notify any creditor, and has acquiesced in the title of the new company under the alleged decree, which was void as to him and was in fact no bar to his exercise of the right to be heard, and which in contemplation of law he knew to be void. His said acquiescence was in the direction of his own personal interest, as he was president of the new company, one of its incorporators, and identified with the reorganization scheme of which it was the result. His two positions were absolutely hostile, one to the other, and irreconcilable; and his acquiescence was (as charged in the complaint) collusive and fraudulent.

A chronological review of Jewett's positions shows collusion and constructive fraud.

Jewett is in the position of a trustee who has failed and refused to perform the trust and duty imposed upon him by statute, in that he failed to give any notice to creditors or to take the steps required by statute to ascertain and adjust the conflicting interests of the creditors upon notice to them; and he to whom the creditors had a right to look for notice suffered a judgment to be procured without notice to them, by which the mortgages swept away the entire estate and thus rendered any further performance of his trust of no avail. This amounts to collusion and fraud.

XIII. The plaintiff is entitled to equitable relief. The action is brought by him on his own behalf and on behalf of all others similarly situated, as the beneficiary of an express trust, against a delinquent trustee hostile in personal interest, and to bring back into court a trust fund 'allowed by the said trustee to be alienated in the direction of his own personal interest, against the terms of the trust and without authority of law, and by collusion and at least constructive fraud.

The plaintiff is entitled to equitable relief; and it was not necessary, in order to maintain this action, that the plaintiff should have recovered judgment and caused execution to be returned unsatisfied; or that he should have proved his claim before the delinquent and hostile trustee.

1. The plaintiff sues as the beneficiary of an express trust.

2. The corporation having been dissolved, relief against it is impossible. This is not a creditor's bill under section 36, nor a bill for sequestration. This has been effected by the attorney-general.

3. The plaintiff insists that there is a well defined trust, as distinguished from a mere resulting trust.

4. This action is brought to remove an obstruction to plaintiff's remedy, to wit.: to ascertain the fact that the determination extending the lien of the mortgage in the People's action, as well as the consent decree in the foreclosure suit, so far as it may purport to enlarge the mortgage, are without jurisdiction and void. It therefore falls within the rule in Fogg v. St. Louis etc. R. Co. 17 Fed. Rep. 872; Cent. Nat. Bank v. Conn. etc. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54, 70, 71 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 693, 700); Duncan v. Jaudon, 15 Wall. 165 (82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 142); and Goodin v. Cincinnati etc. Canal Co. 18 Ohio, 169.

5. This action can be maintained because it is brought to redress a wrong committed by the administrator of a fund of which the plaintiff is a beneficiary, on the principle of Everingham v. Vanderbilt, 51 How. Pr. 177; affirmed in 12 Hun, 75; Crouse v. Frothingham, 97 N. Y. 105; Miller v. Davidson, 8 Ill. 518, 522; Alsager v. Rowley, 6 Ves. Jr. 748; Holland v. Prior, 1 Myl. & K. 237.

6. The fact that the right of action against the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company was vested in the final Receiver in trust for the plaintiff did not make it necessary for plaintiff to intervene in the People's action, and there compel the Receiver to contest the title which had been made in his personal interest and through his collusion, and which he had so long fraudulently acquiesced in and sought to maintain. In all the cases to which we have referred the cause of action was vested in the trustee. It is the existence of the cause of action in the trustee, combined with his conduct amounting to a refusal to assert it, which gives the plaintiff his standing in equity.

7. Acquiescence and silent connivance by the trustee in the alienation of the fund will be sufficient to give the beneficiary his cause of action. No active refusal by the trustee is necessary; but in this case Jewett was personally in the alienation.

8. Even in the case of a creditor's bill, proof of its being impossible to obtain a judgment or to have execution issue will enable the creditor to obtain equitable relief.

XIV. When the fund is brought back, it can be administered as prescribed in article 3, title 4, chapter 8 of the third part of the Revised Statutes; i. e., in accordance with the trust as expressed by the statute, on the principle laid down in the above decisions.

XV. The unmortgaged assets can and should be followed into the hands of the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, and applied in satisfaction of plaintiff's claims.

1. The trust fund existing for the benefit of the creditors of the Erie Company, by reason of its insolvency and of the appointment of a Receiver, and of the decree of dissolution, may be followed by creditors of the Erie Company into hands of any persons or corporations having notice of the trust attached to it, and not having a superior lien or equity as to the fund in question.

Miller v. Rutland etc. R. R. Co. 36 Vt. 452.

5. The New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company is a trustee for the plaintiff, and those similarly situated, as to all assets received by said Company, which were not covered by the mortgage.

XVI. The descriptive clause of the mortgage was not sufficient to cover the property which the plaintiff seeks to have brought back into court for distribution.

The respondents in the court below seemed to rest this part of their case on the proposition that the word "rights" would cover all the property of the Company not included within the remaining words of the descriptive clause; and that the words "tolls, income, issue and profits of the entire estate," would supply the omission in the mortgage of all mention of property to be acquired after date of the mortgage. We do not so understand the decision.

1. The words "franchises, privileges and rights," in the descriptive clause, refer to the franchises, privileges and rights which were conferred upon the Corporation by its charter, and do not extend the lien of the mortgage to rights of property acquired by the Company, and not covered by the other words of the description.

Smith v. McCullough, 104 U. S. 25 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 637); Parish v. Wheeler, 22 N. Y. 494; Seymour v. Canandaigua etc. R. R. Co. 25 Barb. 285; Milwaukee & Minn. R. R. Co. v. Milwaukee & Western R. R. Co. 20 Wis. 174.

2. The property sought to be applied to the plaintiff's claim was not described by the words "And all the tolls, income, issues and profits arising out of the said property, and all rights to receive or recover the same," it appearing by reference to the mortgage, that the mortgagor was, by the mortgage, entitled to retain possession of the mortgaged premises and receive the earnings, until the mortgagee should take possession after default.

In such a case the common-law rule applies that the mortgagor is not required to account to the mortgagee for rents and profits, while the property remains in his possession, but can dispose of them at will; that they remain subject to the claims of other creditors, free from the lien of the mortgage; and that the mortgagee acquires no lien upon lands or other property into which income may have been converted.

A mortgagee cannot follow the proceeds of his mortgage. He has no claim or lien in law or in equity, outside of the provisions of the mortgage. He has limited his lien by language chosen or adopted by himself, and he is bound by the language of the mortgage. He has no equity superior to that of general creditors. In fact, as he has some security and they none, the equities would be in their favor rather than in his.

3. The mortgage does not affect property acquired by the Erie Company after the date of the mortgage and not appurtenant to the railroad.

XVII. The plaintiff is not guilty of laches.

1. The general creditors cannot be charged with laches in not presenting their claims, when they were entitled by law to notice from the Receiver, and received none.

3. There has been no active acquiescence.

Mr. Herbert B. Turner, for Farmers Loan and Trust Co., respondent.

Messrs. W. W. Macfarland and George F. Comstock, with Messrs. Shipman, Barlow, Larocque & Choate, for other respondents:

I. The People's action, in which Jewett was appointed Receiver, was not governed by the provisions of the Revised Statutes in relation to insolvent moneyed corporations and insurance companies.

Part III, chap. 8 title 4, art. 2, §§ 39–42, R. S.

Mann v. Pentz, 3 N.Y. 415, was founded upon section 38, which embraces all corporations except those above mentioned, and provides for their dissolution on the ground of insolvency. Receiverships, under that section (and under section 36, before it was amended), were common-law receiverships, for care and custody only. They were wholly unregulated by statute, and left to the general powers of the court, as a court of equity.

II. But suppose that the Receiver took the title to the equity of redemption in the property mortgaged, and to all other property in trust for creditors, and that so far as that title has not been effectually devested, it is still in him. Whatever ground of complaint a creditor at large may have against a trustee charged by law with the administration of assets, for a neglect of duty, and whatever the remedy may be, it certainly does not change his status nor give any right to the creditor to usurp the title and function of the trustee, and, by an independent action, to attack the title of strangers, which the trustee alone, if anyone, could challenge.

Olney v. Tanner, 10 Fed. Rep. 101.

III. The plaintiff exhibits no right to sue, except such as, on general principles, appertains to a mere creditor at large. That such a creditor cannot maintain a suit in equity to subject property held adversely by a stranger, to the payment of his debt, has always been a settled rule of law.

The jurisdiction is thus defined by the chancellor in Beck v. Burdett, 1 Paige, 307:

"There are two classes of cases where a plaintiff is permitted to come into this court for relief after he has prosecuted to judgment and execution at law without obtaining satisfaction of his debt. In one case the issuing of the execution gives to the plaintiff a lien upon the property, but he is compelled to come here for the purpose of removing some obstruction fraudulently or inequitably interposed to prevent a sale on the execution; in the other, the plaintiff comes here to obtain satisfaction of his debt out of property of the defendant which cannot be reached by execution at law."

This has always been the limit of equitable jurisdiction. Special circumstances have often been relied upon to take the particular case out of the rule; but in every instance it has been held that the court was absolutely without jurisdiction to assist a creditor at large to obtain satisfaction of his debt by the processes and methods of equity.

Brinkerhoff v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch. 671; Dunlevy v. Tallmadge, 32 N. Y. 457; Greenwood v. Brodhead, 8 Barb. 593; Wiggins v. Armstrong, 2 Johns. Ch. 144; Durant v. Supervisors, 26 Wend. 103; Hadden v. Spader, 20 Johns. 554; Ocean Nat. Bank v. Olcott, 46 N. Y. 17; Allyn v. Thurston, 53 N. Y. 622; Geery v. Geery, 63 N. Y. 252; Produce Bank v. Morton, 67 N. Y. 199.

And, since jurisdiction is limited to judgment creditors, the impossibility of obtaining a judgment in consequence of death, the absence of assets, the insolvency and dissolution of a corporation, or any other event will not enable the court to entertain the action.

IV. In the action for a foreclosure, the court expressly found and adjudged that all the property demanded by the plaintiff was included in the mortgage, and ordered it to be sold. It was sold, and it was bought for the defendant railroad company and paid for. This judgment and the proceedings in execution thereof (to say nothing here about the judgment in the People's action), are conclusive as against the plaintiff. The plaintiff alleges that the finding rests upon insufficient evidence, but that cannot be inquired into here.

Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. 319 (43 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 283).

The plaintiff then, as now, was a creditor at large, with no right to interfere in the contest between his debtor and third parties.

Nevertheless, the judgment was as conclusive against the creditor as against his debtor.

V. During the pendency of the People's action and the appointment of the Receiver, the Corporation was not dissolved, and there was nothing to prevent the commencement and prosecution of an action, and a recovery of a judgment against the Corporation exactly as if no action for a dissolution were pending.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff alleges that at the time of the commencement of the actions by the People against the Erie Railway Company for its dissolution, and by the Farmers Loan & Trust Company for the foreclosure of the mortgages upon its property, it owned a large amount of stock and bonds in other corporations which were not covered by or subject to the mortgages; and he seeks now to reach that property and to subject it to the payment of certain unsecured obligations which he and other creditors similarly situated then held and still hold against the Erie Railway Company. He finds in his pathway the orders and decrees made in the actions mentioned, which must be brushed aside or disregarded before he can succeed.

He does not allege in his complaint that any fraud was practiced upon the court or any party to the action, and he does not assail those orders and decrees as in fact fraudulent, and seek to have them vacated or annulled on that account. He does not claim that if the court had jurisdiction, as against him and the other general creditors, to make them that he can attack them collaterally or maintain this action. What he claims is that those orders and decrees, so far as they assume to adjudicate upon or dispose of the property in question, were made without any jurisdiction and may therefore be disregarded, and that they furnish no obstacle to the maintenance of this action. Hence, the general inquiry upon which we are to enter is whether the supreme court had jurisdiction to adjudicate upon and dispose of the property by the orders and decrees made in those actions.

About the 25th day of May, 1875, the People's action was commenced for the dissolution of the Erie Railway Company, upon the ground, among other things, that it was insolvent and had been for one whole year; and the complaint in that action, besides other relief, prayed that Hugh J. Jewett, who was then President of the Company, might be appointed Receiver during the pendency of the action. On the 26th day of May he was so appointed, with power, as provided in the order appointing him, among other things, to prosecute and defend actions for or against the Company, either in the name of the Company or in his own name as Receiver, and to maintain and preserve the corporate organization and franchises of the Company until final judgment in the action.

Thereafter application was made in that action on behalf of the Farmers Loan & Trust Company for leave to commence an action against the Erie Railway Company to foreclose the mortgages held by it. Such leave was granted, and on the 14th day of June, 1875, the foreclosure action was commenced in the supreme court. In the prayer for judgment in that action the plaintiff, besides other relief, prayed that an inquiry might be had and an account taken of and concerning the premises and property mortgaged to the plaintiff, in order that it might be fully and at large ascertained whereof the mortgaged premises consisted; and that Jewett might be appointed Receiver in the action.

On the 15th day of June, by an order duly granted, Jewett was appointed Receiver of the mortgaged property in that action; and he was specially authorized to receive and enforce possession of whatever he was bound, to receive, to run and operate the railway, to institute, as he might deem needful, whatever suits or proceedings he, by counsel, might be advised to be necessary and proper in the appropriate discharge of his duty as receiver, and to defend and resist any suit or proceedings which he should be so advised and should believe would otherwise be prejudicial to the property, interests or franchises committed to his charge, and generally to do and cause to be done in a lawful manner, as receiver, what might be reasonable and needful in and about the care and preservation of the rights, interests and franchises on which the mortgages were a lien, or the discharge of his duty as receiver might render needful. These orders appointing Jewett Receiver, and all the other orders in the two actions were made in the same court, the same judge presiding; and thereafter Jewett must be deemed to have taken and held, as receiver in the foreclosure action, all the property covered by and subject to the mortgages, and as receiver in the People's action all the other property of the Company.

On the 6th day of April, 1876, upon affidavit and notice of motion, an order was made by the court in the foreclosure action that the Receiver should hold and deal with the stocks and bonds in question in all respects as a part of the general fund of the estate embraced in the mortgages, among other things for the reimbursement to the plaintiff in that action of all sums paid under the orders of the court out of the proceeds of the mortgaged premises for the discharge of debts due from the Erie Railway Company, at the date of the Receiver's appointment, for labor and supplies, "without prejudice to any equitable rights and interests of the respective parties which may be established on final accounting." And he was also authorized to sell any part of the stocks or bonds at public or private sale, and to use and apply the proceeds for the purposes of the trust.

The foreclosure action proceeded to judgment on the 7th day of November, 1877, which judgment recited that the bonds and stocks lawfully came into the possession of the Receiver, and that they were held by him as part and parcel of the property and premises mortgaged to the plaintiff; and it authorized the referee appointed to sell the mortgaged premises, to expose for sale and to sell as part thereof the stocks and bonds mentioned which were described in the decree as a portion of the mortgaged premises; and they were sold by the referee. The sale was aftewards confirmed and the referee was authorized to convey the stocks and bonds with the other property, and he made such conveyance; and the Erie Railway Company executed a similar conveyance of the same property.

Afterward, upon the petition of Jewett in the foreclosure action, an order was made by the court on the third day of May, 1878, by which it was ordered that the Receiver deliver to the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, "all the property and franchises whereof he is now possessed, as receiver in this action, and which were embraced or intended to be embraced in the judgment of foreclosure herein, subject to the reservations and exceptions hereinafter specified, and subject to all and singular the rights of the People of this State in and to the premises, or any part thereof, as the same may be ascertained on due inquiry and examination by the attorney-general, in the action of the People of this State against the Erie Railway Company now pending, to the end that such rights and interests may be as fully protected as if this transfer had not been ordered and directed."

In pursuance of that order, and upon the terms thereof, he did make the delivery, and that substantially terminated the proceedings in the foreclosure action. But for the pendency of the People's action, it cannot be doubted that the determination and judgment in the foreclosure action would have been conclusive upon everyone. It was within the province of the court to determine what property was actually embraced within or subject in express terms or by subrogation or any other equitable principles, to the mortgages foreclosed.

The unsecured creditors were not necessary or proper parties to that action and had no right to intervene therein, and any adjudication made against the mortgagor was binding upon them. Bronson v. La Crosse etc. R. R. Co. 2 Black, 524 [67 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 359]; Stout v. Lye, 103 U. S. 66 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 428]; Candee v. Lord, 2 N. Y. 269.

Jewett, as receiver in the People's action, was not a necessary party to that action. As temporary receiver he was not vested with the title to the property of the Corporation; it was not devested of its property until final judgment of dissolution and the appointment of the final Receiver. The temporary Receiver was not a trustee for the creditors of the Corporation, but he was a mere care taker, custodian and manager of its property and franchises, under the direction of the court, during the pendency of the action, having lawful possession of the property; and if a trustee in any sense he was a trustee for the Corporation.

Nor were the People in any sense a proper party to that action. They had no lien upon or interest in the property. The main purpose of their action was to procure a judgment dissolving the Corporation; and any other relief they could obtain was incidental to that. The court could have permitted the People or the Receiver in their action to intervene in the foreclosure action, if application had been made for that purpose; but whether it would or not rested in its discretion.

The foreclosure judgment absolutely determined that these stocks and bonds were subject to the mortgages, and liable to be sold with the mortgaged premises. They were so sold, absolutely; the sale was confirmed, and the referee was ordered to make the conveyance, including these stocks and bonds to the purchasers; and all this was done without any violation of the rights of the general creditors. The title of the purchasers under the foreclosure sale was in no way made subject to the rights of the People in their action, until an order was made, subsequently to the conveyances by the referee and Railway Company, to the purchasers for a delivery of the property by the Receiver; and in that order it was for the first time provided that the delivery should be subject to all the rights of the People as they might be ascertained by the attorney-general in the People's action; and the delivery was so made.

The adjudications made in the foreclosure action absolutely bound all the parties thereto, and none of them could thereafter be heard to say that they were not founded upon sufficient evidence. The supreme court, having general jurisdiction of the parties and the subject matter, is conclusively presumed to have had sufficient facts before it to authorize the judgment and the orders which were made; and neither the Erie Company nor any of its general creditors can now be heard to say that the judgment was not pronounced after full examination and investigation of all the facts upon which it was based. It imports absolute verity, and it must be presumed that these stocks and bonds were properly subject to the mortgages and were properly sold in connection with and as a part of the mortgaged property. Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. 319 [43 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 283].

Where a court, having jurisdiction of the subject matter and the parties, pronounces judgment upon insufficient or illegal evidence, or mistakes the evidence or the law, the only remedy of any person aggrieved by the judgment is by an appeal therefrom, or a motion in the action in which it was rendered; but it cannot be assailed collaterally. Therefore whatever rights the plaintiff has in this action grow out of the commencement and pendency of the People's action against the Erie Company; and such, indeed, is the contention of his learned counsel.

It cannot be claimed that the pendency of the People's action, in which a temporary receiver had been appointed, absolutely prohibited the commencement of the foreclosure action. That action was commenced after leave was regularly obtained by an order of the court made in the People's action. In the action for the dissolution of the Corporation, the court was not bound to appoint a temporary receiver. It could have permitted the action to proceed to judgment and then appointed a final receiver, to be vested with the title of the corporate property, and to administer and distribute such property under the direction of the court. The temporary receiver was entirely under the control of the court.

There was no statute regulating or prescribing his duties. He was what was called in the argument a common-law receiver, with such powers and duties as, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, the court might devolve upon him. His duties were in the main to manage, protect and preserve the property and franchises of the Company during the pendency of the action. The People's action could have been discontinued at any time, by the order of the court, and the receivership vacated and set aside, and the property restored to the Corporation, and thus fully subjected to the action of the court in the foreclosure action.

The whole matter was constantly under the control of the court until final judgment. Therefore the court had the power to permit the foreclosure action to be commenced, and proceed to appoint a receiver therein, and to supersede the receiver appointed in the People's action, to transfer all the duties of the Receiver in that action to the Receiver appointed in the foreclosure action and to order all the property covered by the mortgages to be delivered to such Receiver.

The judgment in the foreclosure action appears to have been regularly obtained. There was service of process, upon an appearance by the Erie Company, and an answer admitting the allegations of the complaint. The answer entitled the plaintiff to judgment against it.

But it appears in the record that the attorneys for the Erie Company, more than two years after the commencement of the foreclosure action, consented to the entry of the judgment therein; and this, it is claimed, rendered the judgment absolutely void against the final Receiver in the People's action and the creditors of the corporation under section 71, of 2 R. S. 469, which provides as follows:

"All sales, assignments, transfers, mortgages and conveyances of any part of the estate, real or personal, including things in action, of every such corporation, made after the filing of the petition for a dissolution thereof, in payment of, or as a security for any existing or prior debt, or for any other consideration, and all judgments confessed by such corporation after that time, shall be absolutely void as against the receivers who may be appointed on such petition, and as against the creditors of such corporation."

That section was aimed, not at the disposition of the corporate property made under the order of the court by its receiver, or even by the corporation, but at the voluntary disposition of its property by the insolvent corporation; and the confession of judgment prohibited was one made by the corporation as its voluntary act without the interference of the court, and not a judgment like this which rests upon no confession, nor even consent, but upon the action and order of the court at a regular term and session thereof. Such a judgment is in no sense a judgment by confession. If, therefore, it be assumed that section 71 was applicable, it was not violated.

The People's action was one in equity, under the Revised Statutes (2 R. S. 463, § 38) which provide as follows: "Whenever any incorporated company shall have remained insolvent for one whole year, or for one year shall have neglected or refused to pay and discharge its notes or other evidences of debt, or for one year shall have suspended the ordinary and lawful business of such corporation, it shall be deemed to have surrendered the rights, privileges and franchises granted by an Act of incorporation, or acquired under the laws of this State, and shall be adjudged to be dissolved."

That section was unrepealed in 1875, and it is conceded that under it, as originally enacted, an action could be brought in equity for the dissolution of a corporation in the cases mentioned; that in such an action both a temporary and final receiver could be appointed who would be common-law receivers, possessing the powers and charged with the duties devolved upon them by the orders of the court in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction; that they would not be controlled by the provisions of law which regulate the appointment of receivers in the case of the voluntary dissolution of corporations under part 3, chapter 8, title 4, article 3, of the Revised Statutes, and that if the Code which was in force in 1875 did not operate upon receivers appointed in actions commenced under that section, then all of the proceedings in the People's action and the foreclosure action were so far regularly conducted within the jurisdiction of the court that the plaintiff is in no position to assail them. But his contention is that while the temporary Receiver appointed in the People's action was a common-law receiver, whose powers and duties were not regulated by statute, yet that when Jewett became a final Receiver in that action, his powers and duties then became subject, under the Code, to the statutory provisions referred to; and for the present we will proceed upon that assumption.

Upon that assumption then, what could be done under the authority and direction of the court by Jewett as temporary receiver in both actions before judgment and his appointment as final receiver in the People's action? He had such powers and duties as temporary Receiver as the court conferred upon him. He could manage, control and care for the property of the Corporation; and until final judgment in the People's action the general creditors of the Corporation had no right to notice and no absolute right to intervene or to a hearing. The Receiver could reduce the property to possession without consulting them; he could manage the railways under the order of the court and incur and discharge debts, sell and buy property in the ordinary business of the Company; and he could bring and defend actions without any notice to or right of interference by the general creditors. If after his appointment as Receiver in the People's action he had found a large amount of the assets of the Company in the possession of adverse claimants, he could have commenced suit therefor, either in his own name or that of the Company; and if he had failed in the suit, and judgment had gone against him, the adjudications would have bound the creditors of the Erie Company. If he or the Erie Company had been sued for a debt a judgment in the suit would have bound the creditors of the Company.

Here, before final judgment, there was a claim on the one side by the holders of the mortgages that these stocks and bonds belonged to it under the mortgages and that they were in equity part of the mortgaged estate. On the other hand, the People claimed that they were not covered by the mortgages and could not properly be sold under the foreclosure judgment or transferred to the purchasers on the foreclosure sale; and the People claimed that the purchasers under that sale did not get good title, and thus there was a controversy as to this property. That was a controversy which the court had a right to determine before judgment, like any other controversy respecting the property in the hands of its receivers. It appointed a referee to investigate the facts and to report thereon. An apparently thorough and exhaustive investigation was made in which the People, through their attorney-general, participated; and as a result of it the court determined that these stocks and bonds did come under the mortgages; that they were properly sold with the mortgaged premises; that the purchasers at the foreclosure sale obtained a good title to them; and that they never in fact came to the possession of the Receiver appointed in the People's action.

So far no statute was violated and no statutory right of the general creditors was disregarded. They were represented in the litigation by the People and by their debtor; and any judgment rendered or decision made was binding upon them, as it was binding upon the actual parties to the litigation. The court was not bound to defer that litigation until a final receiver was appointed, but has the right to permit it to proceed to a conclusion before final judgment in the People's action. The fact that Jewett was Receiver in both actions makes no difference. We may assume for the purpose of testing the matter that there was a different receiver in each action, and that they both claimed this property, and that there was thus a controversy to be settled. It cannot be doubted, if such had been the case, that the court would have had jurisdiction to permit one receiver to sue the other for the purpose of settling the controversy, and that a decision made in such a litigation would be binding upon everybody.

It matters not that this controversy and litigation involved all the assets of the Corporation which were not plainly covered by the mortgages. The same principles must rule, whether the amount involved was large or small. If the Receiver could, under the direction of the court, engage in a litigation over a single steam engine, or over a debt of $100,000, for or against the Corporation, and bind the Corporation and its creditors by the result, upon precisely the same principles he could engage in this litigation, to which the People and the Corporation were also parties, and bind the Corporation and its creditors by the result.

There was no distribution of the assets of the Corporation in violation of the rights of the final Receiver, or of its general creditors. It was judicially determined that these assets were subject to the mortgages; and that was a determination, as we have seen, which the court could make without the presence of the general creditors, except as they were represented by the People. The final Receiver, when appointed, was vested with all the estate which the Corporation had at the time of its dissolution; and these stocks and bonds which had been swept away by the mortgage foreclosure and sale were no part of that estate. The rights which the statutes secure to creditors, in the case of the statutory final receiver of an insolvent corporation, are such only as pertain to the property which comes to the receiver to be administered by him and distributed to creditors; and there is no statute which entitles them to notice or gives them the right to a hearing before the receiver, except as to claims upon and their rights in such property.

There never was a time when the general creditors of the Corporation had any vested right in these stocks and bonds, or to be paid out of them; and the disposition made of them did not impair the obligation of their contracts with the Erie Company or deprive them of due process of law.

It is claimed on behalf of the plaintiff that the title of the final Receiver related back to the commencement of the People's action, and that therefore it overrode the disposition made of these stocks and bonds. But the equitable rule which gives a receiver title to the debtor's property by relation, as of the commencement of the action, is one adopted to defeat fraudulent, unwarranted and unjust dispositions of the debtor's property, and to accomplish just and equitable ends; but it is not applicable to a case where property has been legally disposed of under the direction of the court, and certainly has no application to a case like this, where the property claimed for a final Receiver was subject to a lien in favor of mortgaged creditors, and has been sold and disposed of by virtue of that lien during the pendency of the action.

There is a feature of this case which must be here more particularly noticed. After the termination of the foreclosure suit and the sale and the transfer of the mortgaged premises to the new corporation, the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Co., the latter Company executed a new mortgage to the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, to secure a large amount of its bonds. After the final order of reference, among other things, to ascertain whether these stocks and bonds were covered by or subject to the lien of the mortgages, in March, 1879, the People's action was discontinued as to all parties defendant, except the Erie Railway Company, and the Farmers Loan & Trust Company; and by leave of the court obtained in that action a supplemental complaint was served, alleging the foreclosure proceedings and the sale and transfer under the foreclosure judgment, and other matters. To that complaint the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, in its answer thereto, alleged the foreclosure proceedings, insisting upon the validity of the sale therein made and its title to the stocks and bonds under its mortgage. To this answer the attorney-general, on the third day of April, 1879, served a reply in which he denied that these stocks and bonds were embraced within the mortgage, and alleged that they were improperly, wrongfully and unlawfully included in the foreclosed judgment, in the sale thereunder, and in the deeds to the purchasers at such sale, and denied that they or the Farmers Loan & Trust Company acquired any title thereto. Thus an issue was framed by the parties to that action, to be tried and disposed of before the referee appointed for that purpose.

Even if final judgment could have been entered in the action before the trial and disposition of that issue, how can it be said that the parties and the court could not delay the entry of final judgment until after the trial of that issue? It was an issue framed before judgment, which it was quite proper to try before judgment; and the decision of that issue embodied in the final judgment upon the report of the referee; that the bonds and stocks were covered by and subject to the mortgages and were legally transferred under the foreclosure sale, bound all the parties to that action and the persons who were represented by them. The People and the Railway Company represented the general creditors of the Railway Company; and the Farmers Loan & Trust Company represented the bondholders, whose trustee it was. Hence, upon the assumption that the final Receiver appointed in the People's action was clothed with the powers and subject to the duties of receivers in the case of the voluntary dissolution of corporations, precisely as claimed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, yet we reach the conclusion that during the pendency of that action and of the temporary receivership, the court had jurisdiction to make the orders and decrees complained of, and to authorize the disposition which was made of this property.

But we need not stop here. Even if the reference to, hearing before, and decision by, the referee, Spencer, had been after final judgment in the People's action, and the appointment of Jewett as final Receiver with all the powers of a receiver in the case of the voluntary dissolution of a corporation, still our conclusion would be the same. Prior to the Code of Procedure, final receivers appointed in equitable actions under section 38 were common-law receivers, whose powers and duties were not regulated by statute; Mann v. Pentz, 3 N. Y. 415; and this is conceded by the learned counsel for the plaintiff.

But he claims that the law was changed by that Code, and that in consequence of the provision thereof the powers and duties of final receivers under section 38 were the same as were devolved upon a final receiver appointed in the case of the voluntary dissolution of a corporation. The Code, as originally reported and enacted in 1848, contained no provisions in reference to the winding up or dissolution of corporations and section 38 remained unaffected. But in 1849, section 430 of the Code was added, which provided as follows: "An action may be brought by the attorney-general, in the name of the People of this State, on leave granted by the Supreme Court, or a judge thereof, for the purpose of vacating the charter or annulling the existence of a corporation, other than municipal, whenever such corporations shall,

"1. Offend against any of the provisions of the Act or Acts creating, altering or renewing such corporation; or,

"2. Violate the provisions of any law, by which such corporation shall have forfeited its charter, by abuse of its powers; or,

"3. Whenever it shall have forfeited its privileges or franchises by failure to exercise its powers; or,

"4. Whenever it shall have done or omitted any act which amounts to a surrender of its corporate rights, privileges and franchises, or,

"5. Whenever it shall exercise a franchise or privilege not conferred upon it by law.

"And it shall be the duty of the attorney-general, whenever he shall have reason to believe that any of these acts or omissions can be established by proof, to apply for leave, and upon leave granted, to bring the action in every case of public interest, and also in every other case in which satisfactory security shall be given, to indemnify the People of this State against the costs and expenses to be incurred thereby."

And then by section 444 it was provided that when judgment should be rendered against a corporation, the court should have the same power to restrain the corporation, to appoint a receiver of its property and to take an account and make distribution thereof among its creditors as were given in article 8, title 4, chapter 8 of the third part of the Revised Statutes, and that it should be duty of the attorney-general immediately after the rendition of such judgment to institute proceedings for that purpose.

By section 68 of the Revised Statutes referred to, it is provided that such receivers shall have the power and authority conferred by law upon trustees to whom an assignment of the estate of insolvent debtors may be made pursuant to the provisions of the 5th chapter of the second part of the Revised Statutes.

Section 70 provides that the receivers, immediately on their appointment, shall give notice thereof, which shall contain the same matters required by law in notices of trustees of insolvent debtors; and in addition thereto shall require all persons holding any open or subsisting contract of such corporation, to present the same in writing and in detail to such receivers at the time and place in such notice specified, which shall be published for three weeks in the state paper and in a newspaper printed in the county where the principal place of conducting the business of such corporation shall have been situated.

In section 72 it is provided that after the first publication of the notice of appointment of receivers, every person having possession of any property belonging to such corporation, and every person indebted to such corporation, shall account and answer for the amount of such debt and for the value of such property to the receivers; and all the provisions of law in respect to trustees of insolvent debtors, the collection and preservation of the property of such debtors, the concealment and discovery thereof, and the means of enforcing such discovery, shall be applicable to the receivers so appointed, and to the property of such corporation.

Section 73 provides that such receivers shall have the same power to settle any controversy that shall arise between them and any debtors or creditors of such corporation by a reference, as is given by law to trustees of insolvent debtors; that the same proceedings for that purpose shall be had, and with like effect; that application for the appointment of referees may be made to any officer authorized to appoint such referees on the application of trustees of insolvent debtors, who shall proceed therein in the same manner; and that the referees shall proceed in like manner and file their report with the like effect in all respects.

Section 74 provides that the receivers shall be subject to all duties and obligations by law imposed upon trustees of insolvent debtors, so far as they may be applicable, except where other provisions shall be made; that they shall call a general meeting of the creditors of such corporation, within four months from the time of their appointment, when all accounts and demands for and against such corporation, and all its open and subsisting contracts shall be ascertained and adjusted as far as may be, and the amount of moneys in the hands of the receiver declared.

Section 79 provides how the receivers shall distribute the residue of the moneys in their hands among those who shall have exhibited their claims as creditors, and whose debts shall have been ascertained.

Section 85 provides that the receivers shall be subject to the control of the court of chancery, and may be compelled to account at any time, and may be removed by the court.

Section 90 provides that any decree or order of the court of chancery, made upon any petition presented pursuant to the provisions of that article, or in the course of any proceedings therein, shall be subject to an appeal.

By looking at the fifth chapter of the second part of the Revised Statutes (2 R. S. p. 41), we find that in section 7 it is provided that the trustees shall have power to sue in their own names, or otherwise, and to recover all the estate, debts and things in action belonging or due to the debtor, in the same manner and with the like effect as such debtor could or might have done if no attachment had been issued, or trustee appointed, or an assignment had not been made; and, among other things, to settle all matters and accounts between such debtor and his debtors or creditors, and to examine any person touching such matters and accounts on oath, and to compound with any person indebted to such debtor, and discharge all demands against such person.

Section 8 provided that the trustees, immediately upon their appointment, shall give notice thereof, and therein shall require: 1, all persons indebted to such debtor, by a day and at a place therein to be specified, to render an account of all debts and sums of money owing by them respectively, to such trustees, and to pay the same; 2, all persons having in their possession any property or effects of such debtor, to deliver the same to the trustees by the day so appointed; 3, all the creditors of such debtors to deliver their respective accounts and demands to the trustees or one of them by a day to be therein specified, not less than forty days from the first publication of the notice.

Section 19 provides that if any controversy shall arise between the trustees and any other person, in the settlement of any demands against such debtor, or of debts due to his estate, the same may be referred to three indifferent persons, who may be agreed upon by the trustees, and the party with whom such controversy shall exist by a writing to that effect signed by them.

Section 26 provided that the trustees shall, as speedily as possible, convert the estate real and personal, of such debtor into money; and section 27 provides that the trustees within fifteen months from the time of their appointment shall call a general meeting of the creditors of such debtors, by a notice to be published in the same manner as before directed respecting the publication of the notice of their appointment, in which notice they shall specify the time and place of such meeting, which time shall not be more than three months, nor less than two months after the first publication of such notice; and every such notice shall be published at least once in each week, until the time of such meeting.

Section 28 provides that at such meeting, or other adjourned meeting thereafter, all accounts and demands, for and against the estate of such debtor, shall be fairly adjusted, so far as the same can be ascertained, and the amount of moneys in the hands of the trustees declared, and further sections provide for the distribution of moneys in their hands.

Section 46 provides that such trustees shall be subject to the orders of the supreme court, and of the court of common pleas of the county in which they were appointed, upon the application of any creditor, or of any debtor in respect to whom they were appointed, in relation to the execution of any of the powers and duties confided to them; and they may be removed by the supreme court for cause shown.

From this careful reference to the statutes, upon the assumption that they are applicable, it will be seen that there is nothing in them which requires a final receiver to consult the general creditors of the insolvent corporation in the prosecution or defense of any action. He is required to publish certain notices and to call a meeting of the creditors, that their claims may be adjusted and that the balance of the property in his hands after the adjustment of the claims may be determined. But it is still his duty to take into his possession the insolvent estate and to use the legal means for that purpose; and he may commence and settle suits, and, under the direction of the court, compromise claims: and he is subject at all times to the order of the court.

In this case there was a controversy as to the ownership of this property, and as to whether it came to Jewett as receiver in the People's action or as receiver in the foreclosure action, and that was a controversy to be settled under the direction of the court; and by a reference and investigation and an orderly, legal proceeding, it was determined that the property did not come to him as receiver in the People's action, but that it came to him as receiver in the foreclosure action, and that as receiver in the People's action he had no title or claim thereto, and that the same was properly sold and disposed of in the foreclosure action.

There is no provision of law which required that the general creditors should be made parties to that litigation, or have any notice thereof; and none of their legal rights were violated by carrying the same on without any notice to them. They were represented therein by the People, through the attorney-general, and by the Receiver, and by the defendant, the Erie Railway Company. They could undoubtedly have been permitted to intervene or to appeal from the judgment or any of the orders, if any ground of appeal existed. But they had no right to attack the same collaterally, unless for fraud sufficient within the rules applicable to such cases to sustain an action to set aside a fraudulent judgment.

These provisions as to notice by the receiver were mostly directory, and were not essential to the jurisdiction of the court. Their omission would constitute an irregularity against which any party aggrieved could have relief by application to the court in the proceeding or in the action. They had reference to the settlement of the claims against the debtor, and the distribution of the debtor's property among creditors. But they had no pertinency whatever, until the estate should come into the hands of the Receiver for distribution by him among those entitled to share therein.

Therefore, standing upon the very ground taken by the plaintiff, assuming the fundamental law to be precisely as he claims, yet we are unable to perceive how it can be said that the court did not have jurisdiction to make the final adjudication which was entered in the final judgment in the People's action. And if we are right in this conclusion, then there is no ground for the maintenance of this action. But the magnitude of the interests involved in this action is such as to justify us in fortifying our conclusions by still further prolonging this discussion; for if the court had no right in the foreclosure action, in consequence of the pendency of the People's action and the temporary receivership therein, to determine whether these stocks and bonds were covered by or subject to the mortgages, then for precisely the same reasons it had no right to determine what property was covered by the mortgages or how much was due thereon; and all the foreclosure proceedings are open to the collateral assaults of this plaintiff and other creditors.

We are of opinion that the learned counsel for the defendants are right in their claim that the proceedings in equity under section 38 for the dissolution of a corporation for the reasons therein stated were unaffected by the Code of Procedure. It was provided in section 13 of title 2 of chapter 13, part 3 of the Revised Statutes (2 R. S. 579) that a writ of scire facias might be issued out of the supreme court upon the relation of the attorney-general against any corporation created or renewed by any Act of the Legislature, for the purpose of vacating or annulling such Act, on the ground that the same was passed upon some fraudulent suggestion or concealment of a material fact made by the persons incorporated by such Act, or made with their consent or knowledge. That was contained in the article entitled "Of Scire Facias."

Section 27 provided that whenever any judgment should be rendered for the vacating and annulling of any Act of incorporation pursuant to the provisions of that article, the court of chancery should have the same powers to restrain the corporation created by such Act; to appoint a receiver of its property and effects and to take account and make distribution thereof among its creditors, as were given in the third article of the fourth title of the eighth chapter of that Act, relating to the voluntary dissolution of corporations; and that it should be the duty of the attorney-general immediately after the rendering of any judgment vacating and annulling any such Act of incorporation, to institute proceedings for that purpose.

Article 2 of the same title is entitled "Of Information in the Nature of Quo Warranto, and in Certain Other Cases," and section 39 provided as follows:

"An information in the nature of a quo warranto may also be filed by the attorney-general, upon his own relation, on leave granted, against any corporate body whenever such corporation shall: 1, offend against any of the provisions of the Act or Acts creating, altering or renewing such corporation; or 2, violate the provisions of any law by which such corporation shall have forfeited its charter by misuser; or 3, whenever it shall have forfeited its privileges and franchises by nonuser; or 4, whenever it shall have done or omitted any acts which amount to a surrender of its corporate rights, privileges and franchises; or 5, whenever it shall exercise any franchise or privilege not conferred upon it by law. And it shall be the duty of the attorney-general to file such information, in every instance in which he shall have good reason to believe that the same can be established by proof."

Section 49 provided that whenever it should be found or adjudged that any corporation against which an information in the nature of a quo warranto should have been filed, had by any misuser, nonuser or surrender forfeited its corporate rights, privileges and franchises, judgment should be rendered that such corporation be ousted, and altogether excluded from such corporate rights, privileges and franchises, and that the corporation be dissolved.

And section 51 provided that whenever any such judgment should be rendered, the court of chancery should have the same powers to restrain the corporation created by such Act; to appoint a receiver of its property and effects, and to take an account and make distribution thereof among its creditors, as were given in the third article of the fourth title of the eighth chapter of that Act; and that it should be the duty of the attorney-general, immediately after the rendering of any such judgment, to institute proceedings for that purpose.

It is thus seen that there were two systems of procedure which might be carried on against insolvent corporations, or corporations which have done or omitted any act which amounted to a surrender of their corporate rights, privileges or franchises; one was a suit in equity by the attorney-general, of his own motion, without leave of any court, under section 38 above referred to, in which a temporary receiver, and after final judgment, a final receiver, could be appointed, each of whom would possess such powers and duties as might be devolved upon him by the court, uncontrolled by any statutory regulations; the other was a proceeding instituted by writ of quo warranto by the attorney-general, after leave obtained of the court, which was a proceeding at law in which the corporation was entitled to a jury trial; and in that proceeding judgment could be rendered dissolving the corporation, but the supreme court had no right to appoint a receiver. But after final judgment annulling and dissolving the corporation, the attorney-general was required to apply to the court of chancery for the appointment of a final receiver; and his powers and duties were regulated by the provisions contained in article 3, above referred to, in reference to the voluntary dissolution of corporations.

These two systems of procedure against corporations went along, side by side, one in chancery, the other at law. Now what change did the Code of Procedure work? Section 38 was not repealed by that Code, but was expressly saved by section 471 thereof, and remained in force in 1875, when the People's action was commenced. The chapter of the Code which embraced section 430 was entitled "Actions in Place of Scire Facias, Quo Warranto, and of Information in the Nature of Quo Warranto," and the title is quite a clear indication that that chapter was not intended to take the place of article 2, title 4, chapter 8, part 3 of the Revised Statutes which contained section 38, and which was entitled "Of Proceedings Against Corporations in Equity."

Section 428, the first section of the Code and chapter, provides that the writs of scire facias and of quo warranto are abolished, and that "The remedies heretofore obtainable in those forms may be obtained by civil action under the provisions of this chapter."

And section 429 provided in substance the same as was provided in section 13 of chapter 9 of the Revised Statutes, above mentioned, simply substituting an action in the place of the writ of scire facias.

Section 430 of the Code above set out is substantially the same as section 39 of the same chapter of the Revised Statutes, and was evidently intended to take its place; and section 431 provides that leave to bring the action mentioned in the preceding sections may be granted upon the application of the attorney-general.

Section 432 is a substantial re-enactment of section 28, of chapter 91, and section 442 of the Code is substantially like section 49 of chapter 9; and section 444 is a substitute for sections 27 and 51 of the same chapter.

It is, therefore, we think, quite clear that the chapter of the Code was simply intended to substitute actions in the form prescribed by the Code, in the place of writs of scire facias and quo warranto, and to regulate the proceedings in such actions. But there was nothing in that chapter which took away from the court of equity the general power which it had always possessed, and which it had previously exercised under section 38, in actions for the dissolution of corporations, for the reasons stated in that section, or which subjected the receivers appointed in such an action to the provisions of section 444 of the Code.

The actions commenced under section 430 of the Code, like those commenced by writ of quo warranto under section 39 of the Revised Statutes, for which it was a substitute, continued to be strictly legal actions in which the defendants had the constitutional right of jury trial, and neither a temporary injunction could be granted nor a temporary receiver appointed.

Section 444 made special provision for injunctions and receivers after judgment, and thus forbade them by implication at an earlier stage of the action. The maxim, Expressio unius, exclusio alterius, applies.

But this construction of the Code of Procedure is made still clearer by a reference to the present Code. By the repealing Act (chapter 245 of the Laws of 1880), section 38 of the Revised Statutes was for the first time repealed, and section 1785 of the Code was substituted in its place.

Section 1786 provides that the actions specified in the last section may be maintained by the attorney-general in the name of, and in behalf of the People.

Section 1788 provides for the appointment of a temporary and permanent receiver, in such an action; and by that section and the repealing Act of 1880, the duties and powers of a permanent receiver so appointed were made the same as those of receivers in the case of the voluntary dissolution of corporations under the Revised Statutes.

The sections to which we have referred, sections 1785, 1786 and 1788, are contained in article 3 of title 2, chapter 15 of the Code; and actions under that article could be commenced without leave of the court. Then in article 4 provisions are made for the commencement of actions by leave of the court, and those provisions are substantially like those contained in the Code of Procedure, and which before that Code were contained in that part of the Revised Statutes which related to writs of scire facias and quo warranto against corporations. When judgment has been rendered in an action provided for in that article, the final receiver is subject to the powers and duties which devolve upon receivers of corporations voluntarily dissolved, and all the actions under that article are triable by jury.

So it appears that the two systems of procedure against corporations which were provided in the Revised Statutes have been continued since the enactment of the Codes. Under the one system the actions may be commenced without leave of the court, and they must be tried as equitable actions; under the other system the actions can be commenced only by leave of the court, and the parties are entitled to jury trial as matter of right. Under the present Code, for the first time under both systems, by special provisions a temporary injunction may be issued and a temporary receiver may be appointed during the pendency of an action, and the final receivers are subject to the provisions of law applicable to receivers in the case of the voluntary dissolution of corporations, whose powers and duties are regulated by law.

Under the Revised Statutes when equitable and legal remedies were administered in different courts, there was reason for the existence of the two systems. But now, when all the remedies may be administered in the same court, it is difficult to perceive any reason for the continued existence of the two systems; but they do exist, and each must have its proper significance and operation.

We think, therefore, that it is clear that prior to 1880 there was no statute regulating the powers and duties of receivers appointed in the equitable actions commenced under section 38 of the Revised Statutes above referred to.

We have taken no notice of the Act, chapter 151 of the Laws of 1870, to which our attention has been called, for the reason that that Act has no pertinency to any questions involved in this case. It did not extend injunctions and receiverships to new cases. It simply provided that they should be issued and granted in actions, and regulated the practice so as to prevent abuses which had previously been just cause for complaint.

There are other topics brought to our notice in the learned briefs submitted to us. They have not been overlooked; but the necessities of time and space forbid any attention to them here. We have written enough to show that the plaintiff does not, by the facts alleged in his complaint, show a cause of action against the defendants; and that

v.
NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD R. R. CO., Appt.

1. Where a plaintiff brings an action for both legal and equitable relief in respect to the same cause of action, the case presented is not one of right triable by jury under the Constitution, and the plaintiff by electing such form of action submits to have the issues tried by the court, or by the court with the aid of a jury, as the court in its discretion may determine, according to the practice in equity cases.

2. An equitable action to restrain the continuance of a nuisance, or an action for a nuisance in which equitable relief is also demanded, is not an action for nuisance within section 968 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an action for a nuisance must be tried by a jury.

APPEAL from an order of the General Term of the Superior Court of New York City, affirming an order of the Special Term awarding issues to be tried by a jury in an action for the abatement of a nuisance and to recover damages and for a perpetual injunction. Reversed.

This action was commenced in September, 1876. The nuisance complained of was the keeping of a "roundhouse" joining plaintiff's premises on East 46th Street in New York City. The action was tried at special term, before a justice without a jury, and judgment entered therein May 24, 1880, dismissing the complaint on the merits.

Plaintiff appealed from this judgment to the general term, which affirmed the judgment, and plaintiff appealed to this court, which reversed the judgment and ordered a new trial—the court holding that the facts showed that the plaintiff had sustained a substantial and unauthorized injury.

See 4 Cent. Rep. 225.

Thereafter, on motion of plaintiff's attorney, the court at special term awarded issues to be tried by a jury. On appeal to the general term, this order was affirmed and defendant appealed to this court.

Mr. Henry H. Anderson, for appellant: The cause has been once tried before the court without a jury. Having once moved the trial of the action without a jury, or having once failed to claim a jury trial, before the production of evidence, the right of the plaintiff is waived.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1009.

Section 968 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "In each of the following actions an issue of fact must be tried by a jury, unless the jury trial is waived by a reference directed."

Subdivision 1. "An action * * * for a nuisance."

Section 969 provides that "An issue of law, and an issue of fact, in an action not specified in the last section, or wherein provision for a trial by jury is not expressly made by law, must be tried by the court unless a reference or a jury trial is directed."

Section 970 provides that "Where a party is entitled by the Constitution or by express provision of law to a trial by jury of one or more issues of fact in an action, not specified in section 968 of this Act, he may apply, upon notice to the court for an order directing all the questions arising upon those issues to be distinctly and plainly stated for trial accordingly."

There is no necessity now to blend law and equity jurisdiction, nor to inject into an equity case common-law practice, except when the court of equity may ask for information on a doubtful fact or to aid its conscience. The practice of trying these cases in the equity suit is one not to be discouraged.

It is submitted that the better practice is to go to trial at special term in the first instance, and that such is the intention of the Code of Procedure; and if the issues to be tried prove such as require a trial by jury, the court then will determine the questions of fact or the issues to be sent for trial. Such order of proceeding seems to have met the approval of the court of appeals.

Wheelock v. Lee, 74 N. Y. 495; Hammond v. Morgan, 1 Cent. Rep. 816, 101 N. Y. 179.

Mr. Lewis Johnston, for respondent: Section 968 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in an action for a nuisance a jury trial must be had, unless waived.

Section 3339 provides that "The distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, and the forms of those actions and suits, have been abolished."

This action is of the nature of a suit in equity, because of the relief by injunction prayed for. Hence, the necessity of applying to the court, under section 970, Code Civil Procedure, that issues be framed.

The waiver referred to in section 1009 applies only to the first, not to the new trial.

The nature of the action is such that either party has the constitutional right to have the question of whether or not the grievance complained of is a private nuisance, and the damage sustained thereby, decided by a jury.

Hudson v. Caryl, 44 N. Y. 553; People v. Metropolitan Tel. Co. 31 Hun, 597–600.

In Davison v. Associates of Jersey Co. 71 N. Y. 333, the plaintiff had brought an action for specific performance; at the trial plaintiff demanded a jury, on the ground that defendant had conveyed, and his relief could only be damages for a breach of agreement; held, that he had elected to bring an equitable action and elected the forum, and that by not amending his complaint he had waived a jury trial.

The judge at special term has made the order appealed from recite that trial by jury is a matter of right, and the order must stand or fall upon that theory, and not as of discretion.

Dorr v. Dansville Gaslight Co. 18 Hun, 274; Brady v. Cochran, 23 Hun, 274; Ward v. Plato, 23 Hun, 402; Davis v. Morris, 36 N. Y. 569–572.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This complaint demands both legal and equitable relief. It prays judgment for damages and an abatement of the nuisance, and also for an injunction restraining the defendant from continuing the nuisance and from permitting its lands to be used for the purpose of carrying on any operation thereon which shall injure the plaintiff in the enjoyment of her property.

The remedy for damages and for the abatement of a private nuisance could at common law be obtained in a legal action, technically known as an "assise of nuisance." It was a part of the judgment that the nuisance be abated. 3 Bl. Com. 220; Wagyoner v. Jermaine, 3 Denio, 306.

The legal remedy by writ of nuisance for the recovery of damages and an abatement of the nuisance, was retained by the Revised Statutes, 2 R. S. 332; and although the proceeding by writ of nuisance has been abolished, the same relief may be now had in an ordinary civil action under the Code. Code Proc. § 454; Code Civ. Proc. § 1662.

It was held in Hudson v. Caryl, 44 N.Y. 554, that as by the common law an action for damages and for the abatement of a nuisance was triable by jury, the defendant could not be deprived of the right to a jury trial upon these issues, although the plaintiff in his complaint also demanded equitable relief.

In the present case the plaintiff is the party insisting upon the right to a jury trial, notwithstanding the fact that she framed her action asking, not simply the relief which could be obtained by a writ of nuisance at common-law, but also relief by injunction, which a court of law was not competent to grant.

The Constitution (§ 2, art. 1) secures to a party the right to a jury trial, in all cases where before its adoption this mode of trial was used.

This is not a case, which as a whole, and in both aspects, was triable by jury at the adoption of the Constitution; nor is it one where under the present system the plaintiff is compelled to unite her claims for both equitable and legal relief in the same action. Rights may be waived, or a party may by his own act preclude himself from asserting them. We think it is a reasonable rule, and one in consonance with the authorities, that where a plaintiff brings an action for both legal and equitable relief in respect to the same cause of action, the case presented is not one of right triable by jury under the Constitution; and that the plaintiff by such election submits to have the issues tried by the court, or by the court with the aid of a jury, as the court in its discretion may determine, according to the practice in equity cases. See Davison v. Associates of Jersey Co. 71 N. Y. 333; N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 46; Baird v. Mayor, 74 N. Y. 382.

This is not we think an action for a nuisance within section 968 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The action of nuisance is mentioned in the section, together with other common-law actions, all of which must, the section declares, be tried by jury, unless a jury is waived, or a reference is directed. Reading the section in connection with section 1660, it is clear, we think, that an equitable action to restrain the continuance of a nuisance, or an action for a nuisance in which equitable relief is also demanded, is not an action for nuisance within section 968.

This leads to a reversal of the orders of the Special and General Terms; but as the courts below decided the motion on the question of power solely the case should be remitted to the Special Term, for the exercise of its discretion.

All concur.

v.
STATE of New York, Respt.

1. Until the passage of chapter 321 of the Laws of 1870, the canal appraisers had no jurisdiction, either under the Revised Statutes or the Act of 1830, over injuries resulting from neglect, or which were temporary and occasional in their character and involved no permanent or continuous damage. Hence it was error in the state board of claims to determine that a claim of that character was barred and lost by reason of omission to present it under the Act of 1830.
2. Where, in raising the banks and water level of a state canal the banks are built of loose earth and not puddled or made tight, so that leakage occasioning injury results, this is on its face a negligent act.
3. A coffer dam, built by the State for the purpose of restraining the waters of a river while enlarging a canal, a portion of which was permitted to remain in the shape of an island, after its purpose was accomplished, is a temporary and occasional obstruction merely, with which the Act of 1830 had nothing to do.

APPEAL from an order of the Board of Claims, in affirmance of an award of "nothing," made by the Board of Canal Appraisers on a claim for damages to a salt field by flooding. Reversed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. L. Stone, for appellants:

The evidence returned indisputably proves the State guilty of culpable negligence, such as would render an individual liable, under similar circumstances:

1. In the loose construction of the raised banks of the canal, which permitted the water to freely percolate through upon claimants' premises.

2. In the construction and retention of a culvert palpably inadequate to meet the ordinary requirements of the situation, including times of ordinary high water.

3. In carelessly permitting the culverts to become obstructed with sediment and rubbish, and to so continue from season to season; and this notwithstanding frequent notice of the fact and request to clear the same.

4. For the obstruction made by the raised canal bank, which in times of high water threw back the swollen streams upon the field and works of the claimant.

There was no Act prior to chapter 321 of the Laws of 1870 which empowered the appraisers, or any other tribunal, to hear and adjudicate this claim. It comes clearly within the scope of that Act.

The laws conferring jurisdiction prior to 1870 were: as to damages for permanent appropriation, 1 R. S. p. 225, § 46; as to damages for temporary occupation, Laws 1836, chap. 287, § 10; as to damages caused by erection of dam, Laws 1830, chap. 293. See also Laws 1866, chap. 836, § 35.

This jurisdiction should be strictly construed.

69 N. Y. 247.

Numerous private acts were passed in 1862 and 1864 conferring jurisdiction to hear specific claims, of a nature similar to this.

If, under any general law, the appraisers were already empowered to hear these claims, is it not altogether probable that the fact would have been discovered?

But this special legislation was continued until upon recommendation of the governor the Act of 1870 was passed for the very purpose, among others, of covering all such cases.

People, Jermain, v. Thayer, 63 N. Y. 350. See also opinion in same case, by Learned, P. J., in court below; Ops. atty-gen. as to claims of Eliza Birdsall, and of Jacob Adle, canal board proceedings, July 28, 1880.

Mr. D. O'Brien, Atty-Gen., for respondent.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In all our review of canal legislation we have invariably recognized the broad distinction between the claims referred to and provided for in the Revised Statutes (part I, title 9, chap. 9, §§ 46, 48) and those covered by the Act of 1870, chap. 321.

The former related to a permanent appropriation to the use of the State in the process of construction or improvement, and which would presumably continue while the canals existed. The latter embraced injuries resulting from the canals or their use or management or the negligence of the officers in charge. Mark v. State, 97 N.Y. 572; People, Jermain, v. Thayer, 63 N. Y. 350.

These are mainly temporary injuries, and may, for convenience, be described as such, although it is possible that there may be included among them some injuries of a permanent character which had not been covered and provided for by the previous legislation. The Act was intended to supplement and extend the existing jurisdiction by adding authority over new cases for which no remedy had been earlier enacted. Under the Revised Statutes it was provided that the State should take a fee, and unless the land owner applied for compensation within one year his rights should be deemed extinguished.

Under the Act of 1870 no land is taken or appropriated, and the title and the right remain in the owner; and an injury to that right, and damages resulting, are all that are contemplated. In the one case there was jurisdiction in the canal appraisers to hear the claim; in the other they had no such jurisdiction until 1870. The Revised Statutes did provide for one class, and one only, of temporary injuries. Sec. 58.

Where lands had been occupied by the canal commissioners for a temporary purpose, or to take therefrom material for repairs, the damages were to be adjusted by arbitration, and no limitation was prescribed, since if the claimant failed to name an arbitrator the county judge was authorized to name one in his behalf.

But in 1830 an Act was passed, evidently intended to reach a case not contemplated by either provision of the Revised Statutes. The canal commissioners were originally the officers charged with the construction of the canals, and with any extraordinary repairs or improvements on any completed canal; and for these two purposes, and these only, they were authorized to take lands, streams and waters, and build dams and aqueducts and construct feeders. R. S. supra, §§ 16, 17.

These were permanent purposes and contemplated works, essential to the construction, improvement and maintenance of the waterway, and such as would become necessary and integral parts of the canal system, and so required an ownership in fee. For such acquisitions a mode of compensation existed. But there were cases where by reason of permanent dams, necessary to the operation of feeders, lands which the State had not taken or appropriated, had been subjected to overflow where it neither needed nor asserted a title in fee, but where it took only an easement in the land of the owner in the form of a right to set the water back upon him as a consequence of the constructed dam. For such cases, prior to 1830, there was no remedy provided, unless by insisting that the State should and did take a fee when only an easement was required. The overflow could not be deemed a temporary occupation of land to be adjusted by arbitration, for it was permanent and continuous, essential to the operation of the feeder and the supply of the canals, and if the fee was not taken the appraisers had no jurisdiction. To meet such cases the Act of 1830 was passed. Chap. 293.

It authorized an appraisal "when any lands are overflowed by the erection of any dam by the canal commissioners on any river or stream connected with the public works." As we have seen, the authority of these officers in taking waters was for the permanent use and supply of the canals, so that the dam and overflow referred to were those of a permanent and continuous character. The damages sustained by the land owner were to be appraised, and the injury contemplated was one to the realty. Since the dam and the overflow were thus continuous and permanent, the mode of appraisal for the easement taken was made the same as where the fee was taken; sec. 2; but the only limitation expressly provided was as to lands which had previously been overflowed. Sec. 3.

The reference of section 2 to the then existing laws is very general in its terms; and both the appraisers and the board of claims have held that the clause of the Revised Statutes which extinguishes claims not filed within the prescribed period of limitation is by that reference imported into the Act of 1830. We do not consider that nor the effect upon the clause of a later Act of 1866; but if the view be correct, it shows yet more clearly that the Act of 1830 referred to a permanent easement, so taken that the right to it could be extinguished and bar a claim of future trespasses. Even a temporary taking of waters and a temporary flooding of land, in order to supply an occasional deficiency of water in the canals, was not deemed within the purview of the Act of 1830; for three years later it was provided that such damages should be settled by arbitration as in case of the temporary occupation of land. Laws 1833, chap. 196.

And thus we obtain a view of the general scheme intended by the Legislature. For a permanent taking, either of a fee or an easement, either in lands or waters, the appraisers had jurisdiction to settle the damages; and for temporary occupation of lands or waters to provide for repairs or incidental deficiencies the remedy was, by the statute, arbitration. This view is in accord with an early decision of this court. People, Merriam, v. Schoonmaker, 13 N. Y. 238.

But in all this there was plainly no provision for occasional and temporary damages flowing from the negligence of the canal officers, or for needless injuries resulting from the manner of their work, and which should have been prevented. Numerous special Acts were passed to meet such supposed omissions. Land overflowed by reason of the embankment across the Montezuma Marshes was neither taken nor appropriated, and neither permanently nor temporarily; but the damages involved the sufficiency of the water way under the aqueduct and so were specially provided for. Laws 1862, chap. 310.

In like manner claims were ordered heard arising from the overflow of the Champlain Canal; Laws 1862, chap. 262; from flooding by Oil Creek reservoir; Laws 1862, chap. 257; from waste weirs and the Erie Canal; Laws 1862, chap. 377; from damming up by obstruction of culvert; Laws 1862, chap. 259; from neglect in construction of Oswego Canal enlargement; Laws 1864, chap. 480; and from overflow as a consequence of that construction. Laws 1864, chap. 580.

These special Acts imply that no remedy existed under the general laws in force, and they were followed by the Act of 1870, which ended the special legislation by providing for all such cases. Until that Act was passed, neither the Revised Statutes nor the Law of 1830 gave to the canal appraisers jurisdiction over injuries resulting from neglect or which were temporary and occasional in their character, and involved no permanent or continuous damage.

The claim of the present plaintiffs is of the latter character, and the board of claims erred in determining that it might have been presented under the Act of 1830, and was barred and lost by reason of that omission. The claimants owned salt works lying along the Liverpool levee of the Oswego Canal. That levee runs nearly parallel with the east shore of Onondaga Lake, the waters of which, through a northern outlet, discharge into the Oswego River, which empties into Lake Ontario. That river is further fed by the Oneida River on the east, and the Seneca River on the west, which latter carries the waters of the Cayuga and Seneca Lakes and of the Clyde River and passing around a sharp curve over Jack's Reefs forms a juncture with the Oswego River as a final outlet.

The claimants allege three sources of injury: first, an insufficient culvert to carry under the canal the waters of Beartrap and Mud Creeks; second, obstructions placed in the Oswego River at Gaskin's Reefs and at Phœnix, and the lowering of Jack's Reefs; and third, raising the water of the canal, without retaining it within suitable banks, so that it soaked through and destroyed the claimant's salt works. As to the first and third of these claims there can be no reasonable pretense that a remedy existed before the Act of 1870; and we do not understand that they were rejected for any such reason. In so far as the determination of the first rests purely upon a question of fact and upon some evidence, the result is not subject to our review, and the merits of the claim in these respects may be left to the final adjudication to be made.

The third cause of injury was quite strongly proved. In the process of the canal enlargement its depth was increased by raising its banks, and correspondingly the level of its water, but the banks were built of loose earth and not puddled or made tight as is usually and may easily be done, so that leakage resulted, occasioning injury. On the face of it this was a negligent act. The object of a canal is to hold and retain water for the purpose of navigation; and banks which permit it to escape both waste the water supplied and injure the adjoining owners. The answer made to this element of the claim is neither a denial of the facts nor an assertion that it does not amount to negligence. If it was a question between individuals, and the canal had been built by a private corporation, the percolation resulting from leaking and illy constructed banks would easily be deemed negligence; and to such a standard the Act of 1870 itself appeals. This cause of injury seems to have been rejected solely because not sufficiently pleaded.

We are not satisfied with that answer. These proceedings have always been quite informal and no rigid or technical rules of pleading have been established. The criticism is that negligence in constructing the bank was not explicitly and in terms alleged. But no such objection was taken on the hearing, so far as we are able to ascertain, until the evidence had all been admitted; and while we do not think the State was at all misled, the pleading should be deemed amended or may be on the new hearing which must be ordered.

There remains the second asserted ground of liability: that the State obstructed the Oswego River, and by lessening the natural drainage to the north and increasing the water supply by lowering Jack's Reefs raised the level of Onondaga Lake and flooded the claimant's land. The proof showed that during the process of enlarging the Oswego Canal the State erected two coffer dams to exclude the water temporarily while sinking the bed of the river. These ran lengthwise of the river for quite a distance, utilizing two islands lying in the stream, and while the improvement was going on were closed at each end, the river thereby running in a narrow channel. When the work was done the ends or wings running to the bank were removed, but the structure in mid-stream was suffered to remain, assuming the character of an island.

The board of claims held these to be dams within the meaning of the Act of 1830 and provable as a cause of damages before the appraisers under that Act, and because not so presented lost if not extinguished. The question was not determined upon the merits. If we have correctly interpreted the Act of 1830, it had nothing to do with such a temporary and occasional structure as is denominated a coffer dam. Those here complained of did not extend across the river and were merely temporary obstructions. They remained only until the work was done, and then existed as an island and in no just sense a dam. Their consequences were brief while serving as a coffer dam, and involved no permanent easement necessary to be acquired by the State. It was, therefore, error to reject the claim for the reasons assigned, and the case must go back for a rehearing.

Nothing that we have said must be construed into an opinion on the merits, or as to the ultimate results. The facts are to be considered unaffected by any supposed judgment of ours as to their force or weight. We have sought to pass only upon the questions of law involved.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new hearing ordered.

All concur.

v.
STATE of New York, Respt.

1. The Act of 1870 does not relate to or confer a new jurisdiction to hear claims for the taking of land in fee or for the appropriation of a continuous and permanent easement by the State.
2. For a claim for a permanent easement taken by the State for the use of the canals and corresponding damages, where there was neither assertion of nor offer to prove negligence, the claimant had a remedy before the Act of 1870 and not under that Act. Such claim must be presented in one year.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

APPEAL from an award of the Board of Claims, dismissing a claim for damages for the destruction of property by the rebuilding of a dam across the Oswego River and Canal. Affirmed.

This claim was filed February 7, 1871, with the canal appraisers by Nathaniel Stewart, who claimed the sum of $1,500 for damages alleged to have been sustained by the rebuilding, by the State of New York in 1866, of a dam across the Oswego River and Canal at Oswego Falls. The claim was pending and undetermined before the appraisers on May 21, 1883, and was transferred to the board of claims under the Act of 1883, chap. 205.

When the claim came on for hearing before the board of claims, March 23, 1886, counsel for the State moved to dismiss upon the ground that the same was not filed with the canal appraisers within the time prescribed by statute and that the appraisers had not and the board of claims had not jurisdiction to hear and determine it. This motion was granted in the following order:

"Ordered, That the said claim herein be and the same hereby is dismissed, upon the ground solely that said claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations, and this board has not jurisdiction to hear and determine the same."

From this order claimant appealed to this court.

Mr. William C. Stephens, for appellant:

The statute which is claimed to create the bar is chapter 293 of the Laws of 1830, which reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. When any lands are overflowed by the erection of any dam by the canal commissioners on any river or stream connected with the public works, it shall be the duty of the canal appraisers to make a just and equitable appraisement of the damages sustained by the owners of such lands.

"Sec. 2. The existing laws in relation to the appraisement and payment of damages, when lands are appropriated by the canal commissioners to the use of the public, shall apply to the appraisal of damages sustained by the owners of lands mentioned in the foregoing section.

"Sec. 3. No claim for lands that shall have been overflowed by the erection of any dam by the canal commissioners at any time before this Act shall be in force shall be received by the appraisers, unless it shall be exhibited within one year after the Act shall become a law."

It is not admitted that the Act of 1830 does or was intended to create any limitation as to claims for damages for overflow, except such as had been caused at the date of the statute by the building of dams by the canal commissioners.

Section 3 of the Act of 1830 confers no jurisdiction upon the appraisers, and entitles no person to damages, but prescribes a limitation of time within which to exhibit claims for damages for overflow occurring before the enactment.

Jurisdiction to appraise damages is provided for solely by section 1 of the Act. It is by virtue of the same language contained in section 1, viz.: "When any lands are overflowed by the erection of any dam by the canal commissioners" etc., that the appraisers have jurisdiction to appraise damages in any case of overflow, that is, as to lands theretofore or thereafter overflowed.

The lands mentioned in section 2 are lands which have been "at any time before the Act shall be in force," or may at any time thereafter be, overflowed; and the existing laws made applicable are those only which apply equally to the appraisal of damages for overflow in the past and in the future. This cannot refer to or include any statute of limitation, for as to past overflow, the Act itself (§ 3) prescribes a limitation.

The claim at bar is not a case arising under the Law of 1830, providing that "When lands are overflowed by the erection of any dam by the canal commissioners on any water or stream," etc., and therefore that Act has no application. The dam causing the damage alleged in the claim now being considered was not built by the canal commissioners nor the changes which created its necessity anticipated by the Legislature of 1830. It was built under other legislative Acts directing improvements which canal commissioners had no authority to undertake.

The distinction which the claimant asserts between dams built by the canal commissioners and those built under other laws, and which distinction, it is claimed, avoids the alleged limitation claimed to apply to dams built by canal commissioners, is recognized and affirmed by the court of appeals in Coster v. Mayor of Albany, 43 N. Y. 399.

Other legislative enactments confirm the claim that the Act of 1830 was intended to apply solely to dams built by the canal commissioners.

By section 2, article 1, title 9, chapter 9, part 1 of the Revised Statutes, it is enacted that "The Erie and Champlain Canals are hereby declared to be completed; and all the powers and authority heretofore given by law to the canal commissioners in relation to the construction of those shall be deemed to have been executed.

"Sec. 3. Whenever any canal now in progress of construction, or that shall hereafter be constructed, shall be completed the canal board shall by an order declare the fact of such completion; and from that time all the powers and authority in relation to the construction of such canals shall cease."

But assume that all claims for overflow after the Act of 1830 to 1866, except those exhibited within one year after overflow, were barred by the limitation prescribed for permanent appropriation of lands; the claim at bar is yet a valid claim to be heard by the board of claims, and is unaffected by any legislation prior to the Acts of 1866 and 1870.

April 27, 1866, the Legislature passed an Act, chapter 836, section 5, of which reads as follows:

"Sec. 5. Section 84 of article 3, chapter 9, title 9, part 1 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"'Sec. 84. Every person interested in premises so appropriated, and every person who shall claim to have sustained damages by reason of the temporary appropriation of his lands or waters, or any injury caused by the canals of this State or the works connected therewith, if he intend to claim such damages, shall within one year after such premises, lands, or waters have been taken permanently, appropriated or temporarily occupied, and within one year after jurisdiction shall be conferred upon the canal appraisers by the Legislature to hear such other injury, file in the office of the canal appraisers a detailed statement of his claim in writing.'"

It is suggested that this amendment just quoted was an amendment of section 48 of article 3, chapter 9, part 1 of the Revised Statutes and not of section 84. There was no section 84 in article 3; and section 48 was the only one referring to the subject of the amendment, which commences with the identical language of section 48.

The dam which occasioned the injury claimed in this case was built after the Act of 1866, and the damages occurred thereafter; and the question is: What was the effect of the Act of 1866 amending section 48 of article 3, chapter 9, title 9 of the Revised Statutes?

The Act of 1866 (whatever the rule had been as to claims of like character arising before that Act) created a new statute of limitation as to injuries occasioned by dams thereafter built or for injuries thereafter resulting from dams whenever built.

People, Jermain, v. Thayer, 63 N. Y. 348.

As to the case of Mark v. State, 97 N. Y. 578, it was a claim for lands appropriated by the State in 1854 for canal purposes and for injuries for certain ferry rights belonging to the claimants, caused by such appropriation, and is inapplicable.

It will be seen that the discussion of the court in the Mark Case related wholly to section 46 of the Revised Statutes, providing for appraisals for lands taken; and the court decided that section, and the limitation created by section 48 had been the law since then, and of course a bar to the claim arising in 1854, because the claim was not filed within one year thereafter, and the same limitation barred the claim for injury to the ferry rights: for they were incident to the taking and ownership of the land and "could not be divided so as to present separate and distinct claim for each." p. 580.

The decision in the Mark Case does not criticise the Jermain Case but distinguished it (page 580), as not involving the question presented in the Mark Case, and not an authority which upheld the position contended for by the claimant's counsel in that case.

Mr. D. O'Brien, Atty-Gen., for respondent:

The causes of claimant's damages accrued in the year 1866. His right of action therefore became fixed at the time of the completion of the dam. At any time within one year thereafter claimant could have presented his claim; and any award thereon would have embraced not only existing but also future damage.

Uline v. N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 2 Cent. Rep. 116, 101 N. Y. 107.

It is submitted that this claim is governed by the Statute of 1830, and is barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The Act of 1870, chap. 321, has no application, and the case of Mark v. State, 97 N. Y. 580, is decisive of this case.

There is no allegation in the claim that the State was guilty of any negligence in the construction of the work in question, and no facts are stated therein which would create a legal liability against the State, were the same established in a court of justice against an individual or a corporation, as required by the Act of 1870. It is quite evident that the claim is not included within chapter 321, Laws 1870.

Moyer v. N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 88 N. Y. 351; Uline v. N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. supra; Lewis v. State, 96 N. Y. 71; Sheridan v. Jackson, 72 N. Y. 173.

There is nothing in the point made on the trial of this claim that the Act of 1830 was not prospective, but only had reference to lands overflowed at the time of the passage of that Act.

Kehn v. State, 93 N. Y. 291; Goillotel v. Mayor, 87 N. Y. 443.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Our decisions in the case of Mark v. State, 97 N. Y. 580 and in Heacock & Berry v. State, just rendered [ante, 330], establish that the Act of 1870, whatever may prove to be its entire scope, does not relate to or confer a new jurisdiction to hear claims for the taking of a fee or for the appropriation of a continuous and permanent easement by the State. The injury to this claimant was wholly of the latter character.

He alleges that the State "for the purposes of canal navigation rebuilt the dam at Oswego Falls on the Oswego River and Canal; that by reason of such rebuilding the waters of said Ox Creek were set back upon the lands of claimant, and the said stream became sluggish and the current almost wholly destroyed; that the channel of said stream became filled with growing flags and grass, and by the accumulation of earth and other material, whereby the waters thereof do not pass off but remain the entire year on said lands, rendering them valueless for any purpose, whatever, and destroyed the timber thereon; that the damage to said claimant by reason of the acts and facts stated is from $150 to $200 per acre."

The dam referred to was a permanent structure necessary for the canal navigation; and its effect in setting back the water was so evidently permanent and lasting as to show that if the State did not formally take a fee it at least took a continuous and lasting easement which was almost, in its consequences, equivalent to an entire appropriation of the land. There was neither assertion of negligence, nor proof or offer to prove the same; and so the claim was not provable under the Act of 1870, because already provided for under the Act of 1830 or the amendatory Act of 1866. Whatever doubt there may be as to the character and scope of the limitation in the Act of 1830 there is none as to that in the amendment of 1866. The claim was required to be presented in one year. The only question here is whether the claim was for a permanent appropriation of the appellant's lands to the use of the State. He himself so declares. He alleges a permanent easement taken by the State for the use of the canals, and corresponding damages. He therefore had a remedy before the Act of 1870 and not under that Act.

The award should be affirmed.

All concur.

v.

McINTYRE COAL CO., Respt.

1. A lease of coal lands, in which the lessee agrees that he will mine not less than 75,000 tons per year for five years and not less than 100,000 tons per year for the next fifteen years and will pay as rent a royalty of thirty cents per ton, quarter yearly, and in case the quantity mined falls short of the said minimum quantity in any year he will pay the same rent as if he had mined such quantity, provided that if he in any year mined more than such quantity, such excess, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be set off against the deficiency of any other year,—permits mining in excess of that quantity in any year, and an application of that excess to the rent otherwise unearned but still due in subsequent years when there happens to be a deficiency in production.
2. The deficiency need not have occurred before the excess is produced; the lessee may apply the excess upon the deficiency of any other years.
3. A covenant to work the mine continuously can not be inferred from an agreement to carry on the mining operations in a safe, skillful and workmanlike manner, the lease providing a penalty for omitting to do so.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming a judgment of the Albany Special Term, dismissing the complaint in an action upon a lease to recover for rent. Affirmed.

The case was first argued in this court December 14, 1886, and a reargument was ordered by the court for reasons stated in the opinion of Rapallo, J., handed down with such order and given below.*

*Rapallo, J.: The construction of the lease contended for on the part of the defendant is that, in effect it imposes upon the lessee an obligation merely to mine or pay for an average of 100,000 tons of coal per annum during the last division of the term of his lease, and that whenever he had mined more than at that rate he had the right to suspend mining, or paying, until the average quantity of coal mined during the preceding year was reduced below 100,000 tons per annum; so that if, during the first five years of the second division of the term, he should have mined 1,500,000 tons in the aggregate the lessee would be entitled to hold the demised premises during the remaining ten years without mining any more coal unless he chose, or paying any rent or royalty.

The mines and the costly improvements there erected, at the expense of the lessors, might remain idle and unproductive, no one but the lessee having the right to operate them.

On the other hand, the plaintiffs claim that the lessee, according to the true intent and proper construction of the lease, was to pay thirty cents per ton for all the coal he should mine, even though it should exceed 100,000 tons per annum, and at the same time was bound to pay as a minimum rent during each and every year thirty cents per ton on at least 100,000 tons, even though he should, in fact, mine less than that quantity during the year, and that the intention of the contract was to secure to the plaintiffs a rental, in any event, of at least $30,000 in each and every year of the term, and at the same time to procure secure compensation at the rate of thirty cents per ton for all the coal the lessee should remove from the mines, if he should remove more than the minimum quantity.

The lease, read without the proviso which gives rise to the dispute, clearly expresses the intent claimed by the plaintiffs. The lessee covenants that during the second division of the term, viz.: fifteen years after the expiration of the first five years, he will mine and carry away from the demised coal lands not less than 100,000 tons of coal

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Messrs. John E. Parsons and George L. Stedman, for appellants:

Judgment should be rendered against the respondent.

The rule laid down by this court is that final judgment will be rendered where it appears that the respondent cannot succeed upon a new trial upon the issues joined.

Guernsey v. Miller, 80 N. Y. 181; Ehrichs v. DeMill, 75 N. Y. 370, 374; Code Civ. Proc. § 1317.

Mr. E. Countryman, for respondent:

The language of the provisio is explicit that the excess of any year may be set off against the deficiency of any other year, within the same division of the term of fifteen years; but the learned judge, in the opinion ordering a reargument, interpolates a peremptory limitation, to the effect that the excess shall only be set off against a deficiency of any priór year to that in which such excess accrued.

The language of the explanatory clause of the proviso is equally explicit, that such excess (having been paid for) shall not be paid for again whenever a deficiency occurs; but the learned judge transposes the clause so as to declare that a deficiency having been paid for shall not be paid for again when a subsequent excess has been obtained.

An express provision in a lease will not be enlarged by construction.

There is no covenant on the part of the lessee

per annum, and that he will pay to the lessors rent or royalty of thirty cents per ton for every ton of coal mined and carried away during the full term of the lease, and that the payment of this rent or royalty shall be made quarterly on the first days of October, January, April and July in each year from the commencement of the term.

And he further covenants that in case the quantity of coal mined by the lessee, in any year of the said term, shall fall short of the proper minimum quantity above named, the lessee will pay to the lessors as rent for such year, a sum of money equal to the amount he would have been required to pay if he had mined the full minimum quantity.

Thus far the lease is free from any ambiguity, and its construction admits of no doubt. The lessee covenants to pay thirty cents for every ton he shall mine, whatever the number of tons may be, and further that the number shall not be less than 100,000 tons in each year, and if in any year it should be less than the prescribed minimum then that he will pay as rent for such year a sum of money equal to thirty cents per ton on 100,000 tons, viz.: $30,000, payable quarterly.

Under this covenant he clearly bound himself to pay this minimum rent in any year during which he mined less than 100,000 tons, whatever amount he might have mined and paid for during the preceding year. But there was still a contingency unprovided for. There might be a deficiency during some year of the term, of say 50,000 tons in the number of tons mined; but under this covenant the lessee would have been obliged to pay for 100,000 tons. The lessee would, therefore, have paid a royalty upon 50,000 tons deficiency, although he never had the coal, and the lessors would have received a royalty upon 50,000 tons which still remained in their mines. The depletion of the mines was an injury for which the lessors were compensated by the royalty reserved in the lease. The value of the coal lands demised was permanently diminished in proportion to the amount of coal removed. But at the same time the tract was large, nearly 2,500 acres. Upwards of $236,000 had been expended out of the funds of the lessors in machinery and improvements.

The lessee obtained the possession of the coal lands and mines and improvements for a long term of years, and the owmers naturally desired to secure to themselves an adequate rental during each year of the term. This they did by requiring that the lessee should mine at least 100,000 tons each year. If he mined only 50,000 tons, he covenanted to pay, in the shape of rent, a royalty upon the deficiency of 50,000 tons which he had never removed from the mines. But in case he should in any other subsequent year, mine and remove say 50,000 tons in excess of the stipulated 100,000, he might still, under the terms of the lease, be deemed bound to pay the royalty of thirty cents on every ton of coal mined during that year, which would have been unjust, because he had already paid a royalty upon a deficiency of 50,000 tons of coal which still remained in the mines, and when he should take them out he ought to have credit for the deficiency which had thus been paid for.

Some further clause was therefore necessary to protect him against a double payment of royalty upon the same amount of coal, viz.: first as a deficiency, and again as a royalty for taking out the coal. The question now is whether the proviso, out of which the present controversy has arisen, was not intended to meet the difficulty and supply the omission above suggested, and whether, if it is fairly capable of that construction, it should not be preferred to one which would be a material departure from the scheme indicated by the preceding part of the lease, and repugnant to the language of the preceding covenants. The language of the proviso is somewhat obscure, but light is thrown upon it by the explanatory sentence with which it concludes. The language of the proviso is:

"Provided, that if in any year the party of the second part shall mine and carry away more than the proper minimum quantity for such year such excess, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be set off against the deficiency of any other year or years, within the same division of the term hereby demised. So much of said excess as is applied to make up such deficiency having been paid for shall not be paid for again."

I think it plain that the excess here spoken of is an excess arising after the deficiency has occurred, and has been paid for. This excess in such a case, instead of being paid for shall be set off against the previous deficiency, which has been paid for. This is plain from the concluding paragraph:

"So much of said excess as is applied to make up such deficiency having been paid for (i. e., having been paid for in pursuance of the covenant to pay for deficiencies), shall not be paid for again." How could it possibly be ascertained how much of the excess in any year was necessary to make up the deficiency in any other year? And how could the necessary amount be so applied, and thus have been paid for, unless the deficiency had occurred before the excess was produced? It must be that in referring to the deficiency "in any other year," the parties meant the deficiency in any other preceding year.

This construction harmonizes all parts of the agreement. It requires the lessee to pay thirty cents per ton on all the coal he takes out in every year; and it secures to the lessors a minimum rental of thirty cents on 100,000 tons for each year: but if the lessee has to pay for any deficiencies as rent, the amounts so paid are to be regarded as royalties paid, and are to be set off against royalties, on any subsequent excess over the 100,000 tons so that the lessee shall not be compelled to pay again a royalty which has once been paid. When he has paid for a deficiency he becomes entitled to take out an equal amount of excess without paying, but there is nothing in the clause which purports to excuse him from paying for a deficiency in any year. There is no provision for reducing payments for deficiencies by off-set, but only for, reducing payments for excess by so much of the excess in any year as shall be applied to make up deficiencies which have been paid for.

These views would lead to a reversal of the judgment of the general term and a new trial, but as the view here taken was not presented by the appellants on the argument, and the respondent has had no opportunity to answer it, there should be a reargument.

to work the mines continuously. Such a covenant is necessary, and must be explicit in terms, before the lessee can be held liable for not working the mines.

Jegon v. Vivian, L. R. 6 Ch. App. Cas. 742, 757; Wheatley v. Westminster Coal Co. L. R. 9 Eq. 538; James v. Cochrane, 7 Wels. Hurlst & G. 170.

As there is no confusion in arrangement nor uncertainty in the use of terms, the question is merely one of interpretation of the language of the lease. The court cannot, by construction, defeat the express stipulations of the parties; and it ought not to endeavor to make a different contract than the parties have made for themselves.

Jegon v. Vivian, L. R. 6 Ch. App. Cas. 754–758; Bowes v. Shand, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 455.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case has been twice argued; the second time at the request of the court in order that a conjecture, not presented by counsel, but prompted by an examination of the lease, and creating some doubt as to the rights of the parties, might be called to their attention. The appellants have, however, given the suggestion very little support. They have indeed failed to show that if adopted it would express the intention of the parties; and we find nothing in the points of the plaintiffs which indicates error in the conclusion reached by the trial judge, as to the true construction of the covenant for alleged breach of which the action was brought. That was the only question before him, and is the one to which the appeal is directed.

It appears that on the first day of October, 1869, the plaintiffs demised to Jervis Langdon certain coal lands for the term of twenty years from July 1, 1870; that the defendant acquired his rights and took his place. The complaint states that on the first of January, 1885, $7,500 rent for the quarter ending on that day became due, and this action was brought for its recovery. The answer admits the demise, but alleges payment according to the covenant of the lessee.

So far as now material, the lease contains a grant and demise of the premises to the lessee, in consideration of which, as therein expressed, he covenants and agrees that he will mine and carry away from the coal lands not less than 75,000 tons of coal per annum for the first five years of the term, beginning on the first day of July, 1870, and will mine and carry away not less than 100,000 tons of coal per annum for the next fifteen years, and will pay a rent or royalty of thirty cents per ton for every ton of coal mined and carried away during the full term.

"The payment of the rent or royalty to be made quarter-yearly on the first days of October, January, April and July, in each year, from the commencement of the term." Then follow these words; "In case the quantity of coal mined and taken away in any year of the said term shall fall short of the proper minimum quantity above named, will pay as rent for such year, a sum of money equal to the amount he would have been required to pay under this covenant, if he had mined the full proper minimum quantity; provided, that if in any year the party of the second part shall mine and carry away more than the proper minimum quantity for such year, such excess, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be set off against the deficiency of any other year or years, within the same division of the term hereby demised. So much of said excess as is applied to make up such deficiency, having been paid for, shall not be paid for again."

The defendant alleges that during the first period or division of the term, viz.: five years from July 1, 1870, to July 1, 1875, it took away from the demised premises an excess of 322,058 tons above the 375,000 tons required by the lease, and paid the full royalty; that thus far during the second period it has mined 220,679 tons over the full amount required for the whole of the second period or division of fifteen years mentioned in the lease, and paid the full royalties thereon, and has thus paid all the rents and royalties for the whole remaining period of the lease.

Upon trial before the court the facts alleged by the defendant were in substance found to be true, and the learned trial judge held "That, under the terms of the lease, the defendant has the right to set apart from the excess of coal mined during any one year of said second period of said lease sufficient to make good any deficiency in any subsequent year of said second period, and having elected so to do, has the right to set apart from the excess of the first year of said second period, to wit: the year ending July 1, 1876, the amount of 25,000 tons to make good a like deficiency in the amount mined during the period from October 1, 1884, to January 1, 1885, the period to recover rent for which this action is brought," and dismissed the complaint.

It was his opinion that the provision for an annual mining of "not less than 100,000 tons of coal per annum" for fifteen years, taken separately, was not satisfied unless that amount was annually produced; but he held that the other provision permitted mining in excess of that amount in any year, and an application of that excess to the royalties otherwise unearned, but still due in subsequent years when there happened to be a deficiency in production. It is evident that under this construction the lessee might go on and mine during the first year of each division the whole amount required for that period.

On the other hand the claim is made in behalf of the lessors, and this is their principal contention, that the mining must be continuous during each year of each division of the term and if there should be an excess it could be applied upon the deficiency occurring in some other preceding year; in other words, that the lessee, whether it mines or not, must pay in each year thirty cents per ton on at least 100,000 tons, or $30,000 annually; "but if (as was suggested in the opinion which led to the reargument) it has to pay for any deficiency as rent, the amounts so paid are to be regarded as royalties paid, and are to be set off against royalties on any subsequent excess over the 100,000 tons, so that the lessee shall not be compelled to pay again a royalty which has once been paid."

Again, it is said in support of this view: "When it has paid for a deficiency, it becomes entitled to take out an equal amount of excess without paying." In other words, as the case is put in argument, the deficiency must have occurred before the excess is produced. It is argued that the provision means a past deficiency and a future excess. I cannot reach that conclusion, and am constrained to agree with the defendant's view.

First, it accords with the literal reading of the provision. If in any year of the terms you carry away more than the 100,000 tons, such excess, or so much "of such excess" as may be necessary, may be set off against the deficiency of any other year, or years within the same division. These permissive words, "If in any year of the term," of course must apply as well to the first year of each division as to the other years, or as to the last year. It is conceivable that there might be produced 150,000 tons, an excess of 50,000 tons, in the first year of the second term; and in the second year of that period there might be produced only 50,000 tons, leaving a deficiency in the second year of 50,000 tons. By the terms of the lease the excess of the first year must be paid for at the time the royalties for the minimum of 100,000 tons are paid; that is the whole quantity mined, 150,000 tons, must be paid for within the year. During the second year, notwithstanding the deficiency, the royalties for 100,000 tons must be paid, as according to the appellants' contention the excess of the first year cannot be set off against the deficiency of the second year. Yet the excess has been paid for, and as the condition runs shall not be paid for again.

Second, the parties having restricted the general language of "any year," by applying it to any other year or years "within the same division," appear to have had the question of limitation in mind, and no further restriction should be implied. Yet the appellants' contention would reduce the years of grace in one division to four years, and in the other to nine years, and make it read as if it said: "If in any year except the first year of each division, the lessee shall mine and carry away an excess," then, etc.

Third, the object of the provision was to provide for anticipated or possible "excess." That is the dominant word. It must be paid for because the covenant of payment requires each ton mined and carried away, no matter how great the production, to be paid for quarterly from the commencement of the term. But it was also in the minds of the parties that a deficiency might occur. This might arise from various causes, voluntary and involuntary, and so that was provided for. The lessee may apply the excess, say the parties, not only upon the deficiency of any other, that is any other "one year," but of any other "years," no matter how many, so they all come within one division.

Again; I think the contention of the appellants requires us to change the words used by the parties in another respect. The lessee is to pay "the rent or royalty of thirty cents per ton for every ton of coal mined and carried away; but in case the quantity mined and carried away in any year of the term, shall fall short of the proper minimum quantity, the lessee shall"—do what? Why, "pay to the lessors a sum of money equal to the amount he would have been required to pay if he had mined the full proper minimum quantity."

Then comes the proviso as to the excess, and then the words, "so much of said excess having been paid for, shall not be paid for again." The appellants read it as if it said: "The previous deficiency" which has been paid for "in pursuance of the covenant to pay for deficiencies." I do not see how this can be allowable when the express language of the covenant is, "so much of said excess having been paid for, shall not be paid for again."

It should be observed that nowhere in the lease do the parties provide for rent, payable as such in money and at a fixed sum, except upon default of the lessee in mining and taking away the quantity of coal provided for, and then the sum to be paid is measured by the tax or royalty which would, except for that default, have been paid to the lessors upon the produce of the mine. This is opposed to the controlling idea of the appellants, which seems to be that the lease imposed an obligation upon the lessee to produce continually in working the mine, and this is presented in various forms. Thus it is said by their counsel: 1, "that the lease nowhere provides that the lessee may in any year altogether cease to mine;" 2, that the lease provided "that the lessee shall and will prosecute and carry on the said mining operations in a skillful and workmanlike manner;" 3, "that the lessee binds himself absolutely to mine at least 100,000 tons during each of the fifteen years."

The learned counsel nowhere finds in the lease an express covenant to work the mine continuously, but seeks from these provisions to imply one. I can find no authority for such implication, nor power on the part of the court to interpolate such a covenant into the contract which the parties deliberately made, and in regard to which no omission or mistake is pretended.

Certain things the lessee must do; certain other things the lessee must not do. The lease contains injunctions and prohibitions, agreements to do and agreements not to do; but the lessee is neither required to work the mine continuously, nor does he agree to do so. Such an obligation cannot in support of an action like this be inferred from the agreement to carry on the mining operations, "in a safe, skillful and workmanlike manner," for the lease provides the penalty for omitting to do so, viz.: accountability to the lessors for any loss or damage which they may sustain in these respects, and declares that it shall be ascertained by arbitration or action for damages or termination of the lease.

As to the other provisions referred to, the deduction sought to be drawn from them is repelled by an express provision for what is called in the English cases (Jegon v. Vivian, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 742; Wheatley v. Coal Co. L. R. 9 Eq. 538) a dead or sleeping rent, that is a rent which must be paid whether the mine is worked or not. This is found in the clause already quoted, but which may be repeated in this connection to show that the parties contemplated not a continuous working of the mine, but a possible discontinuous working of it, viz.: "In case the quantity of coal mined and taken away by the party of the second part, in any year of the said term, shall fall short of the proper minimum quantity above named, the party of the second part shall and will pay to the parties of the first part, their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, as rent for such year, a sum of money equal to the amount he would have been required to pay under this covenant, if he had mined the full minimum quantity."

Let us suppose that, at the very moment after the execution of the lease, the lessee had seen fit to let the land lie idle, preferring to pay the lessors in money a sum equal to the aggregate amount he would have been required to pay if he had, for each one of twenty years, mined the full minimum quantity of coal, can it be thought that at any time thereafter he could be called upon for royalty or rent? Certainly not. The lease secures payment by royalty as rent, and then, in default of royalty measured by production, stipulates for rent in money.

The whole intention of the parties was to provide for a certain amount of rent, and when that is paid, no matter when it is paid, the obligation of the lessee ceases. The remaining sentence of the same provision gives equal latitude and relief to the lessee when he has paid so much royalty upon coal mined as will cover the rent called for, whether the royalty is paid in one year, or in different years, having regard only to that division into periods which the parties themselves arranged for. This construction works no injustice to the lessors. They have received the rent, which was made payable whether the coal was mined or not; it has been paid in one of the two ways bargained for; if more was expected, other provisions should have been inserted in the lease. So far as that instrument discloses the intention of the parties, it has been fully carried out, and the plaintiffs properly held to have no cause of action. A different result would lead to a double payment.

The complaint, therefore, was necessarily dismissed; and the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

Per Curiam:

In deciding upon the appeal in this case it did not escape our attention that the objections to the admission of the evidence, which we held to be incompetent, were general. That point was discussed in consultation, but we considered that the evidence was, in its nature, inadmissible, as it related to speculative and conjectural possible future consequences which might be apprehended from the injury, and how long after the injury such consequences might be developed. The course of the examination shows that the ground of the objections could not have been misunderstood; and if it had been specified, the objection could not have been obviated.

SUPREME COURT.

The UNITED STATES, ex rel. Stephen V. WHITE,
v.
Thomas F. BAYARD, Secretary of State.

1. Where an Act of Congress imposes upon an officer of the Government a purely ministerial duty, upon the performance of which depend the rights of individuals, it is no sufficient answer, on a mandamus proceeding against him, to set up a contrary direction by the President.
2. The decision in Angarica de la Rua v. Bayard (1 Cent. Rep. 826, 4 Mackey, 310), is to be understood as relating solely to the facts of that case.
3. When money is in the custody of the Department of State to which the petitioner has a clear legal right, and by an Act of Congress the Secretary is directed to pay it over to him, mandamus will lie to compel its payment.
4. The return by a defendant in mandamus must deny with distinctness and certainty the material averments of the petition; otherwise, they will be taken as true.
5. Except as to the Weil and La Abra claims, the distribution in ratable proportions of the money due to claimants or their assignees under the awards of the Joint Mexican and American Commission is, by the Act of June 18, 1878, made a purely ministerial duty on the part of the Secretary of State, and such as this court will enforce by mandamus.

(Decided February 23, 1887.)

PETITION for mandamus certified to be heard in the General Term in the first instance. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Stephen V. White, pro per., for relator.

Mr. Wm. A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., for respondent.

Mr. Justice Hagner delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner asks that a mandamus may issue directing Mr. Bayard, the Secretary of State, to pay over to him a sum of money which he alleges he is entitled to receive as assignee of certain claims adjudicated and allowed under the Joint Mexican and American Commission.

1st. The principal defense made to this application by the Secretary, is one which, if allowed, would not only be decisive of this case, but would be fatal to any claim of authority in this court hereafter to issue a mandamus against the Secretary of State in his official capacity in any matter whatever, without respect to the question whether the duty sought to be enforced is merely ministerial, or one discretionary in its nature. The Secretary presents this defense in the following language:

"And this respondent, further answering, saith that the several sums of money mentioned in the said petition, and claimed to be due and payable to the relator, are held by him subject to the order and control of the President of the United States, and are disposable by this respondent at the discretion of the President only; and that, as this respondent is advised and believes, there is no law, as hath been mistakenly supposed by the said relator, by which this respondent is invested with authority over the said sums of money independent of the President of the United States; and it being the opinion of the President that the public interests forbid the making of payments to the said relator, in the present condition of things as herein before set forth, this respondent submits that he is not subject to the process of mandamus in the premises; and he therefore prays that he may be discharged from the said rule, with proper costs in his behalf sustained."

But for the earnestness with which this defense has been urged by the assistant attorney-general in behalf of one of the highest officers of the Government, and especially of his further contention that his position is supported by a decision of this court recently rendered in a case in which the same official was the defendant, we should have contented ourselves with a simple reference to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, announced eighty-four years ago in the case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 163 [5 U. S. bk. 2, L. ed. 69], as a sufficient refutation of the contention.

But, under the conditions to which I have adverted, it is perhaps proper and respectful that something more should be said to show that we have no alternative but to adhere to the position which we conceive has been thus so long settled.

The facts of that case, which is as familiar to the Bar as any in the whole range of jurisprudence, were these: Shortly before Mr. Adams retired from the office of President he had signed a number of commissions for justices of the peace within this District, some of which had not been received by the persons for whom they were intended; but after Mr. Jefferson was inaugurated, they were found by Mr. Madison in the office of the Secretary of State. The President ordered the Secretary not to surrender them, and thereupon Marbury, whose commission was withheld under this order, filed a petition for a mandamus in the Supreme Court of the United States, alleging his demand and the refusal by the Secretary under the President's orders to perform what he averred to be a mere ministerial duty, and insisting that he had a right to have its performance enforced by mandamus from that court.

The case was elaborately argued and considered in all its relations, and the writ was refused, upon the ground that the supreme court possessed no original jurisdiction in the case. But the court entered upon an elaborate discussion of all the points raised, and (among others) of this very question whether, in the case of a plain ministerial duty, the Secretary of State was amenable to the process of manda- mus; and they decided unequivocally that he was.

I shall read a few sentences from the opinion for the reasons I have stated.

Much stress had been laid, in the argument, in that case upon the peculiar language of the section of the Act of 1789 establishing the Department of State, which, as was also urged in the argument before us, committed no authority to the Secretary of State, except in subordination to the orders of the President.

The Chief Justice, in reply to this argument, says: "By the Constitution of the United States, the President is invested with certain important political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character, and to his own conscience. To aid him in the performance of these duties, he is authorized to appoint certain officers, who act by his authority, and in conformity with his orders.

"In such cases their acts are his acts; and whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which executive discretion may be used, still there exists, and can exist, no power to control that discretion. The subjects are political. They respect the Nation, not individual rights, and being intrusted to the Executive, the decision of the Executive is conclusive. The application of this remark will be perceived by adverting to the Act of Congress for establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs. This officer, as his duties were prescribed by that Act, is to conform precisely to the will of the President. He is the mere organ by whom that will is communicated. The acts of such an officer, as an officer, can never be examinable by the courts.

"But when the Legislature proceeds to impose on that officer other duties; when he is directed peremptorily to perform certain acts; when the rights of individuals are dependent on the performance of those acts, he is so far the officer of the law—is amenable to the laws for his conduct, and cannot at his discretion sport away the vested right of others.

"The conclusion from this reasoning is that where the heads of departments are the political or confidential agents of the Executive, merely to execute the will of the President, or rather to act in cases in which the Executive possesses a constitutional or legal discretion, nothing can be more perfectly clear than that their acts are only politically examinable. But where a specific duty is assigned by law and individual rights depend upon the performance of that duty, it seems equally clear that the individual who considers himself injured has a right to resort to the laws of his country for a remedy."

And again; "But, if this * * * be no intermeddling with a subject over which the Executive can be considered as having exercised any control, what is there in the exalted station of the officer, which shall bar a citizen from asserting, in a court of justice, his legal rights, or shall forbid a court to listen to the claim, or to issue a mandamus directing the performance of a duty, not depending on executive discretion, but on particular Acts of Congress, and the general principles of law?" 170 [71].

"If one of the heads of departments commits any illegal act, under color of his office, by which an individual sustains an injury, it cannot be pretended that his office alone exempts him from being sued in the ordinary mode of proceedings, and being compelled to obey the judgment of the law. How, then, can his office exempt him from this particular mode of deciding on the legality of his conduct, if the case be such as would, were any other individual the party complained of, authorize the process? It is not by the office of the person to whom the writ is directed, but the nature of the thing to be done, that the propriety or impropriety of issuing a mandamus is to be determined. Where the head of a department * * * is directed by law to do a certain act affecting the absolute rights of individuals, in the performance of which he is not placed under the particular direction of the President, and the performance of which the President cannot lawfully forbid, and therefore is never presumed to have forbidden; * * * in such cases, it is not perceived on what grounds the courts of the country are further excused from the duty of giving judgment that right be done to an injured individual, than if the same services were to be performed by a person not the head of a department."

The language of the statutes creating others of the Executive Departments, and apparently subordinating their actions to the will of the President, does not differ substantially from that used with respect to the Department of State. Such is the case with reference to the Department of War, of the Navy, and of the Treasury; but the writ has repeatedly been issued from this court, against those officials, in matters ministerial, without a word from the supreme court, in disapproval of a jurisdiction which since the case of Kendall v. U. S. 12 Pet. 610 [9 L. ed. 1215], has been recognized as one of the flowers of our court. In the latter case Mr. Justice Thompson, speaking for the supreme court, says: "There are certain political duties imposed upon many officers in the Executive Department, the discharge of which is under the direction of the President. But it would be an alarming doctrine, that Congress cannot impose upon any executive officer any duty they may think proper, which is not repugnant to any rights secured and protected by the Constitution; and in such cases the duty and responsibility grow out of, and are subject to the control of the law, and not to the direction of the President."

In that case the granting of the writ had been resisted upon the ground of want of authority in the courts of the District, but not because of any distrust in the soundness of the general principles announced in Marbury v. Madison; and it may not be out of place to quote the following from the report of the argument of Mr. Attorney General Butler in that case, as evincing the understanding of a distinguished lawyer of that decision.

"And as the ordinary character of an officer's functions would not always determine the true nature of a particular duty imposed by law, he further agreed that if an executive officer, the head of a Department, or even the President himself, were required by law to perform an act merely ministerial, and necessary to the completion or enjoyment of the rights of individuals, he should be regarded quoad hoc, not as an executive, but as a merely ministerial officer; and therefore liable to be directed and compelled to the performance of the act by mandamus if Congress saw fit to give the jurisdiction." 12 Pet. 596 [9 L. ed. 1209].

Since 1803 the decision has stood undisturbed, as settled law. It is true it has been criticised, upon the ground that the court had declared itself without jurisdiction to issue the writ; and this was one of the reasons given by Mr. Jefferson in his letter of June 2, 1807, to George Hay, the prosecuting attorney in the trial of Burr, why he thought "it material to stop at the threshold, the citing of that case as authority, and to have it denied to be law."

But in U. S. v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 395 [26 L. ed. 171], the supreme court, in awarding a mandamus against the Secretary of the Interior to deliver a land patent to the patentee, notices this suggestion in these words: "If the relator was entitled to the possession of the patent as his property and it was the plain duty of the Secretary to deliver it to him when demanded, then, under all the authorities, and especially the decisions of this court, he is entitled to the remedy he asks. From the case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, down to the present time, such has been the settled doctrine of this court. And though it may be said that the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in that case was not necessary to the decision made, which was that this court had no original jurisdiction in that case, the principles of the opinion have since been repeatedly recognized and acted upon in this court and the case cited with approval in its definition of the circumstances under which persons holding public offices will be compelled to perform certain duties which are merely ministerial. Kendall v. U. S. 12 Pet. 524, [9 L. ed. 1181]; Decatur v. Paulding, 14 Pet. 497 [7 L. ed. 236].

The decision has been equally followed by the courts of the different States, even where the proceedings were against the highest state officials, to compel the performance of ministerial duties. In Magruder v. Swann, 25 Md. 173, where the writ was ordered against the Governor, the whole subject was reviewed, and the more prominent state decisions are cited.

It would therefore have been impossible for this court to have held a contrary doctrine; and whatever language was used in the case of U. S. ex rel. Angarica de la Rua, v. Bayard, 1 Cent. Rep. 826, 4 Mackey, 310, referred to by the defendant, must be understood as relating solely to the facts of that case.

It is well settled that no mandamus can be issued against a public officer, unless the party applying shows a clear legal right to the relief claimed; and also that there exists a clear legal duty on the part of the official to perform the ministerial function involved.

In the case in 4 Mackey, 310, neither of these essential prerequisites of jurisdiction appeared. Under a Convention between the United States and Spain, a large sum had been awarded to Angarica de la Rua for losses sustained by him at the hands of the authorities in Cuba, which was paid over by Spain to the Secretary of State. This officer paid over to the claimant the amount so received, except about $41,000, which he retained until the Spanish Government should make provision to pay the expenses of the arbitration. Several years afterwards the Secretary paid over the sum so retained in full, but refused to pay to the claimant an amount of interest which had been realized from the investment of the sum, made by the Secretary's order while awaiting the action of the Spanish Government. To compel the payment of this interest the mandamus was applied for; but it was refused by this court, as it appeared that the retention of the $41,000 by the Secretary, and its investment, and the earning of interest on the fund, were all equally without law, but were mere voluntary acts of the Secretary; that the unchangeable practice of the Goverment is not to pay interest upon claims and that there could be no element of contract in the transaction; and hence, however equitable might be the petitioner's claim to the interest, it could not be enforced at law.

2. The next inquiry is whether the relator has shown a clear legal right to the fund he claims.

He avers under oath the allowance by the mixed commission of the claims of Conroy and others; that afterwards and before the payment of any of the awards, he became and still is the assignee of one half of each; and he proceeds :

"That the fact of this relator being such assignee was judicially determined by this court in general term in 1881 in the suits of Thomas P. McManus against Richard H. Porter and others in equity, and afterwards in the case of Richard H. Porter and others in equity, decided in 1884 in the general term of this court.

"That the Department of State has recognized this relator as such assignee, upon full argument and hearing before the Secretary of State, and has paid to this relator nine installments hitherto paid by Mexico and distributed by the Secretary of State.

"That on January 31, 1886, a tenth installment was paid by Mexico to the defendant, as Secretary of State of the United States, and that the defendant has made a ratable distribution of said installment, having paid other claimants and especially having paid said Parsons and Conroy and Standish the moiety which they had not assigned to this relator.

"That by the first section of chapter 262 of the Acts of the Forty-Fifth Congress, approved June 18, 1878, it is made the duty of the Secretary of State to ratably apportion and to pay to the claimants or their assigns each installment of money when received from Mexico.

"That of the said tenth installment there is due this relator on account of the Conroy award $1,806.06; on account of the Standish award $1,519.55; and on account of the Parsons award $1,817.92; which sums are specifically on hand, and the amounts have been computed and set apart by the proper auditing officers of the State Department.
